Are we talking—again, this is a question for the Minister—about a relatively straightforward, simple licensing regime and level of fees, or must we contemplate, in order for it to be effective and reasonably to reflect costs, a complex regime that acknowledges the variations, diversity and sensitivity of these matters across the country?

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): My right hon. Friend is making a valid point about geographical variation, but the amendments relate to fees for training courses. Elsewhere, the Bill states that the Secretary of State shall have power by regulation to set up training courses for those who are supplying, exposing for supply, purchasing, possessing or simply using fireworks. That is a wide category of different businesses and even private individuals or councils. My right hon. Friend should consider whether there would have to be different lengths and depths of courses, and different fees for them.

Mr. Forth: Yes; my right hon. Friend is correct. I am grateful to him. That immediately raises another point. My right hon. and hon. Friends are reading my mind accurately and anticipating my points, some of which probably deserve elaboration. However, I do not want to hog the debate.

Another question for the Minister on which we shall need reassurance is the estimate that has been made of the number of additional personnel required in the Department or elsewhere to administer and monitor matters, and make constant judgments about, for example, the variation of a licence.

We are not talking about a one-off process. The clause and the amendment both refer to the granting or variation of licences, which implies a process about which we should know more. What would variation of a licence involve? I am sure that I can dream up circumstances in which that might be necessary. It is germane to our debate on the effectiveness of the regime that we are being asked to approve within the terms of the clause and the amendment to ask whether the Minister envisages a relatively straightforward process whereby a licence, once granted, would be valid for a fixed period, be that one, three or five years, or whether the variation element would require additional bureaucracy and personnel to monitor closely the performance of each person giving the training, and an additional process whereby variation could be carried out.

Mr. Collins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as part of the regime, officials would have to be set aside to deal with correspondence and representations on the nature of the licences and the fees? For example, I recently attended a firework display organised by a Christian retirement home in my constituency, which resulted in so much noise that many local residents said, "It's those blooming Christians causing trouble again." Such events might produce correspondence, and officials would be needed to deal with it under the proposed regime.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are talking about the powers of the Secretary of State, not what officials do, or what the cost of officials replying to correspondence would be. That intervention goes far too wide of the amendments before the House.

Mr. Forth: It is, indeed, the powers of the Secretary of State that are germane to the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker; however, my hon. Friends and I are suggesting that there are many questions that require an answer if we are to make an assessment of the acceptability of the clause—which is, after all, what we are doing here this morning.

Mr. Leigh: My right hon. Friend raised some of those points on 29 January, during the debate on the money resolution. His fears were dismissed by the Minister, who said that safety was paramount. Of course safety is paramount, but how does the Minister setting the fees promote safety? That is what I cannot understand. Why cannot the industry set the fees? The Minister could then regulate whether the safety courses had been carried out and whether too high fees had been imposed. Why should the Minister be involved in the highly complex procedure of setting different levels of fees for different types of course in different parts of the country? Is not the point that I have made a strong one?

Mr. Forth: Yes, it is indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me that we attempted to raise these questions in the debate on the money resolution earlier this year. My recollection is that, at that stage, we failed to get any substantive answers from the Minister, which might explain our anxiety today. We are now all rather nervous that the Minister may be unprepared or unable to give the detailed answers to our questions that would give us the sort of assurance that we need to decide how to vote on the matter before us.

I need not tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I want to remind the House that the whole essence of the parliamentary process is that Members of Parliament come here to question the Executive and to be satisfied about the nature of the business before them. I suspect that, when the Minister catches your eye, he will tell the House whether he believes that the amendments would strengthen the Bill, but in doing so, he will have to give answers to the questions that have been legitimately raised.

So far, questions have been asked only by Conservative Members; Labour Members have been silent, so perhaps they are unprepared for or lacking any interest in the debate. We have become accustomed to that attitude, but it is regrettable that we hear nothing from Labour Members. I assume that they are bored or uninterested, or that they simply accept without question everything that is shoved at them. We are here to participate far more fully in the parliamentary process, and that is what we are trying to do this morning.

Mr. Paterson: The clause makes it a prerequisite for a user of fireworks to have undergone a training course. Having been a member of the Government, does my right hon. Friend think that it is a serious practical possibility that, on 5 November, the night of the year when the overwhelming majority of fireworks are let off, the Minister can send staff to every bonfire party to make sure that every person using fireworks has undergone a training course that conforms to the clause?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That matter certainly does not relate to the amendments.

Mr. Forth: The Minister may wish to help us on that point later, although my optimism about that possibility is fading rapidly. The extent to which the Minister makes an effort to answer our questions will sway many of my hon. Friends in deciding how to vote.

However, the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) raises another important issue, which is the judgment about the nature of the training that would be given. Who would judge whether the training course was inherently satisfactory and whether the training course had been completed satisfactorily? That is another vital point that must be considered.

Mr. Maclean: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) gives way, let me remind the House not to get into the detail of the quality of the training. The amendment talks about charging fees for training, not the quality of the training. The quality could be terrible, but we must debate the fees charged for it.

Mr. Forth: I had in mind the beginning of clause 10, which is being amended, which refers to "the satisfactory completion of a course, or courses, of training".

I was raising the issue in the context of the fees being charged.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What we have before us is not clause 10, but Lords amendments—the changes made by the Lords. The amendment is extremely narrow and talks about the Secretary of State charging fees for courses, nothing else. As long as we stick to the subject of fees, we shall be all right.

Mr. Forth: As ever, I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The amendments do indeed refer to "the charging of fees for the grant or variation of licences," which is one of the processes that we are debating; however, they then talk about "the charging of fees for attendance at courses of training in the use of fireworks," which raises other serious and relevant questions about whether simple attendance is all that is necessary, or whether achieving a level of competence based on that attendance is required.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us be clear: the level of competence has nothing to do with the amendment before us; only the charges are relevant. The amendment gives a power to the Secretary of State to charge fees, albeit for attendance. We need not worry about other parts of the Bill or the level of competence achieved. We are addressing a very narrow matter.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I, too, am grateful for your guidance, but does it follow that amendment No. 3, which covers all the matters in subsection (5), means that we may not raise any of the matters in subsection (5)?

Mr. Forth: On the one hand, we are talking about fees for the grant or variation of licences, but, on the other, we are talking about charging—

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Due to the changeover between yourself and Mr. Deputy Speaker, I did not get an answer to my point of order.

Madam Speaker: I am so sorry—I thought that it was an intervention, not a point of order. I understand that the Lords amendment does not cover the matter that the hon. Gentleman was raising in any event, so perhaps we should continue.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Maclean: I think that I can help my right hon. Friend, without straying outside the provisions of the Bill. Of course, the amendment relates solely to the fees that can be charged for training courses, but clause 5 refers to people having "proficiency or experience in the use of fireworks".

Therefore, it is envisaged that there will be certain training courses that will lead to qualifications or other proof of proficiency and there will have to be fees charged for those courses as well.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his assistance on that matter, but I am mindful of the stricture that Mr. Deputy Speaker placed on me a moment ago, when he said that such matters were not immediately relevant to the clause or the amendments. As ever, I am mindful of his guidance, and will adhere to it strictly.

The point that I was about to make relates to the charging of fees for attendance at courses. That creates another set of difficulties that we must consider carefully because it implies that it is simply the attendance that matters in relation to the clause. That leads to further questions about the effectiveness of the training courses for which the fees are being charged. If only attendance is significant, one can envisage people going through the motions of attending courses.

It being Eleven o'clock, MADAM SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 11 (Friday sittings).

Defence Review (Press Briefings)

11 am

Mr. John Maples (Stratford–on–Avon) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who, in his Department or elsewhere in the Government, briefed the press yesterday on the contents of the strategic defence review and the outcome of the Cabinet discussion on the same subject.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): As Members of the House will know, the strategic defence review has been conducted in an unparalleled open and consultative fashion. [Laughter.] I shall enumerate some of the briefings that have been given, including to those hon. Members who are laughing.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has held three open seminars and made two major speeches on the subject. The second, on 12 March this year, set out the key emerging themes of the strategic defence review, many of which were reflected in this morning's press and other press reports. He set out themes including the importance of our forces operating together jointly to provide maximum operational punch and the tough decisions that remained, such as whether to replace our existing carriers with larger, more flexible and more usable ships.

In addition, we have received hundreds of contributions. We have talked and listened to our own people throughout defence on this matter. A BBC documentary has been transmitted, showing the processes by which the conclusions were reached on the strategic defence review and many of the issues involved.

The emerging conclusions have not only been discussed internally, but briefed to Members of the House, including the Defence Select Committee and the then shadow Secretary of State for Defence and his colleagues. Only this week, those conclusions were briefed to the then shadow Secretary of State, and we gave a briefing on general military matters to the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Stratford–on–Avon (Mr. Maples), who has asked the question today.

Any briefings that broke the conventions of the House, or such briefings as are being suggested by the hon. Gentleman, are deprecated by me, the Prime Minister, the Government and No. 10. However, it will be obvious that particular interest on this topic was engendered yesterday, first, by an item in The Times, which was in parts inaccurate, and, secondly, by an announcement by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House that there would be a statement next Wednesday.

I confess to the House that I have discovered that one formal briefing, 11 pages long, on the strategic defence review was issued yesterday—by the Conservative central office political operations department. You may be interested, Madam Speaker, to know that, even before the conclusions in the review were announced, the Conservatives said in the briefing:

"the main thrust of our case is that it has just been a cover for 'cuts'."

I cannot answer for Conservative central office, the media, their sources or the stories that they write, but I can assure the House that there have been no formal briefings of the media on the outcome of the strategic defence review by Defence Ministers or officials. The House should hear, and I am sure will welcome, the conclusions of the strategic defence review on Wednesday, as announced by the Leader of the House yesterday.

On such an important and far-reaching subject, it is not surprising that there has been much speculation in the press. This is the most radical, deep, wide and open consultation and analysis carried out in the Ministry of Defence for decades. Given the nature and openness of the review, it would not be surprising if such speculation were, on occasion, well informed. That is surely a consequence of open government that we should all welcome, but the first people to know the true facts and the full outcome of the review will, as ever, be Members of the House.

Mr. Maples: It is a measure of the Government's contempt for the House that even when they are caught red-handed, as they have been twice today, they obfuscate. [Hon. Members: "It is you."] I do not know what is in the defence review. It is absolutely ridiculous for Labour Members to level a similar charge at us and try to obfuscate the issue.

I am not referring to the open consultation that the Secretary of State conducted before the conclusions were reached; I am referring to specific briefing of the press, yesterday and the day before, after conclusions had been reached. Who told Mr. John Deans of the Daily Mail and Mr. George Jones of The Daily Telegraph the specific conclusions? The Minister says that no formal briefing took place. It is very difficult for me or any other hon. Member to believe that. Those journalists were briefed. That may not have been done by the Minister or the Secretary of State. I suspect that it was done by his special adviser, who is apparently giving a series of lunches at our expense to brief journalists on these issues. Will the Minister deal with that specific point when he replies?

Someone briefed those journalists. It is not general speculation, and nobody who reads the articles could possibly think that. Those articles follow an article about the review in The Times yesterday, which must also have been the result of briefing.

Dr. Reid: It is inaccurate.

Mr. Maples: The Minister says that it is inaccurate. I suppose that is—it was probably based on briefing by the Treasury. The Government's spin doctors are briefing against each other at such an incredible rate that one does not know of whom to ask private notice questions such as this.

Will the Minister confirm or deny the activities of the Secretary of State's special adviser in giving a series of lunches to brief journalists on the review? [Interruption.] You see, Government Members so hate any criticism of their conduct that one cannot even get a hearing in the House.

The leaking is highly selective, and designed to get the good news in the public domain so that the mood has been set before the bad news comes out on Wednesday, and there will be plenty of bad news for the Territorial Army, the Paras, the Navy and the Air Force. Of course, there will also be the cut in the defence budget that we expect. Of course, those facts are not being leaked.

Madam Speaker, you have in the past, and earlier today, made it clear how you deplore the practice of briefing the press before Parliament is told of major policy announcements. I cannot think of a more important policy announcement that the Government will make than the publication of the strategic defence review, but here we have unequivocal evidence of that practice continuing.

The Secretary of State for Defence personally assured me on Wednesday that he would not use that practice—particularly, as he said, because there were security considerations. He said also—and I ask the Minister of State to confirm this—that, when the press were briefed on the day of the statement, it would be done in secure conditions, they would not be allowed to have their mobile phones with them, and they would not be allowed to leave the Ministry until after he, the Secretary of State, had sat down in the House.

Will the Minister of State today give the House an unequivocal undertaking that the leaks and briefings will stop, and that he will do his duty to Parliament by delaying any further press briefing until after the statement on Wednesday? I ask him further to undertake to make a copy of his statement and the White Paper available to the Opposition on the morning of the day the statement is to be made, and not, as usual, only 20 minutes in advance. As we shall apparently be the last people to find out the contents of the statement, that does not seem an unreasonable request.

That practice is further evidence of the Government's contempt for the House, which we see every day and have seen twice this morning. The Minister has been caught red-handed. He should now promise to desist, and not do it again.

Dr. Reid: What a load of hogwash. I have already made it plain that there was no briefing on the conclusions of the strategic defence review. We would deprecate such briefing. I have already explained to the hon. Gentleman—perhaps he could not pick it up through his synthetic fury—that the review has been carried out in the most open and consultative fashion. It has included lunches. His predecessor was at one of those lunches, as were Lord Younger and the former Secretary of State for Defence, Michael Portillo. We have engaged in the widest form of consultation.

With regard to yesterday's speculation, it takes the biscuit when the hon. Gentleman and his friends at Conservative central office whip up interest by issuing an 11-page media briefing pack on the strategic defence review, and are then surprised when the newspapers cover the review. The only comments that I would make about the hon. Gentleman's strategic defence review media pack is that it got even more things wrong than most of the press combined.

When the facts and conclusions are stated, they will be stated to the House first. The statement will be the conclusion of the deepest, widest and most open consultation process that has ever been carried out in the Ministry of Defence. Complaints about that from a party that, during 18 years in government, never consulted anybody on anything before reaching conclusions, is the height of hypocrisy.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I do not believe that any members of the Socialist Campaign Group went to lunch, so the consultation process sounds a bit one-sided.

As a result of seeing on the notice board that there was to be a PNQ on the strategic defence review today, I took it upon myself to go to the Library and read all the relevant newspapers to see to what extent that great briefing exercise had produced similar results in each newspaper. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) referred to The Daily Telegraph and other newspapers. I looked at The Daily Telegraph, The Independent and the Daily Mail. One said that a cut of £500 million would be announced next week; another said that £1 billion would be cut from defence expenditure—[AN HON. MEMBER: "Not enough for you."] No, not quite enough. Another newspaper—I think it was The Independent—said that the cut would be more than £500 million.

If that great briefing really took place, everybody would have been told the same figure. It sounds very odd. I do not believe that journalists are altogether dim. How could they have drawn such conclusions out of a briefing? Hon. Members should go and read those reports in the Library, because the evidence is there for people to see. The reason we are having this PNQ today is because the Tory Opposition are not capable of dealing with the job that they have to do in Parliament and are inventing stories to try and give the impression that people are briefing, whereas in reality all the stories tell a different tale.

Dr. Reid: As usual, my hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head. I assume that, if someone was briefing journalists, he or she would try to tell the same story to various newspapers. As my hon. Friend says, there are different stories in different newspapers. Some have extremely inaccurate reports, although none are as inaccurate as the briefings being put out by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. Once again, he has excelled himself.

The Opposition's motives for raising the matter are simple: they know that, after the most open consultation and the deepest analysis, we have produced a package, the conclusions of which will be announced next week, which will be good news for the House, the nation and the armed forces. It will enhance our capabilities and ensure that we have modern forces for a modern world. Having had nothing whatever to contribute to that for the past 10 months, Conservative Members are deeply embarrassed. Whereas they have shown that defence cannot be trusted in their hands, the Labour Government have shown that the country can place its trust in them on defence matters.

Lest I contribute to any inaccuracy, I said that Mr. Portillo had attended a luncheon meeting. I should have said that he was invited but did not attend—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."]—unlike the former Conservative Secretary of State, John Nott, the former Conservative Secretary of State for Defence, Lord Younger, and the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), all of whom did attend.

[Dr. Reid]

The huffing and puffing by Opposition Members has nothing to do with the open consultation process; it is due to the fact that they have been thoroughly inadequate on the topic of defence, and are attempting to score cheap political points.

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I can take points of order only after statements.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): The Minister will be aware that Liberal Democrats believe that the strategic defence review should be based on the long-term military requirements of the United Kingdom—on foreign policy rather than narrow Treasury issues. Like other hon. Members, we have been concerned about the Treasury's predatory instincts in formulating the strategic defence review. If the reports in today's press are correct, the Treasury has largely been thwarted. Liberal Democrats would welcome that.

Has not the whole process of the review been characterised by leaks in every quarter to the press and other media? Every member of the press who can hold a knife and fork seems to know more about the process than Members of the House and Select Committee members. Ministers must have known that that has been happening, yet they chose to take no action, presumably because they sought departmental advantage in pretending not to see it happen.

Is not the Government's conduct in all Departments predicated on a wish to make announcements to the press and other media before they are made to the House? Was not that demonstrated clearly even this week, with the announcement of a new policy on arms sales, which was not available to hon. Members until 4 o'clock yet was on the morning news on the radio? Is it not time that Ministers remembered that their first responsibility in terms of information is to the House and nowhere else?

Dr. Reid: Of course, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that nothing will give me greater pleasure than seeing the Secretary of State announce to the House the conclusions of the strategic defence review and watching the mournful faces on the Opposition Benches.

I repeat that no conclusions have been briefed to the press by my Department. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) is supposed to be a member of a party that calls for open and consultative forms of government. We have done that with this defence review to an extent that has rarely, if ever, been done in the Ministry of Defence before. We have consulted and communicated with hundreds, indeed thousands—with hundreds of thousands—of people throughout the armed forces, and journalists, institutes and politicians of every political hue and favour, and with the official Opposition and the minority Opposition parties. They have all been briefed on this matter.

Is it the consensus of the hon. Member's party that we so conduct ourselves in future that we do not do so—that we exclude them from consideration, that, in order to maintain national security, we say nothing to anyone? I should be very surprised if he was supported in that view by anyone else in his party.

Mr. Caplin: We have now spent 19 minutes of a Private Members' day dealing with this private notice question. There appear to be important issues on the Order Paper today, Madam Speaker, as you said; indeed, the Liberal Democrats tried to have today extended, to allow more time, and I see them taking up time on this matter. I feel that there is a filibuster—an abuse of Parliament by those on the Conservative Front Bench and Back Benches. My question to the Minister is: will he publish, for all of us who are interested, the Conservative central office leak?

Dr. Reid: I have always regarded my job as being to spread enlightenment and education, and I do not think that that would be in any way enhanced by publishing that document.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am aware of the business that is before the House, so, if I do call all Members who are standing—I do not commit myself to doing so—questions must be direct.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): It is pretty rich to accuse Conservative central office of this leak. I acknowledge the work that the Ministry of Defence has done in public relations. The Minister of State for the Armed Forces has referred to the widest consultation process ever. I simply raise the question whether that consultation was real consultation or just a public relations exercise to soften up the armed forces for what was going to be a bitter pill. The Ministry of Defence has certainly briefed the Defence Select Committee very assiduously.

I would ask a very important question. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said, there is remarkable consistency in the figures quoted in the press reports. It all depends whether one is viewing the cuts over one year, two years or three years, or over the rest of the Parliament. The Minister knows as well as most of the rest of us do, as a result of the press leaks, that the proposed cuts of £2,000 million will be spread over a period of four years—perhaps, to begin with, just £500 million, or—

Madam Speaker: Order. I must keep hon. Members to the question before us. The question before us is not the defence review itself and what is in it; it is the briefing of the press, not the details of it. I ask Members to put their questions directly; otherwise, I must move on. May I now have a question to the Minister?

Mr. Colvin: My question is simply this. In view of the consistency of the press reports, will the Minister for the Armed Forces get the Secretary of State to authorise a full inquiry into these leaks before he comes to the House to make a statement next Wednesday?

Dr. Reid: The premise on which the question is based is false. There is no consistency in the press reports, any more than there has been for the past 10 months. I therefore do not intend even to consider asking the Secretary of State to institute any inquiry.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): A very serious charge has been made against the Government—that they have leaked, either from the Ministry of Defence or from the Treasury, precise figures of cuts to the Territorial Army and details of the precise equipment that will be ordered. The only query is about the length of the period over which the review will take place. Clearly the information has not come from Conservative central office—it has many claims to fame, but that is not one of them. Where have those precise figures come from, if they have not come from a leak from the Ministry of Defence or the Treasury?

Dr. Reid: The precise figures for the cuts in the Territorial Army in this morning's press came from an article six weeks ago in The Times by Mike Evans—which was again based on speculation—not from any brief that we gave.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Will the Minister confirm, therefore, that no Minister or special adviser told The Times this week:

"Mr. Brown was not satisfied and demanded a cut of £2 billion in the defence budget" and told the Daily Telegraph:

"it will not deliver the savings of £2 billion"?

Will the Minister confirm that no Minister or official told the papers that this week—indeed, that, if there was any briefing, it was apparently by Conservative central office?

Dr. Reid: I do not know the exact quotes. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] I do not know the exact quotes, but I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that the Chancellor did not demand any arbitrary cut of any nature whatever. [Interruption.] If that is the gist of the quotes, it is accurate, and it is something that was not revealed there but has been said for 10 months by Ministers from the Dispatch Box.

This was a foreign-policy-led review, which has given us a configuration of modern forces for the modern world. It has done so within budget. It has enhanced our capability. It has back-filled the hollowed-out areas left by the previous Government. It is a good story, and that is what is getting up Conservative Members' noses.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): May I draw the Minister's attention to a small paragraph in today's Daily Telegraph? It reads:

"Ministers conceded yesterday that the Ministry of Defence would be offering significant savings from its £21 billion-a-year budget."

I draw his attention in particular to the words, "Ministers conceded". Does he agree that Mr. George Jones is a senior Lobby correspondent of high reputation? Does he think that he would write "Ministers conceded" unless he had had a briefing from Ministers or officials?

Will the Minister place in the House of Commons Library a schedule of contacts that he and his officials and Treasury officials have had with the Telegraph over the past few days, so that we may make up our minds ourselves whether there have been conversations between Ministers and officials on that subject?

Dr. Reid: Point one: I have the greatest respect for Mr. George Jones, a serious journalist. Point two: Ministers have never conceded that there were significant cuts made to the defence budget in here, outside here, in public or in private. Point three: significant cuts were never demanded to the defence budget. Point four: the request for a list of every person that we have met in the course of the last year, is a silly point—[Interruption.]—or of every person that we have met in the last few days—

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): In the last two days.

Dr. Reid: Or in the last two days. The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) is being stupid, and Conservative Front-Bench Members have been even more stupid in supporting him.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Will the Minister understand that there is a world of difference between consultation in advance of the taking of decisions by Cabinet Committees and the briefing of decisions reached by Cabinet Committees? It is precisely on that latter point that it is an abuse of the procedures of the House for briefing to take place before the House is told. That is precisely what the stories suggest. Will the Minister accept that?

In his response to my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), the Minister said that there had been no formal briefings by Defence Ministers or officials. Will he further confirm that there were no informal briefings by Ministers of any kind or officials of any Government Department?

Dr. Reid: That is the first sensible question that has been asked. Yes, there is a distinct difference between informing on the background, on the processes, and on the development of the thinking of the defence review, which has been going on for 10 months—and that has been done, and those who have been briefed have included not only journalists but officials—[Interruption.] I will come to the hon. Gentleman's second point. Indeed, a whole documentary was made on that very subject.

That is different from a briefing on the conclusions of the review, and the conclusions of the review have not been briefed by my Department. As far as anyone else is concerned, in terms of the speculation on what they have been saying, I do not know, but I do know that the Government, from the Prime Minister down, deprecate briefing, on or off the record, of any material which most appropriately should come before the House first.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): The Minister has been very careful in his choice of words this morning. We all appreciate that there is a difference between wide-ranging consultation before the conclusions are reached, and the conclusions. The Minister is careful to say, that there has been no briefing "by my Department". It is not good enough for the Minister to use that as a defence to the systematic leaking, which we have seen in the press, from the Government.

[Mr. David Maclean]

Will the Minister give us an assurance that he speaks for the whole Government, not just for himself, at the Dispatch Box? Will he give us an assurance that Ministers from any other Department, or No. 10 Downing street, or special advisers from any other Department, have not been systematically leaking part of the defence review?

Dr. Reid: I have already made it plain that the position I adopt, in deprecating any such briefings and being opposed to them, is fully shared by the Prime Minister and No. 10 Downing street. If the right hon. Gentleman is asking me whether anyone, in any Government Department, out of several hundred civil servants, has ever said anything to a journalist, I am not prepared to make such a wild statement, and nor could any human being. However, there have been no briefings, formal or informal, by officials or Ministers on the conclusions of the strategic defence review; I keep repeating it. If the right hon. Gentleman will not accept that, I am afraid that I cannot help him.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): As the Minister says that he cannot rule out the possibility that such briefings took place, will he institute an inquiry? Is the Minister saying—may I have a yes or no answer—that, when George Jones reported this morning that he talked to Ministers yesterday, George Jones made that up?

Dr. Reid: I did not say that I could not say that there had been no formal briefings by anyone about this matter. I denied that there were any briefings on it, formal or informal. I could not say—because it is ludicrous to ask me to do so—whether any civil servant in any Department, among hundreds of thousands, had spoken at any stage over 10 months to anyone who happens to be a member of the press or who knows someone in the press. That sort of question shows how desperate the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale is, and how far he will go in an attempt to prove a conspiracy that does not exist.

So far as the hon. Gentleman's question is concerned, I repeat again: there has been no briefing on the conclusions of the defence review. The Opposition are annoyed, not because they think that there has been some briefing, but because they think that gradually emerging in press speculation—after 10 months of such speculation—is a good story on defence.

I cannot account for the infallibility of George Jones or anyone else. As far as I am aware, no politician or any reporter—however esteemed, and however much respect I have for him—is infallible. When the hon. Gentleman thinks about it, he will realise that it is ludicrous to ask anyone in the House to account for the veracity or otherwise of, or the motives behind, any report that is issued. I merely point out that what George Jones said in The Daily Telegraph is different from what Mr. Mike Evans, another highly reputable journalist, said in The Times, which is different again from what Mr. John Deans, another reputable journalist, said in the Daily Mail. There is no common thread, because there has been no briefing.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): In that case, if Mr. George Jones's article is proved to be accurate in detail, will the Minister come to the House next Wednesday and apologise, and launch a full inquiry into where Mr. Jones got the words "Ministers conceded yesterday"?

Dr. Reid: I will go further than that. I will relate to the hon. Gentleman the whole of my conversation with the said Mr. George Jones yesterday.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): You spoke to him.

Dr. Reid: Yes—I never denied that I spoke to him. I shall give a verbatim transcript of our total conversation, which was held not 15 yards from here, in the Lobby. Mr. Jones said, and I quote, "They got it wrong in The Times this morning, didn't they?", and I said, "Yes." He said, "I'm going to stick to my figures," and I said, "And I'm going for a coffee."

Fireworks Bill

Lords amendments again considered.

Clause 10

TRAINING COURSES

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 6, line 6, after ("State,") insert—

("() authorise the making by the Secretary of State of provision about the charging of fees for the grant or variation of licences,")

Question again proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mrs. Gilroy.]

11.32 am

Mr. Forth: I believe, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we were considering clause 10 of the Fireworks Bill and the amendments from another place relating to that clause.

In drawing my remarks to a close, I remind the House that we are talking about a cascade of possibilities that raises several questions that the Minister must answer. Clause 10 starts the cascade by saying:

"If fireworks regulations specify conditions ... they may make provision for courses."

The clause then goes on to outline three possible routes by which the training courses may be provided: directly by the Secretary of State; by a body or bodies—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The right hon. Gentleman is quite right: there is a clause there. There are other clauses also, and perhaps he will have an opportunity to discuss them later. However, we are discussing the amendments, and the right hon. Gentleman must stick to them.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to you, as ever, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The amendments relate to the setting of fees and the Secretary of State's role in that process. I think that we can take it for granted that, were the courses provided directly by the Secretary of State or by a body established by her, the Secretary of State would have direct control over any fees charged. That goes without saying. However, it raises some important questions even at that level about the internal mechanism that would be provided within the Department of Trade and Industry to allow the Secretary of State to establish what the level of fees should be.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) said, that question becomes even more important when we consider the determination of a dual level fee structure for those providing training in the private sector. The Minister must give us a much clearer idea about the probable direction that he and the Secretary of State will take: direct provision by the Department, recognition and establishment of other bodies, or reliance on the private sector.

Depending on which route is chosen, we will need to know much more about the attitude that will be taken towards fees. For example, will fees be set low in order to encourage training, or will they be set at a higher level in order to provide a level of profitability to the private licensed bodies? There is a series of important questions relating to the mechanism—we must know more about that also—that the Minister envisages being established within the Department to deal with the substantial level of bureaucracy that will be needed.

Can the Minister provide a precedent? Some of my hon. Friends have from time to time suggested that there may be a precedent in this area. If so, it may help the House—it will certainly help me—to be told about the approach that the Department might take to setting the fee levels.

On the face of it, that is a daunting task. The Secretary of State, the Minister and the Department must take a view about the number of people that they envisage will have to be trained, which will affect the number of operators and trainers required, and the approach to the setting of fees. Those matters are intimately interrelated and linked. Therefore, the more we know about what the Minister has in mind, the more clear we can be in our response to the amendments from another place. In that way, we shall make an informed judgment, and cast our votes appropriately when the time comes.

We are posing a challenge, but also providing an important opportunity to the Minister. The Bill has been little debated, although the Minister appears to attach much importance to it. I tried earlier in the year—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We will not worry about how often the Bill has been debated. We are concerned only about the amendments before us.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are worried about whether we shall receive a proper answer from the Minister. However, you have already told us that you will police the matter: your eagle eye will be upon the Minister and, if he does not reply, he will incur your displeasure. You helped us out in that regard, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman should not try to bring the Chair into the argument. Any hon. Member who speaks to the amendments will confine his or her remarks to those amendments—and that includes the Minister. That is what I shall do. I am not worried about the content of the speeches, so long as hon. Members keep to the amendments.

Mr. Forth: We shall worry about the content, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the Minister fails to answer our questions, neither you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he, nor anyone else will be surprised at the action we shall take.

I have tried to play a modest part in setting out this morning my worries and anxieties about the amendments, clause 10 and the Bill as a whole. I hope that the Minister will endeavour to provide more answers than he has managed so far, so that my colleagues and I can make an informed judgment about these matters.

Mr. Rowe: We would all be delighted if we could have prevented the deaths of four people in the past four years. However, the Bill and the amendments are deeply troubling. The entire process is in the hands of the Secretary of State; no provisions are laid down. Clause 10(1), to which the amendments apply, begins with the word "If", and clause 10(2) also begins with the word "If". It states:

"If fireworks regulations make provision for courses to be provided by licensed persons, they may . . . make provision" for certain things. Their Lordships have amended provisions that may never be brought in; there is nothing in the Bill to say that they will. The alternative, of course, is more alarming: because the Bill and its amendments are drafted in this way, there is nothing to stop the Bill being extended further and further.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should know better. I have already explained to hon. Members that what we have to consider is the charging of fees. That is all that is before us—not this clause or any other clause, just the Lords amendments. He must speak to those Lords amendments.

Mr. Rowe: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, the amendments are governed by the word "if" and, if we are going to authorise the making by the Secretary of State of provision about the charging of fees for the grant and variation of licences, we are entitled to repeat to the Minister that we want to know what he has in mind. Does he have it in mind that individuals will receive a licence, which will allow them to perform their function as a letter off of fireworks as often as they wish during a year, or will they have to seek a specific licence every time they wish to perform that function? Clearly, that will have a considerable bearing on the value of the fee charged because, if it is clearly for a year, that fee will be greater. The licence might even be for life; once someone has taken the course and shown that he is able to perform safely, perhaps there will be a life licence fee.

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend agree that, subject to what Ministers say, there would be every reason for such a licence to be provided without time, as it were, because, if the licence is granted with reference to whether a person has the appropriate experience and qualifications, they are not likely to lose that experience and qualifications? Therefore, just one fee should be levied on one occasion.

Mr. Rowe: The precedent for that would be the driving licence. That would be perfectly reasonable, so I would be interested to hear the Minister say what he has in mind—if, of course, the regulations are ever made.

Amendment No. 3 authorises

"making by the Secretary of State of provision about the charging of fees for attendance at courses of training in the use of fireworks".

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) has already asked, will attendance by itself be enough, or will people have to have some sort of qualification at the end? If they are to be granted a qualification at the end, will it be eligible to be a national vocational qualification? If so, two things follow.

The fees for attendance at courses will vary sharply. For example, many training and enterprise councils—which are responsible for running NVQ courses—are keen to encourage people to undertake such courses because they represent a way back into employment, perhaps as part of the new deal. Are we seriously suggesting that all those people will have to pay a fee? I hope that the Minister will tell us whether it is intended that some people should be eligible for exemption from the fees, even if they attend a course. There is, of course, the other element: people who are already qualified who do not have to attend a course at all will presumably not be charged a fee.

Then we have the business about

"the making by the Secretary of State, or by any body or bodies established or recognised by the Secretary of State under this section"

"provision about any of the matters mentioned in subsection (5)."

I believe that you have already ruled, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that does not allow me to talk about subsection (5), even though one of the amendments deletes subsection (5)(c), but what I think is important is the body or bodies established or recognised. That involves a considerable difference.

If the body is to be established by the Secretary of State, the charges will be much higher because it will have to be set up from scratch and enormous expenses will attach to it. If, however, it is a body recognised by the Secretary of State, all sorts of questions are raised. Will it be a training and enterprise council? Will it be, as has been suggested, a local authority? Will it be some body relating to the industry itself, in which case the Secretary of State would no doubt assume that the charges for setting it up and running it will fall on industry?

Industry might or might not care for that, but all these things will have a considerable impact on the level, nature and, indeed frequency, of the charges. Therefore, I am deeply uneasy about the amendments, which seem to confirm that their Lordships had too little care—as we have had in this House, I am ashamed to say—about the open-endedness of the Bill. This is a serious and difficult matter.

Let me revert for a moment to the grant and variation of licences. I am not clear what the variation of a licence would entail. Would it mean that an individual holding a licence would be entitled to perform his functions in some areas, but not in others? Would he be entitled to perform his function in events of a certain size? Those things matter. If the Secretary of State is to be empowered to vary people's licences, will that entail charging for a variation, or will people be able to apply for a variation of licence without an additional charge? Once they have bought their licence in the first place, will they be allowed to vary it without charge? Again, I do not believe that the Secretary of State or the Minister knows. I would be interested to hear what the Minister has to say.

The amendments merely compound my difficulty with the Bill.

Mr. Lansley: I have listened with considerable interest to the debate, and looked with care at this group of amendments. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) has been at pains—and not always within order—to ask whether hon. Members who are intervening support the Bill. For my part, I am happy to concur with the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne

(Mr. Waterson). I have no reason to oppose the Bill, but we are debating a group of amendments and I urge my hon. Friends and, indeed, Labour Members, to look with care at each of the amendments. I hope to explain why. I shall argue that, of the four amendments with which we are presented—Nos 1, 2, 3 and 4—we should agree with amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 4 but disagree to amendment No. 3. When the time comes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope to seek your guidance about how we might pursue that route.

Let me explain why I take that view. We are dealing with the issue of fees, but in two respects: first, fees for the grant or variation of a licence—amendments Nos. 1 and 2 relate to that—and, secondly, fees for attendance at courses; there we come to amendments Nos. 3 and 4.

Amendment Nos. 1 and 2 are necessary. In that respect, I agree, as my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne agreed, with the view of the Delegated Powers and Deregulation Committee. It is right that, under the structure of clause 10 as presented to another place, the charging of fees for the grant or variation of a licence could have been determined by a body or bodies established or recognised by the Secretary of State, but not directly on the basis determined by the Secretary of State.

It is therefore right to reconstruct the clause by way of amendments Nos. 1 and 2 so that the provision in relation to fees for the granting or variation of a licence is not simply one of those matters to be determined after the granting of powers to bodies established by the Secretary of State. Where fees are concerned, there should be determination by the Secretary of State herself. I am happy with that. I shall not dwell on the considerable questions relating to the granting or variation of a licence, which have been touched on by my hon. Friends. I am simply concerned with whether the basis of determination of fees for the granting or variation of a licence will be the Secretary of State or some other body or bodies.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 4 bring us to rather a different point. On the face of it, it may seem that the two amendments are designed to do exactly the same thing in relation to the fees charged for attendance at courses—to reflect the argument that the provision for making fees should not be determined by bodies established or recognised by the Secretary of State but should reflect the will of the Secretary of State herself. I understand that the Select Committee carried the thought through from the previous point about the will of the Secretary of State being translated into the determination of fees by a body or bodies established or recognised by her.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend have any idea whether the Minister expects the Secretary of State to pocket the fees for the issue of licences and, if he does, does he think that the same thing will happen with fees for courses? The two things are very different, since if the providers of courses are not entitled to keep the fees, they will not provide the courses.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I made the point to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) earlier. It would be helpful if the Minister told us that where the charging of fees for the grant or variation of a licence is involved, the Secretary of State would seek to recover only the costs incurred by the Department in providing the service of granting or varying a licence.

As regards fees charged for attendance at courses, it seems to me that it would not be for the Secretary of State to pocket any such fee unless she were herself to be the provider of such courses, which is contemplated under the clause. As I understand it, however, the Secretary of State has not told us to what extent she proposes to be a training provider in this context.

For my part—I shall not dwell on the point at length—it seems wholly undesirable that the Secretary of State should be the training provider. The thrust of policy under the previous Administration, which I hope will not be deviated from, was that training should be private sector-led and private sector-provided rather than being provided directly by Government Departments. My hon. Friend made a useful and interesting point and I hope that I have answered him to his satisfaction. However, he has taken me slightly from my train of thought and I should recover it.

I was referring to the Delegated Powers and Deregulation Committee, which in this instance carried through the logic of the point made about the setting of fees by the Secretary of State: the Committee applied exactly the same argument to the setting of fees by the Secretary of State in relation to charging for attendance at courses. However, in that context, I do not think that the Committee was taking a view on the substance of the issue of whether the Secretary of State should set fees for the charging of attendance at courses. It was simply considering the procedural question whether, if such fees are to be set, they should be set by reference to the determination of the Secretary of State, or whether a body or bodies established by the Secretary of State and recognised for this purpose should be allowed to set fees wholly without regard to the determination that the Secretary of State would make in the same respect.

Here I must depart from the view that has been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne, even though my admiration for him knows no bounds. Although the Select Committee examined carefully the structure of the clause and—in a procedural sense relating to the structure of powers—made a sensible amendment, it is open to us, in examining amendments Nos. 3 and 4, to reach a different view on the substance of the issue, which is the question whether the Secretary of State should set a structure of fees for charging for attendance at courses.

That brings me back to my reasons for opposing amendment No. 3 while agreeing with No. 4: By doing so, we shall delete from subsection (5) the provision that the Secretary of State should make provision about matters relating to fees. That will delete that provision in substance from the policy of the Bill, as it were, and by disagreeing with the Lords in amendment No. 3 we shall not reintroduce the power for the Secretary of State to make provision for fees. I hope that it is clear to my hon. Friends why I propose that we should go down that path.

That brings me to the substance of the issue. I am sorry that I have had to explain the process of my thinking about these amendments in such an elaborate way. When amendments are grouped, it is not always easy to explain why one opposes one and accepts others.

I shall explain my view on the substance of the issue. The presumption—I say this from my experience with chambers of commerce, which were often training providers and participated fully in the establishment of training and enterprise councils—that lay behind the reform of training provision was that such provision was best provided by the private sector, and in a way that operated in a competitive and market-oriented fashion. I shall not dwell on the theory of that. I know that it is fully understood on the Opposition Benches. It may not be well understand on the Government Benches, but I understood that, in terms of training policy at least, the Government were not seeking substantially to depart from that which has been established.

I find it odd that the structure of the Bill should look to intervene in a market-oriented system of training provision by setting a structure of fees, or providing for the Secretary of State the power to set a structure of fees. That seems an odd way of proceeding in the absence of any assessment, as far as I am aware, of the character of the marketplace in which the Secretary of State will be intervening.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst made an important point in that respect. The number of people seeking training and the number of people providing training is of the essence. If the numbers are small, there may be a debate about whether it is right to have a managed market in the short run. If the market is to operate effectively, it must be one in which a substantial number of providers compete among themselves. I understand that, in that marketplace, there is no reason, in time—if not at the outset—why the number of trainers will not be perfectly adequate for a training market to be established.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend have any idea whether the Secretary of State wants a substantial number of licensed people—in which case one would imagine that she would intervene to keep the price of training as low as possible—or whether this is a back-door attempt to remove fireworks altogether, in which case, presumably, she would intervene to keep the price at a level which would discourage people from taking training at all?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend slightly anticipates my next argument, although not unhelpfully. The Secretary of State might set the fee at a relatively low level, with the intention of seeking to encourage large numbers of persons to seek training to undertake activities with fireworks in a safe manner. By doing that, she might well inhibit the development of a market for training because the training providers might find that they did not have sufficient recompense for their training activity.

There lies the difficulty of any Government or public body trying to intervene to manage the market in favour of a particular outcome. They often do not deliver the benefits sought. My hon. Friend may be right. The Secretary of State may set the fees at a low level to attract unskilled users of fireworks and make them skilled users of fireworks. In the process, she may set the fees at a level that brings in few good training providers. Frankly, she may bring into the marketplace providers at a level of fees that does not encourage them to provide training of the quality that is required to meet the underlying objective.

Mr. Paterson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the real source of knowledge on fireworks is those who manufacture fireworks? Does he think that we could have an unhealthy collusion between those who manufacture fireworks and the Secretary of State in deciding fees and setting up training establishments?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend makes an interesting and useful point. I suspect that he is right, and a significant part of the training that is to be provided—if it is to be provided in a market manner—will be provided at the instigation of manufacturers and in relation to their products.

Mrs. Gilroy: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could name some of the manufacturers he thinks may enter into collusion. My understanding is that there are very few manufacturers left in this country, and that it is mostly a matter of importation.

Mr. Lansley: Heavens, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I certainly did not say that I thought that any manufacturer would collude or enter into collusive agreement. My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) was talking about that. My point is, in a sense, quite the opposite.

I am perfectly sanguine about the possibility that manufacturers may provide training. I am perfectly happy that, in a training market, one of manufacturers' objectives is to try to promote the use of their product. I have no difficulty with that. I see no reason why the supporters of the Bill should have a difficulty with that, so long as the licensing process is designed to ensure quality and safety in the provision, supply and use of the product.

In a relatively robust marketplace with low barriers to entry, if manufacturers seek by collusion or by abuse of a dominant position—[Interruption.] The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs and I have spent many happy hours debating the Competition Bill. He will know exactly what I mean by abuse of a dominant position. If manufacturers seek to do that in a relatively healthy marketplace with low barriers to entry, there will be no difficulty. The manufacturers will be circumvented by other training providers.

Mr. Paterson: It would help if I expanded my earlier comment to include importers. I was referring to those with a commercial interest in the sale of large numbers of fireworks in this country, who may wish to work closely with the Government to the exclusion of others.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is right to remind me that I have not pursued that point. It seems to me inherently undesirable that there should be collusion either between manufacturers and importers, or between them and the Government, in setting a fees level designed to carry through some kind of distortion to the marketplace for training.

By introducing the Bill, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) and the Minister have assumed that there will not be a free market, as the licensing provision represents a barrier to entry—it is a statutorily determined monopoly on training.

Mrs. Gilroy: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, under the regulations, it is entirely possible—indeed, probable—that a wide part of the fireworks market will not be subject to training and, therefore, fees? He is straying wide of the mark.

Mr. Lansley: I thought that I was entirely in order in talking about the fees to be charged for attendance at training courses. The hon. Lady should not chide me, as I am not talking about those parts of the industry that will not be subject to fees. Perhaps she is shifting her position. The burden of my argument is that the Secretary of State should not be in the business of setting a structure of fees for attendance at courses. If she is saying that that is almost the case already, she should disagree to amendment No. 3.

Mr. Maclean: I was worried by the intervention of the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy), which went to the heart of some of the problems in the Bill and the wide-ranging way in which it is written. On fees, she said that it is possible, even probable, that the regulations may not be relevant to large sections of the industry. We have to debate the Bill and the amendment on fees, but we have no idea what regulations the Government will make, whom the regulations will cover and by what judgment the fees will be levied. The Government are asking us to buy a pig in the poke.

Mr. Lansley: My right hon. Friend makes an important point, and gives a more effective riposte to the intervention of the hon. Member for Sutton than I could. If she is minded to intervene again, perhaps she will say what scope she envisages for the licensing system for those who run training courses. The Bill seems to suggest that, for safety reasons, a large proportion of the training of those who use and handle fireworks should be covered by a licensing process. It would be helpful to have the parameters set out.

My argument, as I hope the Minister and the hon. Lady will recognise, is not about scope and how far the licensing process should go; it is about the principle—whether the Secretary of State should determine the structure of fees for training. The statutory barrier to entry set by the Secretary of State is not to limit the numbers entering the training market, but to determine quality. There is no reason why, if enough people are licensed to provide training at the appropriate standard, a fully competitive market for training in the private sector should not be established.

I see no grounds for the setting of fees, or even maximum fees. If we go down that path, there will be many distortions, deliberate or otherwise. One risk, as has been pointed out, is that, although the intention is to increase the number of people who receive training, the number of training providers could be reduced or the quality of the training could be lowered. If the fee is too low, the intended objective may be compromised, and training providers may not be able to offer high-quality courses to meet the standards that the Bill suggests.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. Friend has prompted an important line of thought. It seems, prima facie, that the providers of the best training will have an expensive capital outlay for the range that they want. If they attract a large number of people because of the quality of their training, training costs could be driven down. If the Secretary of State has declared the fee that they are allowed to charge, there will not be that beneficial effect.

Mr. Lansley: That is a good point. Many distortions might result from a fee set at different levels.

My hon. Friend reminds me of another important matter. The fee will not necessarily remain at the initial level at which it is set by the Secretary of State. If she is the price setter, training providers contemplating coming into the market will have to build in a form of risk with which they are not used to dealing. I have worked with many training providers. They have to accept commercial risk within a marketplace, which is well understood.

If I were a provider, I would set out my stall, as it were. I would know roughly the number of people requiring training and the competition, and I would set the price according to what the market would bear. My question for the Minister is this: will the Secretary of State set the price at what the market will bear and how will she determine that when there is not yet a market? Of course she will not do so, because she does not know that price and will therefore set the fee in relation to costs.

Mrs. Gilroy: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was present when I made a similar intervention on the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), but the significance of the training scheme under the Bill is that it may confer a statutory right to buy certain dangerous fireworks. Does he not think it right that a limit should be set on charges made for such a right?

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Lady questioned whether I had been here throughout the debate, and I can confirm that I have—I have left the Chamber only once, for a moment. Also, she was dealing with the wrong point. I have said that I support amendments Nos. 1 and 2, which relate to the charging of a fee for the granting of a licence or its variation. I do not dispute that point, and I do not understand why the hon. Lady should challenge me on it. Of course fees should be charged for attendance at courses People who want to be trained will go to training providers, who will charge a fee.

The question is whether the fee that is to be charged should be determined by the Secretary of State or the provider operating in the marketplace. The hon. Lady's intervention shows that she has not listened to the argument—indeed, she is not even aware of the structure of the argument. My question, which is the essence of the matter, is: will the Secretary of State set the price in a market that she is to control by judging what it will bear? Clearly, she will not do so.

It is in the nature of the beast that the Secretary of State cannot know what price the market will bear—the market has not established such a price. Therefore, she will either set the price too high so that training providers will receive a higher fee than they would if they were operating in a competitive marketplace without fees set by the Government, or she will set it too low. Short-run marginal costs are the normal basis on which Government Departments set such fees. If the fee is set on that basis, it will be below what the market will bear. Either way, there will be adverse consequences.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend is developing a powerful market-based argument. Does he agree that a further difficulty with allowing the Secretary of State to set the fees is that training providers will have to club together to hire a lobbyist to make representations to her on a matter that is clearly vital to their commercial survival?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is right. He illustrates the inherent inefficiency of trying to manage any market through Government intervention rather than market pressures alone.

If the Government set the fees, they will be either too high or too low. If they are too high, the training providers will take an excess profit—I thought that the Government did not like excess profits—and people may be deterred from seeking training. If they are too low, more people may seek training, but there will be fewer providers and they may cut corners.

I am astonished that the hon. Member for Sutton has not said that she is happy for us to disagree with the Lords in amendment No. 3, because having the Secretary of State setting the fees would only introduce inefficiencies and pose a risk that there could be manipulation for extraneous reasons: to impose a deterrent, for example. The Bill will achieve its objectives only by operating through the marketplace. We should support amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 4, but oppose amendment No. 3.

Mr. Paterson: I congratulate the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) on doing so well in the ballot and bringing her Bill so near to fruition. At 12.16 pm, it must seem tantalisingly close.

The Bill is extraordinarily ambitious. It strikes me as being like a game of consequences. I whole-heartedly concur with my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) that, in considering the fees, we need to go right back to the explanatory and financial memorandum, which gives the Secretary of State extraordinarily wide powers.

The memorandum says:

"The financial effects of the Bill will depend on the content of such regulations and cannot at this stage be predicted ... the regulations may confer power on the Secretary of State to provide training courses."

Those are extraordinarily broad—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will not allow the hon. Gentleman to go down this route. There have been other stages of the Bill at which these matters could be debated. We are now considering Lords amendments concerning the charging of fees for training, and the granting and variation of licences. The other powers have nothing to do with the amendments.

Mr. Paterson: I totally take on board your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but surely the fees are set according to the regulations, which are decided by—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is a question of taking on board not my advice but my instructions. The hon. Gentleman has had other opportunities to debate these matters. The other place has sent us these specific amendments, and we must confine ourselves to considering them.

Mr. Paterson: I will do my best to follow your instructions to the letter, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Bill requires a high level of training, in which there is no risk and no animal can be injured. That—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am trying to help the hon. Gentleman. If he will talk about fees, he will be all right—and I shall be happy.

Mr. Paterson: I will try.

I am concerned about the practical consequences of the Bill and the ability to set fees at a realistic level. I have tried in my preamble to demonstrate that the Bill is so extraordinarily ambitious that it will be beyond the powers of the Secretary of State to set satisfactory fees. As I understand it, no fireworks will be sold by anyone who has not been on a training course and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman keeps talking about the Bill. I do not want him to talk about the Bill in general terms. I do not want him to talk about any clause. He should talk only about the amendments before us. That is the difficulty in which he finds himself, and if he is unable to speak to the amendments, perhaps he will allow another hon. Member to speak. He cannot decide to go somewhere else in the Bill just because he cannot speak to the amendments.

Mr. Paterson: I apologise once again, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My concern is that the Secretary of State must set fees, but I do not see how he can do that under the Bill's requirements. He has four options. He may set fees without consultation, or he may palm the setting of them on to the industry so that it can make its own arrangements, or he may go to local authorities, or he may set up a quango. Surely, even allowing for the broadness of the Bill, the Secretary of State will not be allowed to set fees without consulting anyone.

My fear, as I said in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), is that the Secretary of State will, by working closely with the industry, distort the market in fireworks and the training of those who use them. The only people qualified to conduct training, and the only people with the space for training grounds in open areas in which there is no danger of hurting livestock, will be importers or manufacturers already involved in the industry. They have a vested interest in shutting other people out of the market, and their interest lies in setting extremely high fees. They will work with the Secretary of State to distort a market that they alone will be able to provide. That will make it difficult for new importers to enter the market or for people to set up new businesses to manufacture fireworks.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Sutton aims to stop fireworks, even though they are hugely popular on 5 November and at other celebrations. She shakes her head at that suggestion, but I fear that that will be the consequence of working with the industry. Unhealthy collusion will set up a cartel to decide how fees are set.

Mr. Collins: The Lords amendments would be even more beneficial if the word "affordable" were inserted before "fees".

Mr. Paterson: I agree entirely. The point is that the industry will want the fees not to be affordable. There will be a lock-out, with the collusion of the Secretary of State. The Bill requires good training and requires the Secretary of State to set training fees. The interest of those already established in the market lies in shutting out anyone else. There will be a smaller number of huge public displays, with safer organisation. Perhaps that is what the hon. Member for Sutton wants. I, however, favour private activity, more choice and more independence, which is precisely what the Bill would stop. It will not be in the interests of those who are established in the industry to set the fees too low.

The Secretary of State should not be involved in setting fees. I am sure that enforcement will be deputed to local government, although local government is not mentioned in the Bill. Local government already has huge burdens. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) so wisely said, there is huge variation in the characteristics of local authorities. My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale and I come from rural areas in which there is plenty of room. It would probably be cheaper to set up fireworks use training establishments in a rural area where there are country spaces in which fireworks can land without hurting anyone.

Mr. Collins: I would not want my hon. Friend to think that our debate on the amendments implies any degree of support for large-scale fireworks training courses across the Lake District national park.

Mr. Paterson: No. I am sure that my hon. Friend's sheep farmers concur and will be cheering as they listen to the radio or watch on television. It is easier to provide training—and fees would be cheaper—in the country. There will be demands for lower fees from local government. Bromley and Chislehurst is a heavily populated, built-up area which may have considerable problems. People may have to travel. They may have to go all the way to the national park at Lonsdale to find a nice wide open space to do the training, and the fees may be greater. The Secretary of State is being given powers to set fees right across the country, regardless of local circumstances. That is unworkable. If fees are to be set, there must be flexibility to work with those with the extraordinarily difficult job of enforcing the regulations.

There is no acknowledgment of how training is to be checked and enforced. In an intervention, I asked whether some security force will whiz around the country on 5 November checking that every fireworks party is being run by people who have paid the fees and been to a course with which the Secretary of State is content. That appears not to have been thought of at all. With respect to the Bill's promoter, that is not practical.

Mrs. Gilroy: Has the hon. Gentleman read the "Firework Injuries Data Year 1997" survey? It has an illustration of a girl badly defaced with the caption:

"Face by boyfriend showing off with a firework."

Boys behaving badly. What price would the hon. Gentleman put on such injuries?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already ruled that these matters are not before us at the moment.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will take your line and not take up that point. I am as concerned as anyone about injuries. I do not see that the setting of fees by the Secretary of State will reduce the number of fireworks injuries. Believing that passing a huge, blunderbuss Bill and giving the Secretary of State power to set fees and insist on training will make this hideous problem go away shows extraordinary faith. Dreadful injuries occur to a small number of people. The number involved is small compared with accidents at home or on the road. I do not believe that the problem will be washed away by giving such powers to the Secretary of State and setting fees.

Much worse, I foresee a black market in the sale of fireworks and, if necessary, in training. Fly-by-night companies will operate outside the legal domain. In contrast to what my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) sought during the Conservative years, when he worked closely with industry and sought consent, the Bill will split the consensus. It all comes back to the fact that the Secretary of State is being given far too wide powers. The powers to set fees are unrealistic and unworkable. Sadly, that will not achieve the laudable aims sought by the hon. Member for Sutton.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I shall explain why the Government support the Lords amendments and the Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy). The heart of the issue is how we can introduce a regime to provide for training that can cut the number of injuries that occur every fireworks season.

Labour Members can speak with some satisfaction in the knowledge that the action that we have taken since the general election has led to a record decrease in the number of fireworks injuries—the largest fall for 23 years. That gives us a unique position to speak with some authority; in contrast to the position of some Conservative Members and the record of the Conservative party.

We support the Lords amendments to clause 10 because they give the powers needed to ensure that display and larger fireworks are used by properly trained people. In that desire, we have the support of everyone from those representing the industry to the Confederation of British Industry, which represents all industries, to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents and organisations which represent the safety interests of the public.

Two things have come out of the debate. None of the Conservative Members who have spoken today contributed to previous debates. Perhaps that is why they are so ill-informed. The speech made by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) beggared belief. He stated that everyone who sells or uses fireworks will have to pay some sort of licence fee. In fact, the vast majority of fireworks sold will not be subject to the Bill, and nor will people who let off fireworks in back gardens or anywhere else.

Mr. Rowe: Will the Minister give way?

12.30 pm

Mr. Griffiths: No. The hon. Gentleman also made a grave error; he belittled the number of injuries and compared them unfavourably with deaths in other sectors as if a large number of deaths in one sector means that we should not pay attention to the deaths and, more important, injuries from fireworks.

Mr. Rowe: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Griffiths: No. The hon. Gentleman had a chance to participate in previous debates on this issue and he failed to do so.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you confirm that it is not relevant whether a Member has participated previously? This debate is free standing. If the Minister is too afraid to give way to take proper questions from the Chamber, that is a matter for him, but it is nothing to do with an hon. Member's previous participation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I can also confirm that that is not a point of order for the Chair. It is entirely up to the Minister to decide whether to give way to another hon. Member.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not normal that, if a Front Bencher misinterprets something that an hon. Member says, he should give way to have it explained?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a normal point of order, either.

Mr. Griffiths: There was no misinterpretation of what the hon. Member said.

I come to my second point, which relates to fees. We are giving the Secretary of State the back-up power to set fees if there is not agreement on them by those who run the courses. There are two sets of fees. First, there are fees for licensing. It is interesting that Opposition Members now say that those who are licensed should set their fees. I did not notice them advance that argument for taxi drivers, publicans, builders or developers. That is a red herring. The second set of fees is course fees. Everyone in the House of Commons agrees that, if agreement can be reached on course fees, that is fine. We want a lot of providers to come forward and run courses. If a number of people are running courses, it is likely that the level of fees will reflect the market. That is what we all hope for, and it is exactly what is in the Bill.

What the other place has wisely suggested in its amendments, and in backing up the essence of clause 10, is that, if there is not agreement on fees or, if someone should, as hon. Members have suggested, have a monopoly of the market, the Secretary of State should have the backstop powers to set the fees herself.

Mr. Maclean: I merely wish to take the Minister up on his statement that the fees charged by companies will reflect the level of the market and that that is in the Bill. I cannot see what provision he has made in the Bill to ensure that the fees he will set will reflect costs or the market.

Mr. Griffiths: The right hon. Gentleman was not listening carefully to what I said, but that is hardly surprising. If several people provide courses, they will set the fees. As for the level at which fees should be set, it was made clear in the evidence that the other place took from Mr. Mason—and repeated by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) as a general principle of government—that the fees should reflect the general costs incurred and not higher costs, and should not be intended to produce a profit. I wholly endorse that principle. I hope that the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) is reassured on that point.

Mr. Lansley: My point was made in relation to the costs incurred by the Secretary of State in granting or varying a licence. Where fees for attendance at a training course are involved, they can be set by the market. It would be helpful if the Minister explained in what circumstances he thinks the Secretary of State would or would not intervene to set fees that were different from those determined by the market in the normal way.

Mr. Griffiths: If there was one provider of training courses and a complaint was made that it had a monopoly on provision and that the fees it charged were unfair, my right hon. Friend might well hear representations on the matter and, after discussions, seek to make alterations. However, I do not believe that those circumstances will arise, because several groups—people who have taken a great interest in the industry over many years—are already interested in running courses. One is the CBI explosives industry group, which has considerable knowledge of the subject and is especially keen to develop and run a training course. Other organisations might also want to run training courses, but if they are to be able to do so and to set the fees that we have debated today, we have to pass the Bill.

I am sorry to say that the worst sort of filibuster appears to be going on. The British Pyrotechnists Association has been following our proceedings today; it was so concerned about the delays and filibustering that it took the opportunity offered by the private notice question to send a letter to me deploring the attempt being made by the Opposition—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister himself is now in danger of going outside the scope of the Lords amendment that we are discussing.

Mr. Griffiths: The letter makes it clear that, in the Lords amendments and in accepting the need for fees, the BPA is able and willing to run training courses and wants the Bill to be passed quickly. The letter is signed not only by the chairman of the BPA, but by members of the CBI explosives industry group.

This morning, we have heard hon. Members who do not know the scope of the Bill and who do not care that the current arrangements mean that there is a higher than necessary number of injuries. I invite the House to accept the Lords amendments and the whole Bill, because it has the support of the whole country, with the exception of the Conservative party.

Mr. Waterson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes, even though the hon. Gentleman has not been in the Chamber for substantial parts of the debate.

Mr. Waterson: That is wholly untrue, as was the Minister's previous assertion. As he spent much of my speech chuntering under his breath instead of listening to what I had to say, he probably did not hear me wish the Bill a fair wind—

Mr. Forth: Oh!

Mr. Waterson: I said that the official Opposition would not be voting against the Bill. Does the Minister remember my saying that?

Mr. Griffiths: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not hear the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) saying, "Oh!" and groaning when the hon. Gentleman said that he wished the Bill a fair wind. It is the right hon. Gentleman who speaks for the real Conservatives, not the hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench—and that is the problem.

The House should accept the Government's view that the Lords amendment is acceptable and reject all the arguments against it made by Conservative Members because our record on this matter does us a great deal of credit. The record of certain Conservative Members does not do them credit.

Mr. Leigh: Why?

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman asks why. When he was at the Dispatch Box doing this job between 1990 and 1993, the number of people injured by fireworks rose by 46.3 per cent., which means that up to an extra 335 people ended up in hospital because of his incompetent handling of his brief. I ask the House to accept the amendment, because our record of stewardship on the matter has shown a dramatic decline in the number of fireworks injuries and we want to ensure that the trend continues.

Mr. Lansley: The Minister is not responding to the carefully argued points made on the amendments. As he knows, I said that I was perfectly happy to support the Bill and, indeed, most of the amendments, but not the one relating to charging fees for training. The Minister is not responding to that argument, which is the subject of the debate.

Mr. Griffiths: I am not accepting the hon. Gentleman's rejection of the amendment, because it would hobble the Bill and ensure that there was an unworkable regime because of the innate hostility to fees. I am sorry that he has taken part in the filibustering.

Mr. Leigh: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Griffiths: As I have mentioned the hon. Gentleman, I shall. Perhaps he would like to apologise to the House and the country for his stewardship on this issue.

Mr. Leigh: The point that the Minister made, which attacked me personally, was outrageous rubbish. He virtually said that I rape nuns and eat babies and that I was personally responsible for people dying because of fireworks injuries. That is an outrageous suggestion, and he should withdraw it. The Minister should reply to the serious concerns that we have raised in the debate. If he thinks the amendment so important, why did he not include it in the Bill in the first place?

Mr. Griffiths: One of the great advantages of a parliamentary democracy is that one listens to the informed views of others. We listened to the views on the amendment. It will improve the Bill, and we accept it for that reason. I fear that Conservative Members who have contributed to the debate and not taken the opportunity to contribute to the constructive framing of the Bill will succeed only in talking it out, which would deprive us of a valuable tool further to tackle fireworks injuries. I commend the amendment and the Bill.

Mr. Maclean: As the last Opposition Member to speak on the amendment, I want to say a few words. In view of the Minister's provocative attacks on some of my hon. Friends, I could be tempted to speak longer than my wont, but I shall keep my remarks relatively brief.

The Minister made a general attack, suggesting that some of my hon. Friends did not fully understand the Bill's scope. No one can understand its full extent because, in almost every clause, the Minister has taken to himself general powers to make regulations on any matter under the sun, including fees. I regret that the Minister did not confine his remarks to the amendments before us or deal with the particular questions raised by my hon. Friends.

I wish to make another point absolutely clear. It is some time since I was on the Front Bench. What my Front-Bench colleagues in the official Opposition think of the Bill is their concern. I speak individually, and the Lords amendments trouble me. The other place was no doubt concerned to build more safeguards into the Bill, and probably considered the amendments to be safeguards. I am troubled by them because they seem to arise from a misunderstanding of what the Government have the power to do sensibly and wisely. Governments often make the great mistake of believing that they can read the market and fix a price that the market will bear. The Government will have great difficulty in making a judgment on what fees should be charged for training.

The amendment contains no criteria for the level of fees, so the other place has not been up to its usual drafting standard. It has sent us an amendment giving the Secretary of State the power to set fees, but it has not done what it usually does—set criteria by which the

[Mr. Maclean]

Secretary of State may come to a conclusion on the fee to be set. If the criterion is the average or maximum price that the market will bear, or the level that would enable all the high-quality training that the Bill envisages to be carried out, that would give us some guidance on the level of fees that the Secretary of State has in mind and the criteria that she and her officials would use when determining the price to be fixed.

When one reads the Bill, one sees the quality of training that must be given and the proficiency required. Training fees are referred to in clause 10, but they relate to every part of the Bill where training is stipulated. It is also stipulated in clause 5, under which people must show that they are proficient and qualified. I presume, therefore, that it is not merely a matter of the Secretary of State fixing fees in accordance with the cheapest course on the market.

I have experience—admittedly, many years ago—of training in industry. We would have had incredible difficulty had the then Government fixed the fees for the training courses that we provided. If I thought that the Government were fixing the fees, I would lay on the gold-plated, six-week residential course. When companies paid the fees themselves, we started with a five-day course and whittled it down to a two-day or highly intensive 10-hour course, and the fee structure was radically different.

Obviously, the Secretary of State will not want to set the fees prohibitively high. She will set them at a level of full cost recovery, as I presume that her administrative costs must also be added to the fees collected. If so, there will be a Government charge for administering the fee structure, and the Secretary of State will then pick a level of fees that she considers reasonable. If it were not reasonable, it would be subject to judicial review, but what is reasonable in terms of the Bill? If it came to judicial review, their Lordships would have to study all the requirements in the Bill and the quality standards that have been set. I shall not go down the route of discussing quality standards, because that would be outside the scope of the amendment. Nevertheless, the fees that the Secretary of State sets must take into account what people are supposed to know and prove that they are proficient in, under clause 5.

When one looks at the regulations that the Secretary of State has the power to make and the classes of people to whom they can apply, one assumes that only big organisations laying on big, commercial firework displays will be affected. However, according to my reading of the Bill, the Secretary of State has the power to make regulations stipulating that training may apply to anyone who lets off fireworks, even in small village displays. The Bill does not exempt those people.

Mr. Maclean: The Minister shakes his head as if to say, "Oh no, we won't go that far. We are only trying to catch the big events organised by municipalities. We don't intend to go after the little fellow who has bought some fireworks to set off for his children." On the other hand, if the Minister is to be as successful as everyone wants him to be in reducing the number of accidents and injuries resulting from fireworks, should he not acknowledge that most of those injuries occur because some individuals behave stupidly with fireworks, not because big organised public displays go wrong?

I return to the fees issue. If the Minister wants to meet his safety objectives in the Bill, he must encompass in the training courses a range of people—not only the big Brocks, ICIs and CBIs of this world. He must get the training courses to the small punters who lay on little bonfire displays, and let off fireworks, on every village green. If those people are not caught by the training requirement, there is not much point in the training provisions, because such small displays probably make up the majority of firework displays in the country and, probably, the majority of accidents happen at small firework displays—but I shall happily be corrected.

If those one-off punters who have some fireworks on bonfire night are to be trained and fees are to be set, what sort of training courses will be necessary for them, and what level of fees will they be charged? The Minister has given us no hint of the criteria that he will apply when setting fees. I believe that he tried to argue that he would base the fee level entirely on market forces. I do not know how a Government Department can make a judgment on the right level of fees. Will it choose the average price in the market? Alternatively, will it choose the price that the market will bear, and how will it do so?

I had hoped that the Minister would categorically rule out using the fee mechanism to produce further policing. Some of my colleagues hinted that it could be done. The Bill would allow the Minister to do so because it does not set criteria to tie his judgment in setting the level of fees. The Minister did not answer my hon. Friends' argument that he could use the pricing mechanism to fund adequately only the gold-plated courses, forcing others out of the market. If he introduced regulations to outlaw firework displays by the little punters, he could force through the complete municipalisation—indeed, almost nationalisation—of firework displays.

It may be the view in some quarters that the only fireworks that people should be allowed to see are those that are laid on by big organisations and councils. That aspect of the Bill worries me, because it means that it can be used to get at individuals who want to set off fireworks themselves. I deplore all those foolish individuals who do not use fireworks safely; I wish that the Bill had been a small Bill, dealing exclusively with tightening safety rules relating to children, especially sales to children. However, the Minister has in the Bill a huge blunderbuss measure, with lots of powers in every clause. In my view, the power that he is taking for the Government to set fees will do nothing to reduce accidents.

The Minister may say that training will reduce accidents. It could do so if the right people were trained—which they may not be—but I do not, for the life of me, understand how giving the Minister the power to set fees will help to reduce accidents. The fees to be set by future Ministers are irrelevant to the safety arguments that the Minister put.

The Minister ranged widely in his speech and made some blatantly political points. I shall not take that route: I confine my remarks to the Lords amendment. The Minister has not dealt with the points raised, including the point that I and my hon. Friends have made that the level of fees set by the Minister does not enhance the safety case one iota.

I regret that the Minister replied as he did, and that he did not specifically address any of the points raised by my hon. Friends. On Fridays, when we debate private Members' business, my hon. Friends have a perfect right to scrutinise legislation. The Lords amendments have not previously been seen. It is irrelevant for the Minister to say that some hon. Members present have not participated in earlier debates on the Bill. None of us had seen the Lords amendments relating to fees previously, and it is valid for any of us to participate in that argument today.

I hope that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy), who will probably reply briefly, will pick up some of the points raised by my hon. Friends. I am still disturbed not just by large parts of the Bill, but by the suggestion that the Government must set the level of fees because that will somehow improve safety, and lead to fewer accidents and fewer children being blinded. That is nonsense. No one wants to see children blinded or fools messing about with fireworks, but there is nothing in the Bill that will prevent people from misbehaving badly with fireworks—in the same way that no legislation can stop footballers misbehaving badly on the pitch.

The Minister is trying to create the false argument that, if hon. Members do not vote for the Bill, it will result in many more accidents involving young people. If the Minister wanted to reduce the number of fireworks accidents involving young people, he should have introduced a measure that was specifically targeted at that objective rather than introducing Henry VIII powers regarding regulations for everything under the sun, including training courses and fee setting by the Government.

Mrs. Gilroy: Before turning to the amendments, I point out to the House that my Bill was considered carefully by the House of Lords Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Deregulation, in addition to being debated in another place and in Standing Committee. Opposition Members have expressed concern about not having had an opportunity to scrutinise the Bill. However, we welcomed the contribution by the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) and accepted an amendment. That showed, from an early stage, that we were prepared to take account of points raised by hon. Members in an attempt to improve the Bill.

Mr. Leigh: Is this the hon. Lady's Bill or was it given to her by the Government?

Mrs. Gilroy: Hon. Members may know that I am the first member of the Institute of Trading Standards Administration to be elected to the House, and I have taken a great interest in issues to do with consumer protection and safety.

We have also received assistance from the Confederation of British Industry explosives industry group and the British Pyrotechnists Association. It is clear from the communication that my hon. Friend the Minister received, and to which he referred earlier, that those organisations do not object to the fee-making powers in the amendments.

Amendment Nos. 1 to 4 are related, and I shall discuss them together. They relate to clause 10 of my Bill, which includes powers to make provision for, among other things, fees for the grant or variation of licences for training providers and for attendance at training courses. My Bill currently provides for either the Secretary of State or any body or bodies established or recognised by the Secretary of State to make provision for such fees.

The amendments were prompted by concerns expressed by the Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Deregulation—I should have thought that Opposition Members would have more respect for such a body—when it considered very fully the various regulation-making provisions in my Bill. The Select Committee was concerned to ensure that fee setting remained within the control of the Secretary of State. In paragraphs 13 and 14 of its report—which I imagine that Opposition Members have considered fully—the Select Committee expressed the view that fees should either be approved by the Secretary of State or be subject to a limit specified in the regulations.

Mr. James Paice (South–East Cambridgeshire): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gilroy: No, I want to make progress. There is much more to be debated in the Bill, and hon. Members are waiting to consider other legislation.

The report also suggested that the Lords might consider whether a suitable ministerial undertaking would be satisfactory. In the Select Committee's view, that would have been sufficient. In any event, the Lords decided that the issue would be dealt with better by amendment.

The amendments to clause 10 will, therefore, ensure that only the Secretary of State will be able to make provision regarding fees for training licences and fees for attendance at training courses. That would also provide a means of ensuring that fees were not set at excessive levels.

Mr. Paice: I am very grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) should make it clear when she is refusing to take an intervention. I understand that she has completed her speech.

Mrs. Gilroy: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not notice the hon. Member for South–East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) attempting to get in. I was in the course of my last sentence, so I was concentrating on finishing.

Mr. Paice: In that case, I would like to speak for a moment.

The Minister is right. I have only just come in, but the point that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) is making goes close to a matter of great interest to me—training. Having run a private sector training company for years before I came into the House, and having been privileged to be the Minister with responsibility for training, I do not know of any other situation where the Minister is given the power to set the fees for attending a training course.

[Mr. Paice]

There are many other examples, including pesticides—the issue that the next Bill is about—driving forklift trucks and driving heavy goods vehicles, where the requirement is for training, rightly, but there is no example, to my knowledge, where the Minister is given such a power. That is why I was seeking to intervene on the hon. Member for Sutton. I wanted to ask whether she could name another piece of legislation in which the Government take on themselves the setting of fees for training courses.

I do not believe that there is any such example. It is a pity that the hon. Lady was not able to give way. Obviously, if she can come back and cite an example, I would be delighted, but, given that Labour says that it understands for the first time how industry and commerce work, I cannot imagine how it could possibly put into legislation the power for a Minister to set training course fees. Unless the hon. Lady or the Minister can give an example of legislation that gives that power to a Minister, I cannot see how the amendment can be acceptable.

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Question accordingly agreed to

Lords amendment agreed to.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. For the sake of clarification, am I right to believe that you are grouping together two amendments that relate to two different clauses—clauses 5 and 7—and then, in a different grouping, two amendments, Nos. 6 and 8, that relate to a clause and a schedule? Does that complicate matters or is it how it should be?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Madam Speaker has made the selection, which is perfectly in order. It is quite common practice that if amendments applying to different clauses and schedules are seen to be pertinent and relevant, they will be taken together. There is nothing wrong with that.

Clause 14

PROHIBITION OF SUPPLY ETC. OF OTHER EXPLOSIVES.

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 8, line 6, leave out—("under this section") and insert ("by virtue of this subsection").

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mrs. Gilroy.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 7.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): I do not wish to detain the House because, like my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), I am broadly sympathetic to the Bill and I want to see that it has a fair wind. I wish to speak to amendment No. 7, which creates something of a hurdle to the regulations that the Secretary of State might make under clauses 1(2) and 14(3). For the purposes of brevity, I will confine my remarks to regulations that might be made under clause 1(2).

As drafted, clause 1(2) contains a major deficiency, which raises a serious issue. It says:

"The Secretary of State may by regulations amend subsection (1)."

Subsection (1) is the heart of the Bill, as it contains the definition of fireworks. Subsection (1)(b) defines fireworks as devices that "would be fireworks for those purposes if they were intended as a form of entertainment."

That gives some suggestion of how incredibly broad the definition is. It has nothing to do with the nature and properties of what one might consider to be a firework, but relates only to how the device might be used. It is not surprising, therefore, that it was decided that that broad definition should be amended. Without the amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may have misunderstood the narrowness of the amendment to which he purports to speak. The amendment relates entirely to whether the regulations should be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. He may address the House only on that matter.

1.15 pm

Mr. Jenkin: I certainly agree with that ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The purpose of the amendment is to determine whether such regulations should be approved by affirmative resolution of both Houses. The amendment relates to a serious deficiency in the Bill. It used to be a principle that one could not amend primary legislation by means of secondary legislation. As drafted, the Bill means not only that primary legislation can be amended by secondary legislation, but that that can be done under the negative resolution procedure. A Minister will be able to propose a regulation, lay it on the Table and, 40 days later—with no reference to the House except for the rather ineffectual praying procedure that exists for negative resolutions—amend an Act of Parliament. Moreover, in this case, he will be able to amend the clause that goes to the very heart of the Bill.

I believe that we should support the amendment, but I make the fundamental point that even the positive resolution procedure, which requires the assent of both Houses of Parliament, is an inadequate protection for legislation that has gone through all stages in both Houses. We should not fall into the habit of framing legislation so that it can be fundamentally amended, even with the consent of both Houses. We should support the amendment, but the Bill is inadequately protected and deeply flawed, which explains why Lord Renton of Mount Harry said that it was the most extraordinary piece of legislation that he had come across in all his years in the law and in politics.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I support amendment No. 7, which I hope is acceptable to the Bill's promoter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) has already indicated that she supports the amendment.

Mr. Nicholls: I am grateful to you for drawing that to my attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) said, unless the amendment is agreed to, the Bill will be deficient; we will be unable to scrutinise it, as we will not know what the end result will be.

There have been a number of cases in which definitions in legislation have not been tightened up, with most extraordinary results. The amendment will in no way thwart the intentions of those who want the Bill to be enacted, but it will ensure that when the Minister has provisionally taken a decision and taken appropriate action, Parliament can consider that decision—albeit after it has been made—and say whether it is a good idea.

Finally it would have been a great deal better—this is an important point, which I want to place on record—if the principle that we could scrutinise what we are being asked to pass had been built into the Bill in its entirety, instead of a lot of mechanisms that mean that we do not know what its final shape will be. It is sad—I state it no more strongly than that—that when my hon. Friends have tried to point that out over and over again, they have for some reason been misunderstood not only by the promoter of the Bill but by the Minister, which says something about the Government's attitude to such legislation.

Mr. Maclean: Amendment No. 7, which was made in another place, states:

"Regulations under section 1(2) or 14(3) shall not be made unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing them has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House."

To discuss sensibly whether the affirmative or the negative procedure should be used, one must look at those parts of the Bill. Clause 14(3) states:

"The Secretary of State may by regulations amend subsection (2)"—

of section 14. Clause 14(2) states:

"In this section 'explosives' has the same meaning as in the Explosives Act 1875."

The amendment also states that the affirmative procedure should be used in respect of amendments made to clause 1(2). Clause 1 states:

"In this Act 'fireworks' means devices", and goes on to describe fireworks. Clause 1(2) states:

"The Secretary of State may by regulations amend subsection (1)."

From the tortuous way in which the Bill is written, I conclude that, if we accept the amendment, the powers that the Secretary of State has taken in the Bill to amend the meaning of a firework and an explosive in the fireworks and explosives Acts will be subject to affirmative resolution. I sincerely believe that we must accept it, as it is a tiny safeguard against the draconian powers that the Secretary of State has taken.

It is totally wrong that we should be in this situation in the first place, and that the Secretary of State should be able to take powers by regulation—just one of the many thousand regulations that she can make under the Bill. She has taken unto herself powers to amend the Acts defining fireworks and explosives. Thankfully, the other place has done its little bit to tighten up those draconian powers by stating that a draft must be laid before each House and approved by affirmative resolution.

Affirmative resolution must be the bare minimum if the Secretary of State is to have such powers. It would be extraordinary if regulations that amend the fireworks and explosives Acts could be passed through the negative procedure in this House. I am not sure of the extent of the Explosives Act. It is an important measure, but I think that it merely defines explosives—whether they are shotgun cartridges, smoke cartridges or mountain rescue flares. Obviously, the definition includes large pyrotechnics, explosives, military explosives and so forth.

That measure was enacted in 1875. People accept that pyrotechnics and explosives change from time to time. New ones are invented—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened with patience to the right hon. Gentleman, but I must remind him that the amendment to which he is speaking concerns whether regulations made under clauses 1(2) or 14(3) should be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure—that point, and that point only.

Mr. Maclean: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall concentrate on that. I was trying to make the point—I apologise if I did not make it clearly enough—that regulations may be a sensible way of dealing with changes in fireworks technology or—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no point in the right hon. Gentleman repeating his error.

Mr. Maclean: Their Lordships have said that the affirmative procedure would be better, and I believe that it is absolutely essential.

The director of consumer safety and standards, Mr. Peter Mason, said:

"The degree of distress and anxiety that would justify ministers coming to Parliament, even under a negative resolution procedure, to justify some of the actions that we have talked about, would have to be pretty extensive. What we have been anxious to do is to make clear that we can take into account various factors which are not available to us under the 1987 Act. It is certainly not the intention that these powers should be exercised for trivial reasons. In fact, I think that although subsection (2)(a) gives the vires for the regulations, one also has to pay attention to the political realities. We would have to be able to defend what we were doing through the consultation process, through Parliament's scrutiny processes and ultimately the negative resolution procedure. I do not think there is anything further I can say on that ... I would say about the negative resolution procedure that we have a lot of experience of making resolutions under the 1987 Act, using this procedure. It is certainly one that I regard as being effective in so far as we know that the stuff that we write is subject to review, it is capable of being prayed against ... I do not regard that negative resolution procedure as being in any way an ineffective constraint."

That is Mr. Peter Mason's view, not mine. We all know that the Government are embarked on a lot of legislation that contains order-making powers, the vast majority under the negative resolution procedure. It would be a disservice to the House, and to an industry that legitimately manufactures explosives for use by the military, and fireworks for the enjoyment of millions of people, if the principal Acts were suddenly amended by Ministers through the negative resolution procedure.

No matter what we all may say publicly about the wonderful scrutiny that we give matters in the House, the scrutiny that Committees give even to changes made by affirmative resolution is not what it used to be, and not what many of us would like it to be. The negative procedure allows a huge amount of important legislation to be enacted, and I found it extremely convenient when I was a Minister. I jumped at any chance to use it, because—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman must not enter into a general discussion of two forms of procedure. The question is whether these specific regulations should be subject to affirmative resolution.

Mr. Maclean: My specific point is that the other place has determined that we should use the affirmative resolution procedure. The only general point that I was making was that the House sometimes does not give enough scrutiny to other legislation and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is exceeding the bounds. For the second time, he has repeated a matter for which I have already reproved him. I shall be forced to look at the Standing Orders if he persists.

1.30 pm

Mr. Maclean: I have no intention of persisting, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to have misunderstood your ruling, and I will comply with it entirely. I was coming to the end of my remarks.

Although the other amendments are of concern, amendment No. 5 provides an essential safeguard. The House still has an important part to play in the conduct of national affairs, even if that role is declining. We can take powers to make sure that legislation is scrutinised properly, and affirmative resolution is the right way to do that for the powers in an enormously draconian Bill. The other place has done a service to Parliament and to the people of the United Kingdom by insisting that we use that procedure.

Mr. Forth: In following the perceptive remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), I am drawn to the fact that clauses 14 and 16 include powers on the prohibition and supply of explosives other than fireworks as well as fireworks themselves. There is an important distinction between fireworks and explosives, as my right hon. Friend said. Amendments Nos. 5 and 7 relate to key clauses in the Bill, to which clauses 14 and 16 refer explicitly. Amendment No. 7 also refers directly to clauses 1(2) and 14(3). Our debate, therefore, is about the definition of fireworks under primary legislation, and about explosives.

The arcane wording of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can assist the right hon. Gentleman. If he thinks that he may have found a way to discuss the wider issues to which he has referred, let me tell him that amendment No. 5 is a drafting amendment, and there can be only the narrowest of debates on it. Amendment No. 7, as I have already reminded the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), relates specifically to whether regulations to be made under specified clauses should be subject to affirmative resolution procedure. Both points are very narrow.

Mr. Forth: Indeed they are, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That makes them all the more interesting and relevant. They may have specific effects on businesses that supply fireworks or explosives, and on those who enjoy fireworks or who use explosives for legitimate reasons. The wording of amendment No. 5 is narrow, substituting

"by virtue of this subsection"

"under this section".

The form of words is somewhat obscure, but it certainly refers to explosives and fireworks, and to regulation making. I can understand why my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border concentrated on amendment No. 7, which refers to clause 16.

We are in important territory here, which is not to say that the wording of previous amendments was not of importance. All words in every Bill are of crucial importance. When a Bill reaches the statute book, its words have legislative effect on every individual in the country. They can affect businesses and employment. Every word of this highly regulatory Bill has the potential—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. By his own words, the right hon. Gentleman is extending his remarks well beyond the scope of the amendment. I must remind him to confine his remarks to the narrow amendment No. 7, to which he says he is speaking and which is about the affirmative resolution procedure—that, and that alone.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. We are discussing the extent to which the House agrees with the Lords. In making alterations to primary legislation, should Ministers be able to do it simply by regulation, as originally suggested—or, as has usefully been suggested in amendment No. 7, should we provide that "Regulations . . . shall not be made unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing them has been . . . approved by a resolution of each House."?

I shall return to that, but I want to remind the House that we are discussing clause 1(2), which is fundamental to the Bill and, therefore, the functioning of the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No we are not. We are talking about whether the regulations should be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure.

"Regulations under section 1(2) or 14(3)".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is experienced enough to realise that we cannot go back to the substance of the clause to which the regulations refer. The debate is simply on the mechanical question whether the affirmative resolution procedure should apply.

Mr. Forth: I would not dream of challenging what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I should have thought that what I was saying was relevant to a discussion of the importance of changing the mechanism, which I was relating back to the seriousness of the substance to which the mechanism relates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is challenging my ruling. If he wishes to continue to speak, I suggest that he confines himself to the terms of amendment No. 7.

Mr. Forth: That is helpful to me because I shall now embark on the main thrust of my remarks, which relate to amendment No. 7 and whether regulations should be made

"unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing them has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House."

That is the crucial substance of the amendment, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border rightly emphasised, which I wish to explore further.

Those of us with some passing familiarity with the proceedings of the House and the making of legislation know how crucial it is to have a mechanism to ensure that each House has a proper opportunity to consider statutory instruments, especially where they alter primary legislation, as in this case. Bills such as this, with provisions that would allow Ministers, by secondary legislation and the powers given thereby, to alter the meaning of primary legislation always cause nervousness, as you, with your long experience know, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

That is why there has been a broad welcome for amendment No. 7. The other place has given us reassurance that we welcome. If I may say so without incurring your displeasure and strictly in passing, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that yet again affirms the value of the work of the other House. I am sure that we all want to record our gratitude to it for allowing us to debate this matter and include the amendment.

The great danger was that, in its original form, the Bill did not offer us such a safeguard. We cannot know until we hear an explanation from the Minister or the Bill's promoter whether that was an oversight or whether it was deliberate. I hope that we shall be given some idea about that.

One of the difficulties of these debates has been that, for reasons known only to themselves, neither the promoter nor the Minister has chosen to explain why they are recommending, or not recommending, amendments. To some extent we are unguided in our reaction to them, because we have not yet had the privilege of such an explanation. That it obviously a matter for their judgment, but it puts us at a disadvantage, and it may be the reason why ever so occasionally we inadvertently stray from the strict material of the amendments. One would assume or hope that the understanding of the contents of the Bill is that much greater in the case of the Minister and the promoter, although I hope that they would—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am going to say now to the right hon. Gentleman and the House that I am getting very close to considering that the right hon. Gentleman's remarks fall within the terms of Standing Order No. 42. I put him on final warning. I shall ask him to resume his seat if he persists in offending against that Standing Order.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful, as ever, for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wanted to emphasise that the provisions in amendment No. 7 are of great reassurance to us because they allow at least the possibility of the House of Commons and the other place giving some consideration to the proposals that may come forward in a statutory instrument. That may not allow us to amend the substance—the procedure does not allow for that—but at least it would provide that vital safeguard that we all increasingly look for against the power of the Executive to change legislation, make regulations and so on. That is the safeguard that is contained in the amendment. It is for that reason that I welcome the amendment today and wish it fair passage.

Mr. Leigh: This has proved an interesting debate. Everyone who has spoken so far has assumed that the amendment is worth while and that, if the Minister wishes to amend the definition of a firework, that decision should be subject to an affirmative resolution of the House. Everyone seems to think that that is what we should do. That is probably right, but I am not sure that we have considered what would happen if there were an emergency, in which case the affirmative resolution route might delay the Minister in taking urgent action to protect the public.

My recollection is hazy as to whether in the past the Minister has had to act urgently. I suspect that until now we have had a fairly good system under the Explosives Act 1875 and other consumer protection legislation that has given Ministers the power to intervene quickly to ban a product or to label it in a certain way to protect the public. Those who are promoting the Bill have, for perfectly justifiable reasons, produced a Bill which, because it is wide in its scope and contains Henry VIII clauses, has prompted the other place to insist on requiring the Minister to proceed by way of the affirmative resolution procedure if he wishes to label an item as an explosive.

Those who spoke in the other place said that Ministers should not be given free rein to do what they thought fit. Everyone who has spoken in today's debate has accepted that. I can give one practical example of a case in which the delay that may be engendered by the affirmative resolution procedure could lead to unfortunate results, and in which the existing procedure, whereby the Minister can intervene quickly, is more appropriate. I hope that the Minister can reassure me on this point.

What if the fireworks industry came up with a new product which, say, used compressed gas to fire a pyrotechnic shell? That would overcome the ban imposed on aerial shells after Mr. David Hattersley, a head teacher from High Wycombe, was killed by such a device when the explosive charge that was supposed to launch the shell went off sooner than expected while he was leaning over the launch tube. Under the existing procedure, the Minister could act quite urgently in such a case. However, as in the example I have given, the industry might attempt to circumvent the individual firework ban by using technology that is just beyond the scope of the existing legislation. The industry would not cynically attempt to circumvent what Parliament or the Minister had decided, but it might do what I have described in an attempt to make a safer product. In such a case, others might want the Secretary of State to act quickly to exclude the unproven new breed of device.

1.45 pm

The Minister should be able to ban such devices, as Ministers in the past have been able to do. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and I, who have both had responsibility in this sphere, often had to act quickly to ban particular products. The first action taken by my right hon. Friend on becoming Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs was to ban a particular product. In such circumstances, we would say, "We will ban the product without having to go through the delays engendered by the affirmative resolution procedure in Parliament, but then we shall give the industry a chance to discharge its burden of proof and, in that way, we shall determine whether the product is safe." At least we could act quickly in such circumstances.

What worries me is that, because Parliament is rightly concerned about the Bill's wide-ranging powers—in a sense, that is the devil in the legislation—Parliament is circumscribing the Minister's power to act quickly when public safety is at stake. On the other hand, I can understand why my hon. Friends feel that it is necessary for Parliament to be involved through the affirmative resolution procedure. I understand and support their argument that, because the Bill is so wide-ranging, it can almost reinvent itself in the sense that it can give ever wider powers to Ministers to determine what is or is not a firework. My hon. Friends do not want to give such power to Ministers.

Mr. Jenkin: My understanding, and I might have misunderstood, is that, in the normal course of events, and unless provision is made for emergency regulations, any regulations laid on the Table cannot come into force until they have lain on the Table for 40 days. Therefore, the amendment would not engender any further delay. If my understanding is incorrect, I hope that my hon. Friend will enlighten me.

Mr. Leigh: I have tried to think through in my mind whether or not the amendment would engender further delays. My personal understanding might be wrong and my hon. Friend's right, in which case the debate will have produced a proper outcome and I shall be satisfied. I simply wish to press the point, which is worrying to me, even though I understand why, because of the nature of the Bill and the way in which it is drafted, hon. Members want these matters to be brought before Parliament and the Minister to be obliged to explain—albeit in a truncated and often unsatisfactory debate—what is or is not a firework.

In Committee, hon. Members mentioned issues such as distress flares or bird scarers. The Minister might consider a distress flare to be a firework, especially given that, some time ago, an appalling act of homicide caused by a distress flare took place on the football terraces. Whether such flares should be included in the ambit of the legislation might be precisely the sort of issue that the Minister might want to discuss with Parliament.

The other problem is that distress flares are also used to protect lives at sea and on mountainsides, and therefore play a very positive role. In the case of an appalling incident such as the one that I described, in which a hooligan used a distress flare and caused injury, there would immediately be great public pressure on the Minister to bring the product within the ambit of the Bill.

Our concern about the amendment is that Ministers will be able to act very quickly. Of course, they would want to act properly, and would not take action without advice from officials, but occasionally Ministers and officials make mistakes and Ministers are put under pressure. If there is not a time for calm reflection and the matters cannot come before Parliament, a mistake may be made. We are worried that a product may be banned and that—although that may deal with a problem such as that which I described, which engendered public pressure forcing Ministers to act—there might be unforeseen consequences.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have calmly reflected and decided that the hon. Gentleman is in danger of repeating himself.

Mr. Leigh: I shall not deal further with that particular case.

Mr. Jenkin: I may inadvertently have given the House misleading information. Having taken informal advice on statutory instruments, I understand that, unless the parent statute signifies that a statutory instrument cannot come into force immediately, a Minister may table a statutory instrument and it can come into force immediately, whether it is required to lie on the Table or requires affirmative resolution. Therefore, the amendment places no restriction on how quickly a new regulation can come into force.

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I respect his judgment, but I hope that he will forgive me if I say that I should like the Minister to confirm that point.

Mr. Jenkin: The Minister is not here.

Mr. Leigh: I do not understand why the Minister is not here, when we are discussing matters of public safety. I am not sure that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who is present, is the appropriate Minister and capable—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is very interesting and amusing, but it has nothing to do with the amendment before us.

Mr. Leigh: I understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I was intervened on.

Other matters might cause the Minister to act, such as pesticidal smoke cartridges; shotgun cartridges; magnesium blocks, which are sold to help to light fires in emergencies; Hilti guns, which fire heavy-duty bolts and nails in the construction industry; alarm mines—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying too far from the substance of the amendment, which concerns the simple question whether the affirmative resolution procedure should be used.

Mr. Leigh: I am coming to the end of my points, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In going through that list, I was showing you and the House that there may be doubt about whether or not numerous devices are fireworks, because of the nature of the explosive charges they contain. It is right that such matters come to the House to be considered properly and for the Minister to have to justify his actions.

Mr. Leigh: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It would be nice if the Minister could now reply to the debate.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): For the avoidance of doubt, the Government accept the amendments sent from the other place.

NOES

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Eric Forth and
Mr. Edward Leigh.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Mr. Colvin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In view of the fact that the Bill is largely an enabling measure, it would assist the House greatly if we knew the Government's line on the various measures in it. Is it in order for the Minister to remain seated for so long in this debate, when an intervention early in the debate, with a clear statement about the Government's view on the various enabling proposals, would have facilitated progress? Why have we been denied a statement? Is it in order for the Minister to remain seated for as long as he has?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is certainly not a question of order as to which hon. Member, whether on the Government Front Bench or not, contributes to a debate in the House. We are considering a private Member's Bill which is being piloted by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy).

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) to question whether there has been a Government response, when the Government gave that response and he was not here to listen to it, or to the answers to the very questions that he put?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is no better a point of order than the last one.

Mr. Jenkin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We all understand that Ministers have duties outside the Chamber that necessarily occupy their time. In the previous debate on Lords amendments, it would have been very informative to have had the Minister's view—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have just dealt with the substantive point of order raised by the hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin).

Mr. Jenkin: It is a separate point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It does not sound like it.

Mr. Jenkin: Would it be in order for the Minister to answer now the points that were raised?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Most certainly not. The hon. Gentleman must know that that confuses completely a point of order with a point of debate.

Mr. Maclean: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you check Hansard on Monday and the Minister's claims that the Government have responded to the debate? I have been here throughout this morning's proceedings and I did not hear any such response. I am not asking that you request the Minister to reply now—of course not—but I ask you to check Hansard in order to see what was said. The Minister's comments appear to be at variance with my understanding of what happened.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What has been said will be on the record for all to see.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Because the Minister was not here for large parts of the previous debate, I felt that it was appropriate to divide the House—if only in protest.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already dealt with the point of order as to whether the Minister is obliged to take part in the debate.

Lords amendment: No. 6, in page 8, line 8, leave out ("this section") and insert ("subsection (1)").

Motion made, and question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mrs. Gilroy]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 8.

Mr. Forth: This is a clear case—perhaps the clearest that we have had to date—of how it would be helpful if, at the outset of our consideration of the amendments, we were given the courtesy of some brief explanation as to why the Bill's promoter, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy), recommends the amendments to the House. Amendment No. 6 may be detailed and technical—it may even improve the Bill—but it would assist the House to know why and how that is so.

That argument applies even more strongly to amendment No. 8. Those of us who have not had time to scrutinise the amendment this morning—we have been rather busy and in the Chamber all the time, unlike the Minister—want to know why the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 is relevant to fireworks legislation. Given the obvious obscurity and very detailed nature of these amendments, in particular, it would be helpful if the Bill's promoter would do us the privilege of explaining at this stage the reasons for the amendments and why she believes that they should be accepted.

Mrs. Gilroy: The amendments are simply drafting and tidying-up measures. My father was a civil engineer who was much given to tidying the roads, and I am pleased to ensure that this Bill is kept tidy.

Mr. Paice: That raises the question whether it is right that the House should amend the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 at this stage in the Parliament. The House has already passed legislation to create a Scottish Parliament, which will come into being next year following elections. As I understand it, the issue of roads in Scotland will be devolved to the Scottish Parliament. I suggest that it might be inappropriate at this stage in the Scottish Parliament's development for the House to do anything to alter legislation that the Scottish Parliament could change again 10 months hence.

I would have hoped that the hon. Member for Sutton would address that issue. If her father was a civil engineer, he would know the importance of having legislation absolutely right and tidy. If we are likely to have a change again next year, when there is a Scottish Parliament in place and a Scottish Minister with responsibility for roads in Scotland, one has to ask what is the point of introducing a change now.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy), who is promoting the Bill, did not choose to explain amendment No. 8, so it falls to me to help the House in its consideration by explaining what it is. The amendment relates to the prospective repeal of sections 30 and 80 of the Explosives Act 1875. When those are repealed, the two sub-paragraphs in question will no longer have any relevance.

I have been to the Library to consult the Explosives Act. In particular, of course, I have consulted sections 30 and 80. Section 30 says:

"Gunpowder shall not be hawked, sold, or exposed for sale upon any highway, street, public thoroughfare, or public place. If any gunpowder is hawked, sold, or exposed for sale in contravention of this section—

(1) the person hawking, selling, or exposing for sale the same, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40 shillings; and

(2) all or any part of the gunpowder which is so hawked or exposed for sale, or is found in the possession of any person convicted under this section, may be forfeited."

What I do not quite understand—again, presumably, the Minister will not be prepared to tell us; certainly the hon. Member for Sutton was not prepared to tell us—is this. We are repealing or amending part of section 30 of an important measure, which was presumably passed by Parliament, in its wisdom, to protect people on the Queen's highway in Scotland, but it is not clear what the law in Scotland relating to public safety on the public highway will be.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend must recall that all that we have been offered so far by way of explanation is that the father of the promoter of the Bill was a civil engineer with a tidy mind. I do not know what my hon. Friend thinks about that as an explanation. I think that it is patronising and insulting. Unless we get something a lot better from the promoter or the Minister, I cannot see how we can possibly be persuaded of the merits of the amendment.

Mr. Leigh: I strongly suspect that the reason why the hon. Member for Sutton made that fatuous comment is that she had not done what I did, which was fairly elementary. I went back to the Explosives Act to ensure that, rather than these matters just being glibly wafted through the House of Commons without any debate, we considered why we were repealing part of the Act.

Of course I will be reassured on that point. I cannot believe that the Government have made such an elementary error as not to consider properly what is in the Act—of course they have—but we should like an explanation of why, when Parliament in its wisdom, passed section 30, it is now to be repealed.

Schedule 4 of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, amending section 80 of the Explosives Act, deals with the penalty for throwing fireworks in the thoroughfare. It says:

"If any person throw, cast, or fire any fireworks in or into any highway, street, thoroughfare, or public place, he shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale".

By the language, my hon. Friends will realise that that is an amendment to the Explosives Act—it is not the original words—but, again, it is an important protection for people going about their lawful business. Section 80 makes it clear that there should be a penalty for throwing fireworks in the thoroughfare.

What could be more unpleasant than going about one's ordinary lawful business on the thoroughfare and finding that someone is throwing fireworks around? This is a matter of public concern, and I hope, therefore, that, before we complete consideration of these matters, we shall get some help from the Minister. Will he assure us that nothing in the Bill as presently drafted, and none of its changes to existing legislation, will in any way lessen public safety on the highway or the protection that the Explosives Act has adequately provided for the best part of 130 years? I hope that I have made my points, and I look forward to the Minister's contribution.

2.15 pm

Mr. Maclean: Like my hon. Friends, I thought initially that amendment No. 8 was a fairly innocuous tidying-up measure, and that once we received an explanation from the Minister or the promoter, we might be happy to accept it. I do not hold it against the promoter, but I found her response extraordinary. I put it down to the hon. Lady's inexperience or perhaps to the wrong advice that she was given. However, it was an extraordinarily flippant remark to make—that this is just a tidying-up amendment and that her father, who was no doubt a distinguished engineer, was good at tidying up roads.

The House deserves a better explanation than that. I think that it was because the Minister declined to reply to the previous debate that my hon. Friends divided the House. Unless the hon. Lady can give an explanation that I would find more satisfactory, even I as a broad supporter of tightening fireworks safety, especially for children, would be driven to conclude that she deserved the vote to go against her for treating the House in such a flippant way.

Amendment No. 8 would insert in the schedule the repeal of part of the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984. I do not follow the complex legal arguments that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) produced, and I am slightly surprised that the amendment relates to the legislation that he quoted.

The schedule refers to the Explosives Act 1875, the Explosives Act (Northern Ireland) 1970, the Explosives (Age of Purchase &c.) Act 1976, the Explosives Act 1875 etc. (Metrication and Miscellaneous Amendment) Regulations 1984, the Consumer Protection Act 1987 and the Explosives (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1996. The contents of the schedule deal with explosives. Suddenly, the promoter is asking us to accept an amendment from another place—the other place has added this amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are discussing not the contents of the schedule, but an amendment, and moreover a drafting amendment.

Mr. Maclean: Exactly, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are discussing an amendment that would insert the repeal of parts of the Roads (Scotland) Act into the schedule, which deals with Acts relating to explosive substances. We have had no clear indication why the Roads (Scotland) Act should be included in the schedule. I would think that it is an innocuous measure. No doubt it deals with interesting and important matters relating to roads in Scotland. What is it about the Act that makes it appropriate to be included in a schedule dealing with explosives legislation?

Does the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984—the hon. Lady should tell us—include provisions relating to fireworks and explosives? I presume that such provisions must be in it somewhere. However, we have not had an explanation setting out why it is relevant for the Act to appear in the schedule and why the House should agree with the other place.

When we were considering the previous group of amendments, I thought that the other place had put forward some sensible suggestions to improve the Bill. We discussed them and the Minister, unfortunately, neglected to reply to the debate. However, we voted the lead amendment through. I think that that was sensible although some of my hon. Friends might have disagreed with the way in which the Minister behaved in refusing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not relevant, as the right hon. Gentleman knows. We are discussing Lords amendment No. 8, a drafting amendment.

Mr. Maclean: Of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall not repeat my point.

I hope that in this instance we shall be given an explanation. I was trying to bring my remarks to a close by saying that if the Minister does not want a repeat of what happened earlier, we need an explanation of the relevance of the Roads (Scotland) Act in terms of its inclusion in the schedule.

I used to be familiar with some of the details of roads legislation; I used to take a little interest in it. I cannot for the life of me—I am willing to be informed by the Minister or by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy)—recall the particular provisions of the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 that relate to fireworks. I assume that they relate more to explosives. As we are being asked to include the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 in the schedule, could we have an explanation of why only Scotland is referred to? Are there not similar requirements for roads in England?

I will not go down that route, because it would be quite out of order, but I believe that the House is entitled to know the relevance of the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984, when other roads legislation relating to England is either not included or not relevant. Are these matters covered in some of the explosives or fireworks legislation contained in the schedule? The hon. Member for Sutton cannot get away with her skimpy explanation to the House today.

This is an important Bill, which contains a tremendous number of draconian powers, to which I shall not refer again. We have looked sensibly at amendments to the Bill today. These two important amendments were recommended by the other place, and I happen to believe that, in tabling amendments, the other place does a good job. However, we are entitled to a view of what the other place has given us. We need to know from the Government why the amendments are to be included and their substance, purpose and consequence. Also, if we fail to pass them into law, what will be the effect?

[Mr. Maclean]

You say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that they are technical or drafting amendments. They may be—in your opinion. We do not know from the Minister or the hon. Member for Sutton what they are intended to do. Amendment No. 6 is clearly a drafting amendment.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend, who is a student and has been a practitioner of these matters, will know that an amendment may look innocuous—it may change only one word. However, he would surely concede that that can often contain within it substantial changes to the meaning of a clause, or even to a Bill. It is for that reason that he is right to say that, although there has been no debate on the matter, it is important—if only as a courtesy to the House—for either the promoter of the Bill or the Minister to give us a proper explanation of amendment No. 6, and then a bigger explanation of amendment No. 8.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend makes a valid point. Although an explanation would have been helpful, I assume that amendment No. 6—with which I was comfortable, and which proposes to delete "this section" and insert "subsection (1)"—would have no unintended legal consequences. However, I may not be correct. Perhaps my right hon. and hon. Friends have a different view. It would appear to be a technical or drafting amendment.

Mr. Leigh: My right hon. Friend keeps repeating that this is a technical or drafting amendment, but it is not.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: It is.

Mr. Leigh: The Minister says that it is. I hope that he will intervene and explain, because he did even not bother to turn up for the previous debate, let alone reply to the points that I made on safety. Frankly, that was outrageous behaviour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is moving well away from the point of the amendment.

Mr. Maclean: It appears to me that deleting "this section" and inserting "subsection (1)"—I presume that that is subsection (1) of clause 14—might appear to be a technical amendment, making it simpler to understand. It may have different legal consequences—I am not certain. I am concerned that we have not had an explanation from the hon. Member for Sutton of the legal consequences of deleting "this section" and inserting "subsection (1)", so that the Bill would read:

"In subsection (1) 'explosives' has the same meaning as in the Explosives Act 1875."

There could be some unintended consequences.

Mr. Paterson: Before my right hon. Friend moves on from the Scottish aspect, and as he comes from Scotland, may I ask him whether he believes that the clause is compatible with Scottish law? Will there have to be a further redrafting through regulations, given that the Bill is so badly drafted?

Mr. Maclean: I must pick up my hon. Friend on one point. I do not think that there can be a further redraft to correct the anomaly. The Secretary of State has taken powers under almost every clause of the Bill considerably to amend other Acts, including the Explosives Act 1875, but I am not sure that she could redraft the Bill to change any mistakes that he has made in interpreting Scottish law.

None the less, my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) raised the valid point that the Bill would amend the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984. The Bill relates to fireworks and applies to the United Kingdom, but there has been no explanation of its consequences to the Scottish legal system. I believe that—I do not want to go down the route suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice)—the matter may more appropriately be dealt with in the Scottish Parliament, to which such powers will be devolved. However, that is not my main concern, and I may be out of order if I suggest that it would be better to amend the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 through roads legislation or through a devolved measure in the Scottish Parliament.

We are discussing a suggestion from the other place that the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 be added to a schedule of a United Kingdom Act of Parliament that deals with fireworks. I do not think that the Bill is an appropriate vehicle through which to amend that Act, as is suggested by the Act's proposed inclusion in the schedule.

Mr. Forth: The thought has occurred to me—it may have occurred to my right hon. Friend, too; I know how perspicacious he is in these matters—that, as the Bill seems to find it necessary to encroach on Scottish legislation, it will equally affect matters in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. If so, the Bill could contain a defect, although it is a bit late in the day for us to identify it. Perhaps the Minister or the promoter will make it clear why the Bill seems uniquely to affect Scotland and why, by implication, it does not have a similar effect in other parts of the United Kingdom. Has my right hon. Friend taken that into account in his analysis of the amendment?

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend raises a good point. Clause 19 states:

"This Act may be cited as the Fireworks Act 1998."

It continues:

"This Act extends to Northern Ireland."

I do not want to trespass on any legislation relating to Northern Ireland or on the unique way in which, at the moment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is now going beyond the scope of the amendment. He must confine himself to speaking about whether it is desirable to improve the Bill's drafting as proposed.

Mr. Maclean: Precisely, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for being tempted slightly astray. Amendment No. 8 relates to the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984, but we have a United Kingdom.

Mr. Paice: There seems to be a contradiction. Clause 19 clearly states that the legislation will extend to Northern Ireland. Moreover, the schedule repeals Northern Ireland legislation. I find it odd that amendment No. 8 will amend Scottish legislation when, as far as I can see, the Bill contains nothing to suggest that it applies to Scotland at all.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is right. The legislation extends to Northern Ireland. Therefore, the parliamentary rules of interpretation are such that it would be regarded as a United Kingdom Bill, which I assume automatically—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman may assume that he is well out of order.

Mr. Maclean: The amendment to the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 suggested by the other place clearly applies to Scotland. That is obvious. We have a United Kingdom Act of Parliament before us. When the hon. Member for Sutton, who is promoting the Bill, introduced the amendment from the other place, she gave us no explanation about what it does. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough, who has considerable legal expertise in such matters, was able to cite accurately from the various statutes those provisions—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are about to move on to the rest of the business. Would it be in order for any right hon. or hon. Members who want to object to state that clearly by standing up, so that it can be shown in the public record that they have objected to one of the forthcoming Bills?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The objections are given in the usual way. It will be observed whether or not they are taken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already ruled that we cannot have a debate on a point of order.

North-East London Probation Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

2.45 pm

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): I thank Madam Speaker for giving me the chance to debate NELPS, the north-east London probation service. I also thank my hon. Friend the Minister for answering the debate. I know that it is pulling the short straw for Ministers to have to answer on Friday afternoons when they have a long way to travel afterwards. This is my third Friday Adjournment debate. As ever, the House is not a fevered throng of Back Benchers, with one or two exceptions.

A while ago, the national chief probation officer for England, in discussing the lack of resources for the probation service said:

"We cannot deliver unless we are adequately resourced."

That is the starting point for my comments.

Without doubt, the problems faced by the Government and the probation service are the result of the actions of the Conservative Government, who, year on year, made a series of cuts and created the mounting paperwork foisted on the service across the country. I chose to debate NELPS because I was approached by individuals working in the service, and because, a few weeks ago, I went to a meeting in Stratford town hall of the National Association of Probation Officers. The desperation and unhappiness of years of cuts and mounting case loads and paperwork was palpable. From that meeting and my communication with individuals, I have found that there is genuine concern among probation officers for the service's future.

The odd thing about the meeting was that all the officers who turned up had been threatened—I use the word advisedly—three times by the management of the probation service. They had had three letters which said something like, "It is only fair to warn members what may happen if they bring the service into disrepute." It was spelled out clearly in three separate letters to every union member at the meeting that any comments that were frowned upon would be met with disciplinary action. I deprecate that action by the management.

More recently, when I secured this debate, I helpfully received a letter from the Association of Chief Officers of Probation describing the national situation. It said:

"Although the national allocation from the Home Office to all probation services in 1998/99 was only 0.1 per cent. lower in cash terms than 1997/98, this represents an average real terms cut of 4.7 per cent ... The total number of offenders (on community sentences and pre and post release from prison) under criminal supervision by the probation service has increased from 136,000 in 1992 to 184,700 in 1997, a rise of 35 per cent."

That is the national situation.

The local situation in north-east London is that this year NELPS faces a cut of £717,000, or 7 per cent. of its budget. Last year—the last cut made by the previous Government—the cut was £500,000. Meanwhile, case loads have increased dramatically. Some time ago, the previous Government introduced an initiative which my hon. Friend the Minister will know all about. New centres were created for the probation service. The first one in north-east London was in Barking. There are now others in Stratford and in my borough of Havering. The previous Government set up the new centres purely because the probation service was becoming unmanageable as a result of the increased work load and the cuts introduced by them. They would not admit that then, and they probably would not admit it now, but that is the reality.

In those centres, clients—as they are called these days—have the chance to have alcohol or drug counselling, or whatever else. Sadly, what is happening now and has happened for some time is that clients, especially petty offenders, are seen by such counsellors instead of by probation officers. The reason for setting up the centres was to allow clients to see counsellors as well as having the standard meetings with probation officers and counselling from them.

When the centres were set up, it was said that high-risk clients would be seen individually by probation officers in the old style. However, that is not quite working as it should. When the system was started, each probation officer was told that he or she would have 25 cases. The first team to be set up was given 45 cases each—almost a doubling of the work load. That was immediate, and since then the number has increased again. That is high-risk cases, not low-risk cases. High-risk clients are deemed to be destructive or dangerous.

In community service, each officer used to have a case load of 35. That went up some time ago to 55, and I assume that it is now higher, although the figure is not available. So in all areas we have seen a hugely escalating case load for probation officers.

At the start of 1995, NELPS had 154 probation officers. At the start of this year there were only 126—a cut of 28. In the past two years, NELPS has lost 16 probation officers. This year, the 7 per cent. cut will mean the loss of 20 posts. Not all those posts will be probation officer posts; some will be in administrative support. However, administrative support has also been cut in recent years. For example, some time ago two probation officers had one secretary between them. That has increased to a ratio of one secretary for three probation officers. It is now proposed that there will be one for five. That is against a background of increasing case loads and paperwork, so probation officers now find themselves doing more and more administrative work such as writing letters rather than concentrating on the work they are there to do, which is to deal with some of the most chaotic and destructive individuals in our society and protecting the public from them, in which they have a good record.

A number of officers have told me, and I was told at the meeting in Stratford, that they have to spend every day prioritising casework, because they are overloaded. They are so surrounded by paperwork that they have to prioritise. One of them said to me that what worried her was that one day she would make the wrong decision and prioritise the wrong case, which could mean that someone was in danger or perhaps someone died.

I talked to a probation officer the other day who said that a client came in who was anorexic. She obviously had a criminal past, but she was anorexic. She told him that she had not eaten for three days. He had to say, "There is nothing I can do. I am just up to my eyes in it. I have to deal with other things first." He said to me, "What if I've made a mistake? What if she turns up dead in a week or two because she doesn't start to eat again? But I really have no choice—I have to prioritise my cases."

The result of all that is that the clients, especially those who have been in prison, are seen far less frequently than they were, say, five years ago, which in turn means that they are more likely to reoffend. In addition, it is petty offenders rather than high-risk offenders who are neglected, yet I would argue that it is really petty offenders of whom people are more wary.

In my constituency, many people, especially older people, come to see me, not with any specific problem relating to criminal activity, but because they are generally worried about it. I know that my hon. Friend knows all about that, and that Home Office Ministers spend a lot of time dealing with the increasing fear of crime; however, the sort of people who come to my surgery are not, generally speaking, afraid of armed robbers or murderers, but of petty criminals—they are afraid or being burgled or of their car being pinched and written off.

Yet those are the very criminals who are been seen less and less often by probation officers. People who are given community service orders frequently do not start their orders straight away, even though history leads me to conclude that, statistically, starting a community service order late means that the individual has far less chance of finishing it. That brings us back to the point that people who do not receive the attention of probation officers are more likely to reoffend.

There are clear implications for the Crime and Disorder Bill. The Bill puts more duties on probation officers, and provides for an increase in the resources going to the probation service, but currently the case load of probation officers is increasing while their number is being cut, so there is a risk that the economic tide within the service might act as a destructive force against the legislation.

The latest example of the increase in paperwork is activity sampling, which is basically a time-and-motion study. A probation officer who takes part in activity sampling will make a note of what he or she is doing every 15 minutes of every day for a fortnight, despite the case load and heavy burden of work that is currently on probation officers' plates. Two probation officers to whom I spoke about activity sampling told me that they had not been able to do it; they were not taking part in such studies, because they had far too much work on at the moment and they had better things to do with their time than take part in time-and-motion studies.

Unsurprisingly, sickness levels in the probation service have risen, mainly as a result of stress. For example, within two months of a team being set up at NELPS, it was destroyed, as all seven members went off sick. The vast majority suffered stress-related illnesses, which are becoming more and more common throughout the service.

The evidence is that the probation service does a highly effective job. All the probation officers I have met are deeply committed to their work, but they all tell me that, over a number of years, not only the past year or two, their job satisfaction, enthusiasm and willingness to tackle some of the most fundamental problems of society have drained away. They are overloaded with work and with paperwork, and are prevented from doing the job that they are there to do, which is to look after the most destructive members of society.

My basic plea is to ask my hon. Friend the Minister whether we can see our way to getting back into the probation service the resources that were taken away by the previous Government. Can we see our way to reducing the amount of paperwork and administrative work that probation officers have to do and so allow them to get back to their real job, which is to look after former prisoners and other chaotic and destructive people?

2.59 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Ms Joyce Quin): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Cryer) on his good fortune in being allocated this Adjournment debate. As he pointed out, this slot in the timetable is probably preferable for a London or south-east-based Member such as himself rather than for a Tynesider like me. I congratulate my hon. Friend also on his choice of subject, because the future of the probation service is very important for crime and disorder policies and the Home Office agenda.

The debate gives me an opportunity that I have not had before at the Dispatch Box to pay tribute to my hon. Friend's father, whom I primarily remember as a Member of the European Parliament. We were representatives at the same time, and we would cheerfully have admitted to having somewhat different views on the European Union. None the less, we worked determinedly and enthusiastically together on the Economic Affairs Committee in the European Parliament, particularly on such issues as the future of manufacturing industry, to which we were both passionately committed.

Let me make it clear that I, and the Home Office, feel that the probation service has a key role to play in the criminal justice system. I was glad that my portfolio gave me responsibility for probation as well as for prisons. It seemed to me that that was a way of emphasising the custodial and non-custodial aspects of sentencing, which are both important.

We know that the previous Government's policy was "prison works", which seemed to imply that there was no other worthwhile form of sentencing or punishment. That is not our view. While prison is appropriate for serious offenders, and can and does work in some cases, probation too can and does work. One of my heartening experiences as a Minister has been to see many examples of good practice in probation services around the country, and the work that is being done through the "what works" agenda to make sure that good practice becomes as widespread as possible.

It is common sense to say that prison is right for some offenders, and punishment in the community is right for others. What matters is that the public are protected, and, whether offenders are being supervised by the probation service or serving a custodial sentence, that their experience is, as far as possible, constructive and likely to reduce their chances of reoffending.

My hon. Friend obviously spent a good deal of time considering resources. I shall respond by explaining the national position on resources, as well as addressing some of the specific issues of the north-east London probation service.

The bulk of probation service funding comes, of course, from central Government. That support increased year by year until 1996-97, when it peaked. Since then, it has been reduced to £346.5 million in 1997-98 and to £343 million in the current year. In real terms, that represents an overall reduction of a little over 7 per cent. By far the largest and most important component of central Government support is cash-limited current grant, which this year stands at £328.8 million.

For every £4 of the money provided by the Home Office, a further £1 is provided by local government. In other words, 80 per cent. of every probation service's revenue budget comes from central Government, and 20 per cent. from the relevant local authority. I shall explain in a moment how Home Office current grant is divided between the 54 English and Welsh services.

As my hon. Friend recognised, the problems of resources were, by and large, inherited from the previous Government. We made it clear that we were committed to maintaining public spending in line with their spending plans in our first two years in office. Therefore, probation services have been affected as they would have been by the previous Government's spending plans. However, in the meantime, we have set up a comprehensive spending review to take a fresh look at work load and at the priorities across Government, to help us to determine spending for 1999-2000 and beyond. The comprehensive spending review will allow us to ensure that future spending reflects the priorities of this Government, not the previous one.

My hon. Friend mentioned the contact that he had had with the Association of Chief Officers of Probation about the resource needs of the probation service. In a recent letter to Members of Parliament, ACOP drew attention to the fact that the overall number of probation service staff is decreasing due to financial pressures, while work load continues to rise.

The Government's position on that is clear. We recognise that the probation service as a whole has handled an increased work load with reduced resources, and has streamlined its operations and achieved important efficiency gains. None the less, it is apparent from the data available to the Home Office, particularly the inspection reports prepared by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Probation, that there are still wide variations in performance between services.

When I looked at the figures for unit costs, I noticed that there was a marked difference between the different aspects of the probation service's work. For example, the costs of writing pre-sentence reports and welfare reports, and of supervising offenders on probation orders, varied considerably across the service. Although we must bear in mind the fact that, in some cases, there are good reasons for that, in others the reasons seem to be less clear cut. My hon. Friend will understand that we have a responsibility to ensure that the variations can be explained by valid reasons, not simply by variations in standard between one service and another.

My hon. Friend asked me about Government funding of the probation service. We recognise that Government funding will need to take account of genuinely new work, such as the provisions in the Crime and Disorder Bill. A number of provisions in that Bill, such as the drug treatment and testing orders, home detention curfew and extended supervision, have considerable work load implications for the probation service. Although some of those measures will be piloted in the first instance, particularly drug treatment and testing orders, we must ensure that the measures that we are introducing are properly resourced, so that they are brought in as the House would want, once the legislation has been approved.

[Ms Joyce Quin]

As my hon. Friend knows, the finance planning process associated with the comprehensive spending review is now coming to an end, and before long the Government will announce the outcome. Therefore, some of the answers to my hon. Friend's questions will be contained in that announcement. The overall Home Office grant available to the probation service will then be allocated by means of a funding formula that takes account of each service's major items of work load, together with demographic factors, in order to rank the 54 English and Welsh probation service areas according to their comparative resource needs.

Before this debate, I looked at the resource figures for north-east London, and was interested to see that, in recent years, its proportion of total available Home Office current grant has remained pretty much the same. I also compared the position of NELPS with that of the neighbouring services in London and the south-east. I found that, in light of the funding that has been made available to neighbouring areas, which have many similar problems and challenges, it has not in any sense been unfairly discriminated against.

Obviously, because figures are not yet available, it is impossible for me to say today whether NELPS's proportion of next year's Home Office grant will be similar to this year's, but I give my hon. Friend an assurance that, under the formula, we shall carefully study the relative needs of different probation areas, to try to ensure that we are satisfied that the allocations between different areas are as fair as they can possibly be.

My hon. Friend mentioned contacts that he had had with the local branch of the National Association of Probation Officers. I have seen the press release that the branch produced on 1 June 1998, and the response from the deputy chief of NELPS, which my hon. Friend referred to. There was some disagreement between the two about the actual effects of financial pressures, but I am advised that the figures for probation officer posts lost were less dramatic than the press release said.

I believe that the press release mentioned 16, whereas I understand that the reduction in the number of probation officer posts was five, or nine if one includes all probation grade posts, including managers. There have been no compulsory redundancies in that process, although I accept the staff's real concerns about the stress that they are under, and their worries about being unable to carry out their tasks effectively.

Some of the points that my hon. Friend made, especially about secretarial back-up and so on, relate to matters which are also capable of being addressed by a more successful implementation of information technology in the probation service. The Home Office and I are keen that the probation service should benefit from the most modern information technology available, allowing probation service officers to access information directly from the system. That will help with many secretarial tasks, and it will represent an important gain, in that it will allow information to be collected quickly and more efficiently, and transmitted much more efficiently to other parts of the criminal justice system.

There is a real need to enable information technology systems in the criminal justice system to talk to one another much more directly, and to have much more direct communication than they have had until now. That will ensure that prisons, the probation service, the Crown Prosecution Service and the other parts of the system communicate more effectively, and reduce delays in the system, which are expensive—sometimes for the probation service in particular. We want to reduce delays to a minimum.

None the less, I do not want to be too alarmist about some of the probation service's difficulties. I believe, on the basis of information that has been given to me by Her Majesty's inspectorate of probation, that there is no evidence that the public are being jeopardised as a result of recent pressures. I am very glad that, these days, the probation service works closely with the police, local authorities and social services in assessing risk; as a result, performance in that respect is improving.

The press release issued by the branch of NAPO spoke of some of the difficulties caused by the need for officers to deal with more prisoners as a result of the probation work they do in prison. It also said that sometimes those prisoners are held a long way from home, requiring probation officers to make quite long journeys. However, I should tell my hon. Friend that we are keen to address some of those issues in the prisons probation review.

We have already concluded our review, and shall be going out to consultation in the near future. During that consultation process, we will be keen to ensure that probation services and prison establishments feel that they can submit their views for our consideration. As the purpose of the review is to promote greater and more efficient integrated working between the prison and probation services, we believe that it presents a real opportunity for probation services to advance ideas not only about how they can become more efficient but about future Home Office funding priorities and probation service work.

We are conscious of the fact that probation officers invest a great deal of time in dealing effectively with offenders. It also true that there has been some pressure—

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Housing Benefit Fraud

1. Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): What steps she is taking to tackle housing benefit fraud organised by landlords. [47468]

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): I thank my hon. Friend for his persistence with this question. Since the general election, we have made it easier for local authorities to stop payments to bogus landlords, to recover such payments and to collect information on other properties that the landlords may have and from which they may be making bogus claims.

Mr. Hanson: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is unacceptable for £4 billion-worth of housing benefit fraud to be perpetrated each year, and that the steps that he took in the regulations in November last year will go some way towards helping to prevent that abuse? Prevention is certainly better than the taxpayer being swindled by fraudulent landlords.

Mr. Field: I can confirm all my hon. Friend's assertions. I draw to the attention of the House the record of his local authority, which has doubled its fraud savings target and introduced mechanisms for checking whether landlords are bogus, to prevent such claims from being made in the first place.

Pensioners

2. Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): What representations she has received on the Government's proposals to assist the poorest pensioners. [47469]

12. Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): What representations she has received on her proposals to assist the poorest pensioners. [47479]

15. Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): What action she is taking to help the poorest pensioners. [47482]

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): We have received representations on a number of issues facing the poorest pensioners. An estimated 1 million of today's pensioners are not receiving the income support to which they are entitled. We are taking steps to tackle that by a programme of research into why so many pensioners do not receive their entitlement, and a programme of action involving nine pilot projects to test ways of getting more automatic help to pensioners.

Mr. Thomas: Age Concern Harrow and Harrow Pensioners Action Group, two excellent organisations representing elderly people in my constituency, share my concern and that of my right hon. Friend about the number of elderly people not taking up their right to benefit. When does she expect her Department's research to be concluded, and can she assure the House that its findings will be acted on speedily?

Ms Harman: We have already had interim findings from the research, showing that pensioners are losing out on between 24p and £51 a week in income support. We have also identified, through the interim report—I will let my hon. Friend have a copy—some of the reasons why they do not claim: the complexity; not understanding the system; and not wanting to have to prove that they are poor. We will take all those issues into account. The full report will be published at the beginning of next year, and we will certainly take action thereafter.

Mr. Mullin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in the long term, the answer is not to offer pensioners more effective ways of claiming benefit but to make them independent of benefit, and is not the best way of doing that to phase back in the link with earnings?

Ms Harman: In the long term, we need what has always been important to allow people to have a decent standard of living in retirement: the basic state pension topped up by a good second pension. We are committed to the basic state pension as the foundation of income in retirement, but we are also committed to extending occupational pensions and introducing stakeholder pensions so that people can put money aside and get good value for money from pensions on top of the basic state provision.

Mr. Hope: Is not it an indictment of the system that 1 million pensioners are not claiming the benefit to which they are entitled—a situation that we inherited from the previous Administration? Is my right hon. Friend aware of the independent report, "We All Need Pensions—The Prospects for Pension Provision", by Tom Ross, which says that there is likely to be a rise in pensioner inequality and that the majority of the poorest pensioners are women? Can she assure me, and the pensioners in Corby, that the Government will make meeting the needs of the poorest pensioners an urgent priority?

Ms Harman: We will take immediate action to meet the needs of the poorest pensioners without waiting for the results of our review, and we will create a better long-term framework. We want to tackle the problem of growing inequality among pensioners caused by the growing gap in retirement incomes. We must tackle the problem of avoidable drops in income in retirement by making sure that people have a decent second pension. We must ensure that low earners or those who do not earn have a decent standard of living in retirement, which is the state's responsibility.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford): How does the right hon. Lady justify the fact that 300,000 of the poorest pensioners who do not pay tax but who have small savings will be deprived of their income as a result of the abolition of dividend tax credits? Is she aware that despite assurances given during proceedings on the Finance Bill, Ministers have done nothing to help those pensioners?

Ms Harman: The best way to ensure that everyone can enjoy security in retirement is to build a thriving, skilled, well-paid economy. The opportunity to work and to put money aside for retirement is important. Companies providing occupational pensions will benefit from the reduction in corporation tax. Rebates for personal pensions will increase from April 1999. There is no long-term problem for occupational schemes. The Government are taking a long-term view of the economy, and of sustaining the investment that will lead to strong pensions. The pensioners who are losing out are those who have no second pension, no state earnings-related pension scheme, no occupational pension and no savings. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the Secretary of State take note of the question put by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) about the loss of the link between pensions and earnings? Her party campaigned vigorously in opposition for the re-establishment of that link. Pensioners have lost £20 a week as a result of the loss of the link, and those who are already pensioners have no opportunity to get a second pension. What will she do to make sure that the basic state pension is at an acceptable level, and that people do not have to revert to income support?

Ms Harman: The Conservative Government's ending of the earnings link has certainly contributed to the growing gap in income in retirement. The poorest pensioners have been left behind. We have acted; within two years, an extra £400 million will be invested in support for pensioners, which will mean more money for pensioners than they would have had if we had reinstated the earnings link for this year and next.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): The Government's plans for the poorest pensioners are believed to include a guarantee for older, poorer pensioners, if we are to believe the latest leak—and leaks from the Department of Social Security seem rather reliable. Will the Minister set out her thinking on how money can be guaranteed for the oldest, poorest pensioners?

Ms Harman: In the short term, we want to see more pensioners on income support because we want all the pensioners entitled to income support automatically to receive their benefit. In the longer term, a combination of basic state pension and wider provision of second pensions will mean that fewer people are left to depend on means-tested benefit. The basic state pension is part of that equation.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): The right hon. Lady failed spectacularly to answer my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale). Let us hope that she does better with me.

Why have the Government taken the heartless and thoroughly sickening decision to tell local authority social services departments to change the operation of the rules so that where poor pensioners have their assets eroded to £16,000 through payment of residential and nursing fees, they will no longer be allowed to top up fees from their remaining £16,000? As a result of that, many poor pensioners will be forced to move to cheaper homes. Does the right hon. Lady realise that a forced move can be threatening to the health of old, frail people? It may even threaten their lives. Do the Government care?

Ms Harman: The Government are very concerned about health and social services for all pensioners, particularly the poorest pensioners. The responsibility for social services authorities and for health service provision for the elderly lies with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. However, we work across Government to see how different departmental policies affect pensioners. The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), is chairing a ministerial group to explore how Departments work together to ensure proper support and provision for pensioners.

Child Support Agency

3. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): When she expects to announce her proposals for changes to the Child Support Agency. [47470]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Keith Bradley): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will be making a statement within the hour.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank my hon. Friend for that most surprising answer. I am sure that all hon. Members are hoping that the new system that my right hon. Friend is about to unveil will be fair to the child and to both parents, and will work administratively. As a valedictory to the present system—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I hope so. Does my hon. Friend agree that the current system has lost all credibility as a result of its record of inaccuracy, delay and failure to communicate? That system has been a nightmare for the many people caught up in it. In view of that fact, does not the new system deserve a new name?

Mr. Bradley: It would clearly be totally inappropriate for me to give details at this stage of the proposed changes. However, I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that the Child Support Agency has experienced problems and that its staff have had difficulties dealing with the system that Parliament put in place. It is appropriate to put on record that the staff have worked extremely hard to make the system work as efficiently as possible against a background of legislation that is almost impossible to understand. I am confident that the statement that will be made later this afternoon will address many of the problems that my hon. Friend has identified.

Child Care

4. Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): What steps she is taking to improve the quality of child care. [47471]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Women (Ms Joan Ruddock): Quality is one of the three watchwords of our national child care strategy, which aims to ensure good-quality, affordable child care for children in every neighbourhood.

Our plans to raise quality of care include: better integration of early education and child care, a more consistent regulatory regime, and a new training and qualifications framework for early years workers.

Mr. Pound: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. In Ealing, North, many parents are becoming increasingly reliant on child minders and ensuring the quality of that care is becoming increasingly important. Many child minders are low paid and receive little or no formal training. Is my hon. Friend prepared to comment further on the present system? Does she have confidence in it?

Ms Ruddock: Many parents have confidence in the present system but, as I have said, we are always looking to raise quality in this area. We want to improve the image of working with children and to make it an attractive career. We are concerned that 70 per cent. of child minders do not have formal qualifications. However, some local authorities—including my own—provide a great deal of training and advice for child minders. We want to encourage them to gain qualifications and to achieve nationally recognised standards, and we are doing a great deal of work in that field. My hon. Friend will be aware of the current consultation paper on regulations and the overall strategy in which I hope that all hon. Members will be involved.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Does the Minister accept that child benefit is important for many parents—particularly lone parents—when it comes to providing quality child care? Will the Minister confirm reports that the Secretary of State intends to change the date for payment of child benefit to 16-year-olds from the first Monday in September to 26 June? Will that not mean that some mothers will lose up to £856 and that all parents will lose £114 on average? Will the Minister tell the House why, given that state schools usually recess for the summer in mid to late July, the date of 26 June has been chosen? Is the Secretary of State confusing that date with the rising date of public schools, such as Fettes college and St. Paul's school?

Ms Ruddock: I really do not know where the hon. Gentleman gets his information from. In respect of his benefits inquiry, the answer is definitively no.

Child Support

5. Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): What action the Government have taken to improve support for children through the social security system. [47472]

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): Our commitment to support families and children is central to our policies to modernise the welfare state. We will increase benefits for all families with children by increasing child benefit for the oldest child by £2.50. We are increasing benefits for children in the poorest families by increasing the child allowance on income-related benefits by £2.50 from November. We are ensuring that parents can work, and that work pays.

Mr. McNulty: I thank my right hon. Friend. Does she agree that the new Labour Government have done more in the past year to help children through the social security system than the Conservatives ever did? Given their record and policies, which caused so much neglect and abject poverty for children, rather than sneering at our policies, should not they hang their heads in shame?

Ms Harman: I welcome my hon. Friend's points. We have not only taken action to give extra benefits to the families with the poorest children but, above all, by helping their parents into work, we are helping such children to become better off than they could ever be in workless households.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): In that case, will the Secretary of State assure us that she has no plans to abolish child benefit for 17 and 18-year-olds still in full-time education?

Ms Harman: We have said that child benefit for those over 16 will be subject to review. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said that before the general election. He has expressed his commitment to child benefit and increased it. He has said that we want to do even more and that we are going to make it fairer by clawing it back from higher-rate taxpayers.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): Given that disproportionate numbers of our poorest citizens are children under five, will the Department consider reviewing the pros and cons of introducing an under-fives child benefit premium? That would not only target poverty without a means test, but give parents of children under five a proper choice about whether to seek employment in the labour market or stay at home to look after their children.

Ms Harman: As ever, my hon. Friend raises an important point. It was always an assumption and a principle of benefit policy that as children get older, they get more expensive and therefore their benefit should be increased. It is also evident that some of the poorest children have been young children in poor families. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor took a step towards sorting this out when he introduced the premium for children in workless families under 11, on the basis of the Joseph Rowntree research report. My hon. Friend made a further point about the problems of children under five. We will carefully examine poverty among young children.

Lone Parents

6. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): What progress has been made in increasing the take-up of work by lone parents. [47473]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Keith Bradley): The Government are committed to providing viable choices for lone parents who, in the past, were written off to a life on benefit. The new deal for lone parents is a major step in achieving this objective, and independent research has shown that it is having a clear effect on the number of lone parents getting off income support. Our approach is in tune with what lone parents want: the opportunity to work, and a better quality of life for their children. Progress is encouraging—10 per cent. more lone parents moved off income support and on to family credit in 1997 than in the preceding year.

Mr. Cunningham: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. How many personal advisers are employed in Coventry to help lone parents? How many lone parents in Coventry has it been possible to assist? I congratulate him on the last quarterly figures, which show that 30,000 lone parents have found employment. Put another way, the number of lone parents now out of work is below 1 million, which is a lot more than can be said for the time when the Conservative party was in power.

Mr. Bradley: I thank my hon. Friend for his question, although I am not able today to give him the precise figures for Coventry alone; I shall look into that. I have visited the new deal for lone parents pilot area in the midlands and seen the quality of the personal advisers and of the support that they are giving lone parents, who welcome the opportunity to return to work. The national roll-out of the new deal for lone parents will follow in October and, currently, many more personal advisers are being trained, which will be of further major benefit to lone parents in the midlands.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Can the Minister explain why his Department has rejected the model set out in the new deal for the young unemployed, which is that the objective should be to increase employability, and adopted instead in the new deal for lone parents an objective of getting people into work?

Mr. Bradley: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's premise. The new deal for lone parents equally looks at the employability of lone parents, helps with the barriers to work such as child care, looks at the appropriate training they require and ensures that there is a link between that and the labour market. We have a common approach towards all unemployed people to ensure that they can maximise their opportunities to return to work, which is what they want to do.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): My hon. Friend will know that I strongly support the new deal for lone parents and the making work pay strategy. Will he investigate the circumstances, which I am sure neither he nor my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intended should arise, in which a lone parent on family credit with one child leaving school at the end of June can be £25 a week worse off than a lone parent in identical circumstances on income support?

Mr. Bradley: I recognise that that matter has been raised in the press—the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has already commented on it. The press report is totally inaccurate: the date for child benefit has not changed. Similarly, we inherited the date for family credit, which was changed in July 1996. Any proposal that now has an effect on work disincentives that we inherited will be looked at by the Government.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): Does the Minister accept that the increase in the number of lone parents who are finding a job specifically as a result of the new deal is a mere 0.9 per cent., and that each costs about £22,000? Given the rate at which the money is being used, what plans has the Minister for continuing to help lone parents to get into work when all the money allocated from the windfall tax has been used up?

Mr. Bradley: Yet again, the Liberal Democrats are interested only in criticising a scheme that, by their own admission, is helping lone parents to get back to work. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's figures, because much of the cost arises from the initial expenditure on getting the scheme up and running. For once, the Liberal Democrats should applaud a Government who are trying to help people to get back into work, instead of adopting their usual practice of criticising anything that comes forward.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): My hon. Friend will be aware that many lone parents in Slough and elsewhere have been able to get into work, in part because of individual advisers. However, a matter that concerns me is that lone parents in work have nobody to share the burden of family crises and other problems that occur while they are at work. Is there a case for continuing support once lone parents are in work, to help them to retain their employment by helping them to deal with family crises? Does my hon. Friend plan to give lone parents better support so that, having won a job, they can hang on to it and earn a better income for their family?

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I have visited most of the lone parent schemes in the country and what is remarkable is not only the support given to lone parents trying to obtain work, but the fact that that support continues after they have got into work to ensure that any crisis can be addressed immediately, so that the person can remain in work and does not have to return to benefit. Linked to that is an obligation on employers to look closely at their own employment policies and to make them much more family friendly, so that they can appreciate the problems that a lone parent might experience and, in conjunction with the lone parent's personal adviser, sort out the problem and ensure continued employment.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): Is not the Minister avoiding the point? The Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), made exactly the right point, which is that at a cost of £22,000 to £23,000 per job, the programme is very expensive. It is no good the Minister saying that those are the wrong figures and that they include start-up costs when there is a continuing rolling cost, such as the recent advertising campaign of £2.15 million which was intended to get more lone parents involved.

Is not the real truth that the Minister avoids the fact that there is a series of failings in the programme, such as 15 per cent. of women who are lone parents falling out of work within three months and 75 per cent. of the women written to not even bothering to reply? The Government are going national with the programme in October, and they have absolutely no idea of how effective or ineffective it is because they will have no measurement available until, at the very earliest, next year.

Mr. Bradley: Once again, I reject the figures that the Opposition spokesperson has identified. Independent researchers have said that the Opposition figures are "meaningless". Most importantly, we cannot afford to allow lone parents who want to work to remain on benefit without substantial help from the Government to get them back into work. The Opposition did nothing but leave lone parents to languish on benefit. No help was forthcoming; no schemes were brought forward which helped lone parents back into work. The Labour Government can be proud of the new deal for lone parents.

If the hon. Gentleman went round the country, met the lone parents who have got back into work and talked to them, he would see a great beam on their faces. For the first time, they are getting the help and support that they require. If the hon. Gentleman talked to them, he would not ask ridiculous questions in the House on the adequacy of the scheme.

Crime and Disorder Bill

7. Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): What representations she has received on the impact of the Government's proposed crime and disorder legislation on women. [47474]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Women (Ms Joan Ruddock): I thank my hon. Friend for her question. Women's organisations, many of which depend on volunteers, do not find it easy to enter into partnerships with public bodies such as local authorities and the police. In their representations, women's organisations have made the point that there is not enough working together of all the key players, including women's organisations. The provisions in the Crime and Disorder Bill for effective inter-agency working should, we believe, address these problems.

Mrs. Mahon: My hon. Friend will be aware that one of these organisations, the Women's Refuge Movement, undertakes valuable work on domestic violence. However, quite often it does not get the co-operation at local level that we would all like to see. Will my hon. Friend ensure that the national guidelines for co-operation between local authorities, women's refuges and the police are implemented?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for that question and I want to give her the reassurance that she seeks. Co-operation at local level, as my hon. Friend says, between different agencies has not always been as good as it might be. For the first time, a statutory duty will be placed on local authorities and the police to create partnerships to tackle crime. One of the main duties of these partnerships will be to undertake audits to establish local crime statistics and experiences, with the idea that crime should be reduced. In looking to devise those audits and carry them out, we expect that women's organisations will be able to give valuable expertise to the other partners that they might otherwise lack. I give the assurance that domestic violence will be one of the crimes that we regard as extremely serious and that we shall give guidance on the new partnerships.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): The Home Secretary gave a clear commitment to the House that women victims in rape cases would not be cross-examined by the defendant. Has that commitment been dropped and overturned by him?

Last week, there was the tragic suicide of a woman prisoner. Will the Government now be minded to support my Prevention of Delay in Trials Bill, which provides that women should not be kept on remand for more than 110 days before being brought to trial?

Ms Ruddock: I am sure that the hon. Lady should properly direct that question to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I certainly have no knowledge of any change of heart on his part. We have made recommendations about the treatment of rape victims and they are now being consulted on. I will, of course, refer the hon. Lady's remarks to my right hon. Friend, and I undertake to write to her in due course.

Housing Benefit Fraud

8. Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): What incentives she is giving local authorities to decrease the number of cases in which those committing housing benefit fraud are not prosecuted. [47475]

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): The Government have released £200,000 of taxpayers' money so that legal resources in the Department can be made available to local authorities to bring, we hope, successful prosecutions where they are so desired.

Dr. Lewis: The Minister was recently reported as having told the Child Poverty Action Group that it is not true that most benefit fraud is accidental. He will be aware of the Public Accounts Committee's criticism that only one case of detected fraud in every 100 proceeds to prosecution. Will he explain what further measures might raise the prosecution rate? Will he confirm that any steps that are to be taken will be revealed first to the House, and not, like the Child Support Agency proposals, to the press—let alone to the dreadful Derek Draper to enable him to stuff his bank account with another £250 an hour?

Mr. Field: Tomorrow, I shall meet the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee to follow up the very points that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I hope that we shall shortly be able to make a statement to the House on our counter-fraud strategy.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Minister recognise that one of the disincentives to local government in managing housing benefit is the enormous administrative cost associated with that benefit, which must be borne by local government? In effect, local government throughout the country is asked to subsidise the Department of Social Security in that respect. Will the Minister make proposals fully to fund all the costs of administering housing benefit?

Mr. Field: The answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is that I shall think about it.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): Does the Minister of State essentially agree with the Public Accounts Committee's report and its general criticism? Will he tell the House when he is likely to introduce a Green Paper on the changes?

Mr. Field: The Public Accounts Committee's report is a serious document, and I drafted part of the reply to it. As with the Green Paper on welfare reform, counter-fraud proposals will be brought before the House soon.

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons why we have such a legacy of fraud in housing benefit is the reduction in assistance to local authorities that the previous Government introduced in their final days, which prevents local authorities from effectively detecting and prosecuting fraud? Does he agree that another problem is the failure to ensure that we have a coherent information technology system linking the Benefits Agency and local government, as I witnessed when I worked in Luton Benefits Agency office for a day last week? The information technology system is crumbling and needs greater co-ordination. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that measures are taken swiftly so that we have a comprehensive review of the information technology system to link the Benefits Agency and local government and achieve more effective tracking of housing benefit and fraud?

Mr. Field: My hon. Friend's second question is linked to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). That is an issue that we take seriously. We are also concerned that some local authorities do not bring any prosecutions whatever. The biggest fine that fraudsters can face is the loss of benefit, and they can then continue to claim in the same local authority area or that of a neighbouring local authority. I hope that shortly we shall put plans before the House which deal with each of my hon. Friend's questions.

Minimum Wage

10. Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): What is her estimate of the net effect on benefit levels of the introduction of the minimum wage. [47477]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Keith Bradley): The national minimum wage is one element of the Government's strategy to make work pay. People receiving in-work benefits may see a reduction in the amount of benefit paid, as they would with any increase in income. However, the current benefit system is structured so that increases in income are not deducted pound for pound from benefit entitlement.

The introduction of the working families tax credit and the child care tax credit will increase the return from work for low and middle-income families with children and ensure that recipients keep more of any increase in income. In addition, major changes in the national insurance system from April 1999 will reduce contributions for low-paid workers.

Mr. Loughton: Will the Minister confirm that, if a single mother of two who is working full time and currently earning £3 an hour is lucky enough still to have a job when the minimum wage of £3.60 is introduced, her family income will rise by just £3 per week, with £2 clawed back by the Exchequer in lost benefit? Only 7.5p per hour will go to that employee. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, for all the soundbites about attacking poverty pay, the minimum wage is just a tax on business, designed as a revenue-raising exercise for the Treasury?

Mr. Bradley: The national minimum wage is an essential part of our strategy to put a floor under in-work benefits and ensure, by combining the minimum wage with the working families tax credit and the child care tax credit, that people in work are significantly better off than they are currently. We shall ensure that, as the national minimum wage and the changes that we are making to in-work benefits through the tax system unfold, people see the benefit that the Government are bringing about by that combination of measures.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Is it not a fact that those on low pay throughout the country know that, as a result of what the Government are doing on the national minimum wage, national insurance, tax and benefits, they will get a much fairer deal than they ever would have done under a Tory Government? Is it not also a fact that employers paying a fair wage to their employees are fed up with paying in taxation to subsidise those who are paying poverty pay?

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right on every point.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): With several reports this morning showing that Britain sadly appears to be on the edge of a recession, I wonder what work the Department of Social Security has done to estimate what the impact of a minimum wage will be if the economy is to dip into recession, bearing in mind the fact that the minimum wage will not only increase the wage bill nationally for those on low pay, but have a knock-on effect on differentials.

Mr. Bradley: I refer the hon. Lady to the appropriate Departments: the Department of Trade and Industry for the national minimum wage and the Treasury for the state of the economy. However, on the changes that we are making in the social security system, the working families tax credit and the child care disregard have been warmly welcomed throughout the country by those who recognise that work should pay, and that employers should pay a decent wage.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Whenever a Conservative Member gets up to attack the minimum wage, would it not be useful to find out how many jobs that Tory Member has and the likely total income received? Is it not the height of hypocrisy for such people to criticise a scheme which would give the lowest-paid workers something of a lift-up?

Mr. Bradley: Once again, my hon. Friend makes a valid point. The previous Government were not prepared to put a floor under benefit levels. They allowed family credit and other in-work benefits to take the strain of low wages, ensuring that very poor employers did not take their responsibilities seriously and provide a decent wage for their employees.

Part-time Workers Directive

11. Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): What assessment she has made of the impact on women of implementing the part-time workers directive. [47478]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Women (Ms Joan Ruddock): This Government are committed to part-time workers having at least the same rights as full-time workers. This is particularly important to women as 83 per cent. of part-time workers are women. Implementation of the part-time workers directive will remove discrimination against them and increase the status of part-time work generally. This, I suggest, is a positive step for all those who choose to work part time in order to balance work and family life.

Judy Mallaber: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does she share my regret that Britain, which has the second highest proportion of part-time workers in Europe, is one of the last countries in Europe to introduce legislation covering part-time workers? Does she agree that the 1984 equal pay directive was implemented inadequately, creating hurdles for women seeking equal treatment, and that such directives provide minimum standards on which Governments may improve? Will she therefore give an assurance that she will work closely with her colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry to ensure that the directive is implemented in a way that gives effective rights to part-time workers?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for that thoughtful question. I very much share her concern that, as a result of the previous Government's failure to sign the social chapter, employees in this country were denied a raft of improvements to their working lives. She draws attention to the deficiencies of the equal pay legislation. I assure her that we share the concern that it has not brought equality of pay to women; at present, women are paid about 80 per cent. of the average for men.

The Equal Opportunities Commission has been undertaking a consultation on that matter, and soon we, as a Government, will receive its recommendations. I assure my hon. Friend that the Ministers for Women are working closely with the Department for Education and Employment in considering those recommendations and preparing to give our opinions on them. We are also working closely with the Department of Trade and Industry to ensure that women's interests are served by the proper implementation, as my hon. Friend suggests, of the part-time workers directive in United Kingdom law.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Given the changing patterns of work in the United Kingdom, which are to be welcomed, and given the great value of part-time jobs to women and, indeed, to men, does the Minister agree that the steps rightly taken to protect those jobs should be balanced by our making sure that there is sufficient scope for latitude in regulation, so as not to hinder the creation of many more part-time jobs for women?

Ms Ruddock: The hon. Gentleman has not asked me a specific question. The wording of his remarks is not at all clear. As he knows, the Government have repeatedly said that we want flexibility at the workplace, properly protecting workers but preserving the interests of employers who have taken advantage of flexibility and given us a vibrant economy.

Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale): Does my hon. Friend agree that the part-time workers directive is part of the Government's acknowledgement that family-friendly employment is essential to create stable environments at home and at work? We must ensure that women can continue to play a vital role in employment—there has been an explosion in the number of women in part-time work—and that they can work secure in the knowledge that there will still be enough flexibility for them as mothers to play a full role in home life, especially when the children are sick. Can my hon. Friend assure me that the Ministers for Women will work with the Department of Trade and Industry team to ensure that the White Paper on family-friendly employment considers the responsibilities of women and families when children are sick, and when women need to dip in and out of employment?

Ms Ruddock: My hon. Friend will be aware that the Government have in circulation a consultation document on fairness at work, which lists the ways in which the Government propose to legislate for a range of opportunities for people to combine their working lives with good parenting. For example, the parental leave directive which is to come into UK law will make provision for people to have time off work around the time of the birth or adoption of a child. We are also considering time off for family emergencies. The consultation will attempt to define such emergencies.

We recognise overall that child care provision must underpin employability and opportunities, especially for women who still have the major caring responsibilities. For both women and men, family-friendly employment practices by employers will be encouraged and promoted by the Government, because we consider that appropriate in modern times.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): As was evident from the figures that the Minister gave in response to the main question, part-time work offers many women opportunities to enter the workplace that flexibly meet their needs and those of their family circumstances. Conservative Members have noted that, when asked to do so by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), the Minister failed to support the continuing need for a flexible economy and an increase in the number of part-time jobs for women.

From the figures that the Minister gave, it is clear that any loss of part-time jobs will disproportionately affect women. What assessment has she made, therefore, of the number of women who will lose their part-time job as a result of the Government's policy to sign up to the social chapter? What discussions has she had with fellow Ministers on the impact of that policy on women, or was she absent when the discussion of the impact of that policy on women was held, as she was when her right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster announced the Government's new policy on the appointment of women to public bodies?

Ms Ruddock: I shall answer the second point first. I am sure that the House is unaware that the hon. Lady referred to an occasion on which I was not present when the publication of an important document on public appointments of women and men was announced. The Ministers for Women had contributed substantially to that programme. We have a principled position of 50:50 women and men in public appointments. For various reasons, the date chosen for the announcement was one on which I was speaking at an important conference in Bristol. There is no difference between my right hon. and hon. Friends and me on these matters: 50:50 women and men in public appointments, which the previous Government signally failed to achieve.

The hon. Lady asked whether any assessment had been made of the number of women who would lose their part-time jobs as a result of the Government's policy of signing up to the social chapter. The Government as a whole have examined the issue of the social chapter, and the various measures that we think will improve the conditions of United Kingdom workers in comparison with those in other member states. We have not concluded that those measures will result in a loss of jobs; on the contrary, the view of the Government, employers and workers themselves is that they will provide a flexibility in the workplace that will enable our workers to continue to enjoy opportunity and employment. We do not think that there is any question of the new measures' leading, in themselves, to a reduction in jobs.

Pensioners

13. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): If she will review the 25p per week pension addition to pensioners aged over 80 years. [47480]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): The pensions review is looking at the central areas of insecurity for elderly people, including the value and uprating of the basic pension.

Mr. Prentice: Is it not an absolute disgrace that the 25p age addition for pensioners over 80 has not been increased since its introduction in 1971? If it had been uprated since then, it would probably now be worth about £1.70 or £1.80. Is it not a fact that what pensioners over 80 really want is a decent state pension? If we are to continue with the age addition, it should be uprated—otherwise it should be scrapped.

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend is right: no Government have uprated the age addition since it was introduced. That is one of the reasons why a fundamental pensions review is necessary.

Many older pensioners are the poorest, which is why the House has welcomed the pilot projects set up by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to look into ways of securing more automatic help for the poorest pensioners. As the House has already heard this afternoon, we are finding that those pensioners—many of whom are the oldest—are going without between 24p and £51 a week, and we are taking action to deal with that problem for the benefit of the poorest and oldest pensioners.

New Deal (Sick and Disabled People)

16. Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): If she will make a statement on the consultation process undertaken in connection with the new deal for sick and disabled people. [47483]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): The Government have four strategies for helping disabled people who want to work. We are providing the active help and encouragement that people with disabilities need to move into work under the new deal for disabled people; taking obstacles to work out of the benefits system; making sure that work pays; and promoting radical change in the workplace to ensure equality and opportunity.

In developing the new deal, we have been consulting closely with disabled people and the organisations that represent them, and with other interested parties. We have ensured consultation at each key stage of the programme's development, and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Oaten: Does the Minister share the concern felt by many disability groups about the fact that, of all the new deal programmes, those aimed at encouraging disabled people to return to work are taking the longest to get off the ground? We were promised that the contracts for the pilot schemes would be awarded in June, but to date there has been no announcement. Can the Minister reaffirm his Government's commitment to making progress, so that disability groups realise that getting disabled people back to work is at the top rather than the bottom of the Government's agenda?

Mr. Denham: It is not true that disabled people are at the bottom of the Government's agenda. The new deal pilots are very important, as we need to establish what measures will be most effective in enabling disabled people to work.

We received more than 120 bids in the first tranche of bidding for the new deal pilot projects. We aim to let the first contract shortly, and I hope that we shall be able to make an announcement very soon.

Disability Living Allowance

17. Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): If the mobility component of disability living allowance related to people living in accommodation provided by the NHS will be included within the welfare benefits review. [47485]

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): Yes.

Mr. Shaw: I am grateful for that reply, succinct as it was. Is my right hon. Friend aware that people with learning disabilities and physical handicaps who move from long-stay hospitals to live in community homes run by health trusts are classed as in-patients? As a consequence of changes to the higher mobility component within disability living allowance that were introduced in 1996, they are no longer able to claim it. Such people, however, are classed as out-patients in respect of prescription charges and are allowed to receive the benefits of that classification. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is an anomaly, and that a review is required? Will he liaise with the Department of Health to ensure that that vulnerable group of people are able to get out and about, as they need to if they are to take part in community life?

Mr. Field: Yes to the first question; yes to the second; and yes to the third.

Additional Pension Contributions

18. Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): What representations she has received on the subject of individuals being required by law to make additional pension contributions into private sector funds. [47486]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): Many submissions to the pensions review have argued that compulsory second-tier pensions should be extended to groups not covered, and that the minimum second-tier contribution should be raised from current levels. We are looking at these proposals seriously, and will publish our response in a Green Paper on pensions later this year.

Mr. Brazier: The previous Government were rightly proud of the growth in private sector pension provision and the rise in living standards for millions of pensioners which that has provided and will provide. Will the Minister none the less accept that if any Government went further than encouraging such provision, and coerced people by the force of law to engage in it, they would be morally obliged to stand behind any such fund which failed?

Mr. Denham: As I said earlier, we are considering these issues carefully, and the type of pension vehicle that might be suitable for second pension savings is an important part of our consideration. It is certainly true that, whatever we do on pension policy, we need more cost-effective, value-for-money and flexible second pensions than are currently available, especially for those who cannot join an occupational pension scheme. We must not, under any circumstances, have a repeat of the pension mis-selling scandal for which the previous Government were so clearly largely responsible.

Madam Speaker: Dr. Iddon.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): Thank you, Madam Speaker. On a previous occasion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Question 19."] I beg your pardon, Madam Speaker; Question 19.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): My hon. Friend has a speech for every occasion.

Benefit Integrity Project

19. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South–East): If she will make a statement on measures taken to improve the quality of treatment under the benefit integrity project of those suffering from mental illness. [47488]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): The benefit integrity project seeks to secure the correctness of certain awards of disability living allowance. In June 1998, we decided that people who have been awarded DLA because they fall within our definition of severe mental impairment should not be contacted directly as part of the project.

We are working closely with disability organisations to improve the operation of the project.

Dr. Iddon: It is Monday, I am afraid, Madam Speaker. On a previous—

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): At least my hon. Friend has that one right.

Dr. Iddon: On a previous occasion—if my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) will allow me to continue—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State kindly told the House that she was discussing with Mencap the way in which mentally ill people are dealt with by the benefit integrity project. My hon. Friend the Minister has also told the House that seriously mentally ill people might be excluded from it. I welcome what he has said this afternoon, but my concern is that a large number of mentally ill people are still losing their benefits by being put through the benefit integrity project. May I suggest that more sympathetic consideration be given and that specialist doctors be employed so that we can genuinely assess those people?

Mr. Denham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support for the further changes that we have made to the operation of the benefit integrity project. I can of course assure him that we shall continue to meet and consult organisations of and for disabled people on the project's operation, and we shall always consider further proposals for the improvement of its running. We take steps to ensure that those who advise our adjudication officers on DLA decisions are properly medically qualified to deal with the range of conditions that come before them and to seek additional information where that is necessary.

Home Buyers

21. Ms Linda Perham (Ilford, North): What plans she has to assist home buyers on income support following the recent further rise in interest rates. [47491]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): There are no plans at present to change the way in which help with mortgage interest is calculated, using a standard rate. The standard rate is based on variable rates of mortgage interest that are charged by the main building societies and excludes discounted and fixed-rate mortgages, which are available to many borrowers.

Ms Perham: I welcome that answer. Actually, I do not welcome it; I am so used to saying that sort of thing.

Every time interest rates go up, another trickle of people come to my surgeries who are on income support and who find it very difficult to meet the payments. Will Ministers continue to liaise with the Council of Mortgage Lenders to take a sympathetic attitude on repossessions?

Mr. Bradley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We have regular discussions with the Council of Mortgage Lenders and it assures us that it will take a sympathetic approach to ensure that people remain in their homes. I announced an increase in the standard rate to 8.34 per cent. from 31 May and the Government are committed, through their housing review, to ensuring that there is sustainable home ownership.

Child Support

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): Madam Speaker, with your permission, I will make a statement on the Government's Green Paper on reform of the child support system.

We promised to reform the welfare state, so that it is modern and fair and strikes the right balance between rights and responsibilities—reform on the basis of work for those who can, and security for those who cannot. Children are first and foremost the responsibility of their parents, but we have a responsibility as a Government to ensure that parents are in a position to support them—that they are working if they can—and that children get the support they need. That is why, as a Government, we place so much emphasis on policies for families. We have increased child benefit for all families. We have embarked on a major welfare-to-work programme to ensure that mothers and fathers can work and improve their children's standard of living.

The new deal for lone mothers will ensure that mothers work, if they can. The new deal for the long-term unemployed and the young unemployed will mean that fathers, many for the first time, can support their children through work. Those new deals, with the minimum wage and the working families tax credit, are important parts of banishing child poverty. Therefore, welfare to work, the first part of our welfare reform, is under way. The second step in welfare reform, to ensure that children are properly supported by their non-resident father, is what I bring to the House today.

The child support system is like no other part of social security. In most of the benefit system, there are just two stakeholders: the benefit recipient and the taxpayer. In child support, there are four: the child who needs an adequate standard of living and is entitled to the father's support; the father who has a responsibility to support the child and needs enough left to live on and to discharge his other responsibilities; taxpayers who need both to support their own children and to contribute through their taxes to prevent other people's children from living in poverty; and the mother, who needs a dependable source of income for her family.

Getting the system right and fair for all four is not an easy task. Few people would seriously disagree with those objectives of child support. Most agree that the current system is not working to deliver them.

In identifying the need for reform, I seek to make no party political criticism of the previous Government. We are all wiser with the benefit of hindsight. Nor will I dwell for too long on the statistics that show the failings of the child support system, except to remind the House that there are 1.8 million children living in families on income support or family credit, in respect of whom fathers pay no maintenance at all. One in six of all children in this country are being brought up supported only by their mothers working, or, more usually, by the benefits system. What message does it send to boys, who may one day become fathers themselves, when the financial responsibilities of fatherhood can be wholly delegated either to the welfare state or to the mother alone?

Seventy per cent. of lone mothers claiming income support try to avoid co-operating with the Child Support Agency. Their co-operation takes their time and energy, and can cause further conflict with the child's father, but if they are not working, it brings no financial gain to their children, as all the maintenance paid by the father is deducted from their benefit.

The formula for assessing maintenance is so complicated that the CSA has to spend 90 per cent. of its time assessing maintenance or keeping assessments up to date, and it is left with only 10 per cent. of its time to chase up payments. The complexity of the formula means that fathers do not know where they stand, and often the first demand for maintenance tells them that they are already thousands of pounds in arrears. Complexity leads to errors.

Our reform of child support involves replacing the byzantine complexity of the current formula with a simple percentage. The assessment of maintenance will no longer require more than 100 separate bits of information. It will no longer require fathers to report their new partner's income. It will rely only on identifying the number of children the father has, where the children live and how much income he has after deduction of tax and national insurance.

We propose that, for one child, 15 per cent. is deducted from the father's net income and paid in maintenance; for two children, 20 per cent.; and for three or more children, 25 per cent. There will be special rules for fathers with a low income. For fathers who are on benefit or whose net income is below £100, we propose maintenance of £5 a week, with a sliding scale for those between £100 and £200.

In assessing the amount of maintenance, we propose to take into account children in a second family. Our Green Paper sets out, for consultation, two different options for reaching the right balance between the children in the first and second families, but both our options are about taking second families into account.

Moving from a complex formula to a simple percentage will have a number of advantages. Men who father a child with a woman with whom they are not living will know that they will have to pay 15 per cent. of their weekly income to that child for the next 16 years. Men who separate from their wife and children will know, before they take on other commitments, that they will have to put money on one side for their children. The CSA will be able to spend dramatically less time assessing maintenance, and more time ensuring that it is paid. Everyone will understand the system. The aim is to ensure that more fathers pay, rather than that fathers pay more.

There is also the issue of what the children receive when the fathers pay. Almost from the outset, the complaint has been made that, for every pound paid in maintenance by the father a pound is deducted from the mother's income support. When mothers who are not working co-operate with the Child Support Agency, it may mean that maintenance is paid by the father, but no maintenance is received by the child. Fathers who do not pay feel that they are merely defying the CSA, and are not disadvantaging their own children.

We are proposing to change that. The child will, in future, receive a child maintenance premium. The first £10 of maintenance paid will go to the mother for the child, and will not be deducted from her benefit. So when a father pays, he will know that he is fulfilling his responsibilities and that his child is better off. When a mother on income support co-operates with the CSA, she will ensure that he is paying his fair share, and that the child gets up to £10 more a week.

As well as a simple percentage, we need a better child support service. We propose a three-stage process. First, when the mother applies for maintenance, the father will be contacted. In most cases, an assessment can be made over the telephone, and he can start paying right away. Secondly, if either parent has concerns about the assessment, there will be a review, where the situation can be explained or sorted out. Thirdly, if either parent wants to challenge the basis of the assessment—for example, the calculation of income—their case can be assessed by an independent tribunal.

We also propose that the tribunal should be able to set maintenance at a different percentage rate if the non-resident parent can show that he incurs special expenses in supporting the child—for example, where the cost of paying the maintenance will make him unable to afford the costs of visiting the child.

Although we propose these reforms, there will need to be time to consult, to take legislation through the House and then to change the computer systems. However, people currently in the system cannot wait that long to see progress. We need to do what we can within the existing system to make it work better for them.

We therefore intend to press forward with the introduction of more telephone lines, and service outside normal working hours. We will take further action to tackle the backlog. We will spend an extra £12 million this year, in addition to £30 million already committed over the next two years to sharpen up our service.

The CSA staff have borne much of the brunt of the complexity and unpopularity of the system. Much of the criticism that should have been directed at the system has been heaped on them—usually unfairly. However, we are counting on them—and I know we can do so—to improve the current system and then make a first-class job of the new system.

This is a Green Paper. Its proposals are for consultation until the end of November this year. We hope that there will be the widest possible debate. To ensure that fathers, mothers and the taxpayer all feel that the system is fair is not an easy task. The need for reform is obvious. The demand for reform has been voiced in hours of debate in this House, hundreds of pages of official reports and thousands of letters of public complaints. I believe that we have charted a new way forward.

I will conclude with a word of caution. Relations between men and women are not always easy. Relations between men and women who are parents of the same child but do not share the same home are often intensely difficult. No reform of the child support system can ever change that, but it can work better than it does now, and it can better serve those children who have a right to the support of both their parents, irrespective of where they live. It is above all for them that I present the Green Paper to the House today.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): I thank the Secretary of State for her courtesy in giving us the Green Paper and her statement at 12.30 pm today. That was much appreciated, and gave us the opportunity to look at them in detail.

This is a very important statement—no one for one moment would downgrade it. The Opposition welcome the idea—stated by the Minister of State and the Secretary of State today—that, in essence, because the House of Commons was the place that put through the original legislation and agreed it, it is the House of Commons that must rectify the problems and inequities. We must all shoulder that requirement across the board, regardless of party.

I wish to concentrate on the questions arising from the statement. I hope that I can do so constructively, but some of the questions are detailed; if they cannot be answered now, I hope that answers will be placed in the Library or sent to me.

The Government claim that, as a result of the disregard, 75 per cent. of absent parents and parents with care will be better off. Will the Secretary of State give full details of the gainers and losers, as calculated by the Department? If those calculations have not been made, I hope that they will be. For example, will the disregard be for both in-work and out-of-work benefits? I am not sure of the answer, even after reading the statement and the Green Paper.

The Government also claim that the change to the system will be revenue-neutral, but have they included the cost of the £10 disregard and of the transitory arrangements in that calculation? How will the system apply? It is not clear whether the Secretary of State intends changes on that; will the new system apply to people on benefits, or to everyone regardless of whether one of the partners is on benefit?

The Secretary of State made much of simplicity, which is a great goal. However, the claim that the arrangements can be made over the telephone may be a touch optimistic, given some of the complex questions that arise. She said that there would be alterations for those with second families, and she offers alternatives. What is the basis for the two alternatives—which are very different—in the Green Paper, and what calculations will the Department make on the implications for both the taxpayer and the absent parents?

Paragraph 27 of the Green Paper deals with special expenses. It says:

"We therefore propose to allow a tribunal to set a different level of maintenance in certain, exceptional, circumstances."

That is part of the real key; it raises a huge issue, from which I do not think anyone should shy away.

What effect will a tribunal have on the system's simplicity? We could be shifting all the decision-making problems from the first part of the system to a second stage. I understand—I am not certain of this—that a similar problem has arisen in Australia. There is simplicity in the first instance, but all the tribunal cases and exemptions jam up the system later, so nothing is solved.

How much variation from the flat rate will a tribunal be allowed? What will the special expenses include? How will the new system deal with those on low incomes with high living and travelling costs, which currently count as protected income, but would not under a simple, flat-rate system?

Will a tribunal have the flexibility to include housing costs, high travel-to-work costs, high travelling costs to see the children, allowances for pensions, long-term illness or disability, pre-separation debt that the absent parent took on for the benefit of the family, pre-1993 financial arrangements that cannot be stopped or that it would be unreasonable to stop, and pre-1993 transfers of property or capital that were not fully reflected in the maintenance assessment? If a tribunal has to assess all those matters, the system will quickly lose its simplicity and speed. Those issues must be addressed.

The Green Paper acknowledges the problem of dealing with existing assessments, which was one of the main problems that the Child Support Agency encountered. It is unclear in the Green Paper—I may be wrong—exactly what the Government plan to do. I think that the Secretary of State is being a touch optimistic when she says in paragraph 7 on page 40:

"We are simply suggesting a change in liability within existing agreements, similar to the re-assessment that takes place when parents' circumstances change."

That brief section of the Green Paper holds the key to whether the changes will be perceived as a success. What calculations has the Department made of the costs of option A and option B, which are outlined in the section?

Dealing with the backlog could be the biggest problem. The Green Paper does not seem to deal with the CSA's backlog and how those cases that still await assessment will be resolved under the new system. That will give rise to some of the most divisive issues; there may be iniquity between those who have co-operated and finalised their assessments and those who will now deliberately delay because they recognise that a new assessment may be made. How will the Secretary of State deal with those backlog cases? Does she recommend considering them on the basis of the new system, or is she saying that all cases are backlog? The Green Paper points to that, but I am not certain how it will work when the cases come in.

What research has the Department carried out into the setting of the percentage? Who will be the gainers and the losers in that area? The backlog will create some problems. Some people may say, "I would rather have been assessed under the new system than the old," and others may say the reverse.

When will the legislation be introduced? That is an important question for the Secretary of State. We have the Green Paper and presumably we will have a White Paper, and then the legislation. If the system is introduced around the millennium, it will have another impact, as she will be asking her Department to make major changes in the way it makes calculations through its computer system, at the same time as it is being asked to make such changes as a result of the millennium. The Government need to think about that carefully, and I wonder whether they have. What are the cost implications of those sorts of changes?

Finally, what did the Secretary of State mean when she said that the absent parent would be paying 15 per cent. of his net pay for the next 16 years at least? Might there be some other changes beyond 16 years, and what does she mean by net payments—what does she include or not include?

The main point about which many lone parents, particularly absent fathers, are concerned is the way in which the other partner in the marriage, the ex-marriage or the relationship often uses access rights as a tool against the absent father—or, in this case, the absent mother. What discussions has the right hon. Lady had with other Departments to find out what can be done about that and whether there are other ways in which those problems can be resolved, when rights might already have been laid down by the courts?

To depart for a moment from the sense of common purpose, I must point out that much of this statement was already known to the public at large as a result of a series of leaks. Perhaps the Secretary of State could also say how, on 25 January, The Sunday Times and The Sunday Telegraph came up with the points that are in the Green Paper; how The Observer and The Sunday Telegraph reported the "extra cash" that lone parents were to receive on 28 June; and how The Daily Telegraph on 29 June reported that there would be a sliding scale reducing the assessments made for absent parents. How did The Daily Telegraph and the "Today" programme come up with the 15 per cent. calculation on Monday 29 June, and why did the story about the £10 bonus appear in The Guardian and The Times on 2 July?

This is a big issue for the House. It is the last chance for the Child Support Agency to prove itself—to prove whether it will work and whether it can resolve the problems with which it was meant to deal. To use a hackneyed expression, perhaps it is dining in the last chance saloon. Perhaps the CSA never can work—we do not know, but we will see. We want changes to be made to make the system work. Therefore, the question for the Secretary of State is whether it will work. We will judge that success against the answers to those questions. I wish it, as ever, the best of luck in securing that outcome.

Ms Harman: I thank the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) for the genuinely constructive spirit in which he greeted the Green Paper. I, too, deplore the leaks. I have done no briefing of our proposals, and nor has anyone on my behalf. I regret the fact that the details were in the newspapers before they came to the House.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions, which were all relevant and important, and I will try to deal with them quickly one by one to enable as many other hon. Members as possible to ask questions on this important topic.

There will be a £10 child maintenance premium for those on income support, which will be paid to the mother for the child only if the maintenance is paid. For family credit, the child maintenance premium will be £15, so there will still be that incentive to work.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the assertion that the system will be revenue-neutral. In calculating revenue neutrality, we took into account the cost of the child maintenance premium and the transitional cost that he rightly identified of moving from the existing to the new system. The system is for those on benefits as well as for what are described as private cases.

The point about tribunals is extremely important. If something has gone wrong in the assessment of income or there is a dispute about where the children are living, people must have the right to go to an independent tribunal. A large amount of people's weekly income is affected, so either side must have the opportunity to put a case before an independent tribunal, exactly as happens with tax affairs. That is essential for the credibility of the system.

[Ms Harman]

The hon. Gentleman rightly identified the fact that the gateway to the tribunal will be critical in striking a balance between people perceiving that the system is fair, and not going back to all the complexities and individual variations that have bedevilled the current system and have been the central reason for its failure.

I believe that the tribunals should be able to consider matters of fact and assessment about income, the number of children, and where they live. We propose that the tribunal should be able to vary the percentage of income paid in maintenance if there are special issues relating to the cost of child support: for example, when there is a choice between making the payments or seeing the child. In the narrow circumstances in which the percentage may affect the emotional and financial support of the child, it is right to allow the tribunal not only to examine all the facts, disputed as they will be, but to assess whether, in an individual case, 15, 20 or 25 per cent. would be fair.

If we do not keep the gateway narrow, we will return to a situation in which everybody appeals automatically, the appeals system will cause delays, we will be back to the same old problems, and the promptness and fairness that we want to introduce will be lost.

The hon. Gentleman talked about people moving from the current system to the new system. New cases will obviously start with the new system once it is introduced. For existing cases, we canvassed two options. People could either move into the new system when they come up for review, which happens every two years, or we could review them in advance by assessing what they would have to pay under the new system; but there would have to be phasing, because it would not be fair for either the non-resident parent or the parent with care suddenly to have a big change in income. We need to do a great deal of work to reduce the backlog. Progress is being made, and that will continue.

The hon. Gentleman asked about timing. We have to hold consultations, do the drafting, introduce legislation and set up computer systems. There is an urgent need for reform, but we simply must get it right. As he said, we cannot afford to get it wrong. There are 1 million non-resident parents, 1 million lone parents, 2 million children and a great deal of money and concern at stake. We must act as fast as we can, but not so fast that we get it wrong.

The young man who has a baby with a woman with whom he is not living would have to pay 15 per cent. for 16 years, but that could be extended to 19 years if the child stays on in further and higher education. The payment for one child will be 15 per cent., but that could last for 16 years or more.

I agree absolutely with what the hon. Gentleman said about rights of access and maintenance. My starting point has always been that children have two parents, and have the right to both the financial and the emotional support of both. The mother does not have the right to deny access to the father when it is in the child's interests and has been ruled so by the courts. Children need not only their parents' money, but their time.

These matters are extremely complex, but I hope that we have made progress, and that that progress can continue.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): Does the Secretary of State agree that the large number of children in Britain affected by family insecurity and the resulting poverty and deprivation will burn a hole in Britain's future unless we make her reforms work? The House of Commons has been good at espousing the principle of parental responsibility, but somewhat shriller in attacking child maintenance in practice. Often, the voice of men has overcome the needs of children.

During consultation, will the Secretary of State do her best to build a true consensus in Parliament, including those parties that have previously attacked the principle? Will she also seek consensus among the public so that we can ingrain in our culture the idea that having a child—as mum or dad—brings rights and joys, but also responsibilities, including the financial responsibility to maintain the child?

Ms Harman: I absolutely agree, and I will do as my hon. Friend suggests. I pay tribute to his important work on child support, and the understanding and wisdom that he has brought to bear.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I, too, welcome the fact that someone is trying, at last, to do something about the Child Support Agency. I also welcome the Secretary of State's important judgment that there is a place for tribunals in the new system. The main question is the size of the gateway. If there is a narrow gateway, a great many people will feel that the system is unfair and that their circumstances have not been properly taken into account. If people cannot agree the amount of maintenance with their ex-partners, that disagreement will be bad for children.

Will not the Secretary of State find, as the experience of the CSA shows, that the small number of exceptions for which she has allowed is bound to grow, until most people, if not all of them, go through the tribunal system? Would it not be best to acknowledge that, and to get the system right now?

Ms Harman: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his congratulations, which I share with the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, Baroness Hollis, who has done a huge amount of work to bring our proposals forward. The hon. Gentleman asked what would be taken into account. The principle is that the system will deal with a specific child, a specific father and the father's responsibility to pay for that child out of his net income. That is the simplification we seek.

A broad gateway, which would allow thousands of matters to be taken into account at tribunal, would take us back to the current system, which is not fair. We must remember that the current system tangled people up until they did not know where they stood. If our system sets a clear percentage, but allows the other parent to go to tribunal and to bring up hundreds of different circumstances that can change the percentage, we will return to lack of clarity. It is fair to set 15 per cent. of net income for one child. That leaves 85 per cent. of net income for the father to spend as he sees fit, or to live on.

The average assessment per father under the new set of formulae will be lower than that under the current system. I know that you, Madam Speaker, take a great interest in assessments, because of Child Support Agency cases in your own constituency. The average assessment per father is £38 under the current system, but the average payment is only £25. Under our system, the average assessment will be about £29, but we expect the average payment to be proportionately higher, because more fathers will pay.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): I should confess that I am the only Member who sat on the Committees that dealt with all three pieces of existing legislation. Will the Secretary of State promise us that, at the end of consultation, there will be a draft Bill, but also draft regulations? With social security, the devil is always in the detail, and no one who dealt with the first Bill foresaw how the regulations would turn out in practice.

Ms Harman: I am sure that my hon. Friend will play an important role in bringing forward this reform. He has had a long-standing interest in this matter on behalf of his constituents and on a wider basis. The number of reports that we have received—to which my hon. Friend has contributed—about the problems with the CSA bear testimony to the need for reform. It is now down to the Government and the House to take that reform forward.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): In welcoming today's statement, may I ask whether the Secretary of State accepts that there could be a danger in moving from a system that is too complex to one that is too simplistic? Will she give an assurance that account will be taken of particular circumstances, such as high travel-to-work costs in certain parts of these islands? Will she ensure also that the net income of self-employed people is assessed? That can be an extremely difficult exercise. Will that sensitivity be built into the system, in order to ensure that it works fairly?

Ms Harman: When it comes to assessing the net income of the self-employed, we shall bring the situation into line with the Revenue, and calculate our assessment on the same basis as that used by the Revenue. There is a big problem with non-compliance with maintenance assessments on the part of the self-employed, and we must sort it out.

The right hon. Gentleman heralds the start of calls to make the system complicated again. We must resist those calls—we have a choice, and we are proposing that we must resist them. We cannot have fairness and complexity side by side. If a system is too complicated, it will be unfair because of its complexity. We think that we shall achieve clarity through simplicity and getting the system right by using the correct percentages. People will know where they stand, and they will be able to start paying right away. That amounts to fairness and justice.

If we are united in our criticism of the current system—and we are—we must recognise that there is only one way forward. Only one substantial change can make the difference: turning our back on the complexity and all the individual circumstances—we tried that approach, and it failed—and moving to a simpler system that is more like the tax system. People pay their taxes on a fixed percentage of their income, and they should be able to pay for their children in the same way.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): The CSA has proved to be very adept at getting large sums of money from people who are salaried, but getting absolutely nothing from the self-employed. What is there in this newly proposed scheme that will carry the power of enforcement so that lone parents do not go through the empty and deeply depressing exercise of asking for moneys that are never forthcoming, and that are constantly taken into account by other agencies?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. She, too, has been a well-informed and balanced critic of the Child Support Agency. Simplifying the formula will allow the Child Support Agency to spend more time on enforcement. Great frustration is experienced by parents with care, who report their circumstances and who believe that they are never looked into because the Child Support Agency is too busy assessing maintenance and has no time to chase up the payments.

If our basis for assessment is the same as that of the Revenue, the self-employed will simply need to show us the assessment that they have given the Revenue, which has been approved, and we can proceed. That is another benefit of simplification. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I have answered the question about enforcement: there will be more time and more co-ordination with the Revenue under the new system, so the situation will be clear.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): Does the right hon. Lady accept that many people believe that the Child Support Agency, as a decision-making body as opposed to an enforcement body, should be abolished? Does she understand that many people believe also that maintenance orders should reflect the individual facts and circumstances of every case? That cannot be addressed through a formula: it involves the exercise of inquiry and discretion.

If that is so, I think that the Secretary of State will accept that that cannot be done by officials. In all circumstances, is it not right to contemplate returning the whole process either to the courts or to quasi-judicial tribunals, and leaving to the agency only the enforcement function?

Ms Harman: One criticism of the court system that preceded the Child Support Agency was that, without a formula and with decisions left to judicial discretion, there was huge variation and a sense of unfairness. One set of parents might be awarded £15-a-week maintenance while another set with an identical income might be awarded £40 a week by a different court. Such unfairness led the previous Administration, with our support, to introduce a formula instead of judicial discretion.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that there is a problem if we seem to give discretion to officials or a bureaucracy. It is much simpler and clearer if officials are responsible for ensuring that the calculation is made correctly, while we decide what is a fair percentage for maintenance. If something goes wrong with the calculations, the tribunals are a quasi-judicial element in the system.

Unfortunately, the courts did not work—I wish they had. The CSA, with its complicated formula, has not worked—I wish it had. We are trying to take it forward. I think that a simple formula with fair rights of appeal offers some hope.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Does my right hon. Friend think that someone should say a big

[Mr. Robin Corbett]

"sorry" to the thousands of people who have suffered anguish and misery from the monumental incompetence of the Child Support Agency? Will she reconsider the backlog? It is estimated that it will take three years to get through it. Is she really going to turn civil servants loose on the impossible task of going back over the ground to do the assessments on the basis that she now proposes? Would it not be sensible to a take some short-term measures to achieve brutal fairness, as it were, until the new formula is in place, in order to avoid expensive duplication?

Ms Harman: We should all say, "Sorry," to the children in respect of whom no maintenance has been paid, to the mothers, to the fathers who have been tangled up in a system that has presented them with thousands of pounds of arrears that they feel that they can never hope to pay, and to the staff who have been given an impossible job. We should all be determined to reform the CSA.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The Secretary of State deserves the support of the whole House in her attempt to reform the CSA. This is the last chance, because much work needs to be done to rebuild public confidence in the CSA after its past actions. I exhort her to hasten slowly. It is right that this be done with due dispatch, but, once this important consultation process is over and a draft Bill is available, will she consider allowing the Select Committee on Social Security to produce a pre-legislative, interim report, so that some of the points on consensus and the complexity of regulations can be properly considered?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman, who is the Chair of the Social Security Select Committee, makes an important proposal by offering that his Committee will consider the legislation in draft and hold pre-legislative hearings. We all feel that, last time, the House agreed the principle but the implementation was not got right. There were some things that we could not have foreseen, but others that we could. I hope that proper consultation—certainly I take up his offer and will make the draft Bill available so that he can conduct pre-legislative hearings—will make the reform proceed on a stronger footing.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the problems with the original scheme in 1992 was that it was pushed through just before a general election? In my view and that of many who were around at the time, it was not properly scrutinised. One of the redeeming features of this scheme is that it will be dealt with in a proper manner. It will get a lot of time, and people will be able to scrutinise it to make sure that we try to get a decent result, notwithstanding the fact that we are talking about trying to find a formula against the changing social fabric of society, and that ain't easy.

Tribunals are important, because that falls into line with other social security tribunals, with many of which we have been involved over many years. May I enter a plea that there should be equal representation of men and women on those panels? May I also argue that there should be no more closures, such as those that took place under the previous Government, of industrial tribunal centres, because they will be used much more than they have been in the past? If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State manages to crack this hard nut, she could get the finest accolade of all—she could end up among Draper's 17 useful people.

Ms Harman: I am sure that my hon. Friend, who, above all, takes seriously his duties in the House, will be a key scrutineer of the Government's proposals. He makes a good point about equal representation: with a three or two-person tribunal, it is right that we should have equal numbers of men and women. He also makes the point about locally accessible tribunals, and that, too, is important. In every town, there are people who have concerns about child support, and we do not need to make it impossible for them to appeal by making them travel miles.

I shall discuss the issue with my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor to ensure that, when we introduce the tribunals, we have equal representation, and that the tribunals are locally accessible. I thank my hon. Friend for making those important points.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): No doubt the Secretary of State will win plaudits for trying to simplify the system, until, that is, we hear in our postbag from the losers—we shall not hear from the gainers, I fear.

Is the right hon. Lady aware that she has created an essentially valueless system? Many people already feel that they can lose their spouse, their home and their children, without any account being taken in existing family law of their behaviour or that of their spouse. Now, it will make no difference whether one wants to go and see one's absent children, or whether one has high travelling costs—nothing will make any difference.

Is the right hon. Lady aware that that will cause much grief and despair, and that, while we might raise children out of physical poverty, we might well reduce them to psychological poverty? Is that the right way of going about things, or should we not have a proper, flexible system that takes account of people's desire, if at all possible, to look after their children, not only financially but physically? Looking after children is about care and compassion, not just money.

Ms Harman: I think that one need not exclude the other. It is important for children to know that their father is financially supporting them, as well as has time for them. I said that in response to an earlier question. There is a morality that runs through the proposal: it is that parents have a responsibility for their children and that children are, first and foremost, the responsibility of their parents. The role of Government is to make sure that children get the financial support to which they are entitled when they do not live with both parents.

I would not say that the system is valueless. It seeks to enforce the value that children are entitled to the financial support of their parents. However, what it does not do is make moral judgments about how families end up as they are. If a Government try to make it a public policy to make men and women stay happy in their marriages, they will not succeed. What we can do, as a Government, is make sure that men and women can work, that they can support their children and that there is a simple system of ensuring that, when the parents separate, the children do not lose financially.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): I welcome the statement today, and the fact that children are put to the forefront of the proposals. I am sure that all of us, when dealing with our case work and leaving our surgeries, wonder about the children who are caught up in the middle of a battle between so-called adults, who are at that time acting more like young children.

Will my right hon. Friend assure us that, in reducing the amount of time that has to be spent on assessment, the development of a more personalised service—one that helps to create better communication between both parents and a better understanding of what is necessary for parents to comply—is prioritised? People's dissatisfaction at not being able to have face-to-face meetings adds to the stress, and often to the hostility between the two parents.

Ms Harman: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. CSA staff will need to spend less time sweating over a hot computer making endless calculations. Even if they can understand those calculations, they can never hope to explain them to those who will have to pay under the assessments. They will therefore be able to spend more time on enforcement and chasing up payment, and on explaining the payments and the basis of the assessments, so there will be a more personalised face-to-face service.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): The Secretary of State has been as clear as she possibly can be about the existing flexibility in the system, such as travel-to-work costs, housing costs and debt costs, which are all to be removed under the right hon. Lady's new plans. Bearing in mind the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), when he said that there will be losers in the system, who will be banging on our surgery doors, will the right hon. Lady give us an estimate of how many losers her Department thinks there will be?

Ms Harman: The hon. Lady talks about losers. How would she describe the 200,000 or more fathers who we think, with a simplified system, will end up paying maintenance for the first time? Presumably, on the hon. Lady's balance sheet, she would describe them as losers. Surely we could not possibly describe those fathers just as losers without explaining that their children will be gainers from their paying maintenance to the tune of up to £10 a week.

That is the difficulty that I tried to set out at the outset. There is a square formed by the taxpayer, the child, the father and the mother. Although it is important under the new system to consider what people's relative but different situations will be, the simple assertion of gainers and losers, which we are able to use in other parts of the benefits system, tells only part of the story in this instance.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement? I am sure that the House will appreciate its importance and the need for it. I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces in his place, because last week I received a letter from a regimental sergeant after 22 years of service in the Army, serving his country. He has been charged more than £600 a month out of his salary by the CSA. Not one penny of that is going to his children or the wife. He has been forced out of employment. The position is the same throughout the gamut of employment. The CSA, which has been a disaster, has forced people out of employment into dependency, costing the taxpayer more, not less.

I make a special plea for the single parent, usually a mother, who is in employment, where the CSA has walked away from her because she was not in benefit and did not chase the other parent to pay a fair contribution to the children.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the CSA supporting the mother in work to ensure that the father pays a fair share, and that she has a reliable income stream to go towards the children.

Perhaps I can offer to look into the specific case to which my hon. Friend has referred just to check that everything is in order in the circumstances that he has outlined. Finally, may I say how good it is to see my hon. Friend back, and in what great shape he looks?

Sir David Madel (South-West Bedfordshire): A frequent mistake made by the CSA is to add overtime and bonus payments to basic pay and assume that it is all basic pay. The result is that people receive demands for increased contributions during the financial year. Will the reforms stop the CSA demanding increases until the end of the financial year, when it and the Revenue will know how much has been earned?

As Members, will we have the power to call in tribunals to examine particular cases? Here is one such case. When an ex-wife stops earning because she has remarried to somebody who is not short of a bob, why should the ex-husband receive a demand for an increased payment to the CSA? There must be something wrong there.

As for CSA staff, my constituents are always polite and courteous, as I am sure are those of all other Members. All our constituents are polite and courteous. Therefore, we expect CSA staff to be equally polite and courteous to our constituents, with the result that everybody will be happier.

Ms Harman: The income of the first wife's new husband or partner will not be taken into account in the new system. We shall look only at the father's income, and his financial responsibility to the child. With the complexity in the investigation of countless different personal circumstances in which the CSA has been engaged, there has come a sense of invasion of privacy and of things being taken into account that really should not be. The simplicity of the new formula should remove that, and the CSA will not have to ask whether a man is a new boyfriend or whether he is just passing by.

We are not proposing that Members of Parliament should be able to take cases to the tribunals. The only parties who would be able to do so are the parents.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree that many parents who are living apart share not only custody but care of their children, and that such arrangements should be encouraged and supported? If necessary, will she consider making available taxpayers' money to pay for the extra travelling and housing costs that such arrangements might entail?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point. In the old days, it was very simple—the man and woman were married, they had children, and if he left, she kept the children and he saw them at weekends. Under the current system, that pattern is increasingly less common. There are much more complicated arrangements of shared care, which are often in the interests of the children, who spend the maximum amount of time with both parents.

To reduce maintenance liability, the current system takes such arrangements into account only if the child spends 104 nights or more with the non-resident parent. We propose that, for the purposes of setting maintenance, the level should be 52 nights or more, and for every night that the child spends with the non-resident parent, his weekly maintenance liability should be reduced by one seventh. That is fair, and it is not a complexity that people could not understand or would not think was fair.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Given that most countries that have a fixed percentage formula apply the formula to the father's gross income, will the Secretary of State explain why she decided that her formula should apply to the net income? Secondly, will she confirm to the House that the criterion that brings the CSA into play in the first place—namely, that the spouse with care is on income support or that one of the spouses elects to involve the CSA—will not change as a result of her statement today or the Green Paper?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman asks whether it is right to base the formula on an assessment of gross income or net income. The important point is that people are able to understand how much money they have left after deductions of tax and national insurance, which are then taken out of the picture, how much of their remaining income they should allocate for their child, and how much they then have left to live on. I am afraid that I did not catch the hon. Gentleman's subsequent question.

Mr. Gibb: It was about the criterion for involving the CSA.

Ms Harman: If a lone parent makes a claim for income support or family credit, that triggers an application for child support. If a lone parent who is not on benefit makes an application, that, too, triggers an application for child support. We do not envisage proposing to change either of those criteria.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): Given that between 40 and 60 per cent. of CSA decisions are deemed to be in error, I very much welcome the statement, as other hon. Members have. I welcome also my right hon. Friend's agreement that the Social Security Select Committee may have an opportunity to consider the proposals prior to legislation being introduced. Will my right hon. Friend urge the Select Committee to include in its consideration and consultation process the inefficiencies and incompetence of the CSA's operations, without putting the blame for those on staff? Simplification will help, but it will not remove all the problems.

Ms Harman: I know that my hon. Friend takes very seriously his role on the Select Committee. He implied that he would like to examine further the administrative nitty-gritty of the system. I welcome that, and I am sure that the staff would also welcome it. He has played a key role in issues of child poverty. He is right to refer to the high error rate. We must deal with those issues, and I look forward to my hon. Friend's important and constructive involvement in the debate.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): May I wish the right hon. Lady well on the inevitable tightrope that she will have to walk in the coming months, before any legislation reaches the statute book?

Will the right hon. Lady please clear up an issue that is causing concern? As I understood it, she said, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), that the new arrangements would apply to parents on benefit as well as to those who are not on benefit but who make their own private arrangements. If that is what she said, it suggests that she is planning to extend the remit of the Child Support Agency to all families in which the relationship has broken down, and it is important that she tells us whether that is right.

If the right hon. Lady is planning to keep the criterion as it is, that is understandable; but if she is suggesting that she will extend it, in accordance with the original, 1991, plans—later abandoned—for the CSA to apply to all relationships that break down, regardless of whether any of the parents are on benefit, that would cause the Opposition great concern, because it would extend the remit and compound the problems that she is trying to mop up by making the system more effective, more efficient and more acceptable.

Ms Harman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me a chance to clear up a misunderstanding that, clearly, I have unintentionally caused. There is no intention that the CSA should extend its remit to cases where parents are not on benefits and where they have not called in the CSA. We have quite enough on our plate for the 1 million on income support, their 1 million former husbands, the 2 million children and all those who are not on income support or family credit who call in the Child Support Agency. I hope that I have put the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest on that.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for his best wishes; why do they give me a sense of unease, though?

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): The Government have placed education at the heart of their agenda but, although we have spent much time on lengthy debates on schools and on higher education, rarely does the House devote time to debating further education. Yet the sector is vital to Britain's future.

It is FE which provides two thirds of all post-school education; which educates the majority of full-time students in the 16 to 19-year-old age cohort; which gives adults that crucial second chance to gain qualifications and skills if they failed at school; which creates the opportunities for access to higher education for those who have traditionally been excluded from it; which provides the vital bridge between education and employment, ensures that individuals have access to appropriate vocational qualifications and personal development opportunities and offers specific training courses to meet employers' requirements; and which provides all adults with access to lifelong learning opportunities, whose purpose may be purely to enrich and where the reward is nothing other than sheer pleasure.

FE plays a crucial role, both in enhancing the nation's competitiveness and in promoting our social well-being; yet, for years, the sector has been the Cinderella of education, and the area subject to the fiercest expenditure cuts. Perhaps that is because FE colleges are seen as less glamorous than universities and less emotive than schools; perhaps it is because, traditionally, Members of the House have had few links with the FE sector; or perhaps Governments have simply failed to realise its importance to the United Kingdom economy.

In the first year of this new Labour Government, schools have rightly been at the forefront of the learning revolution. Schools must form the foundation of any culture of lifelong learning. If children learn the basics in school, they have a sound platform from which to move toward higher learning. However, that does not mean that further education should take a back seat. Indeed, in the view of the Select Committee, further education has a vital contribution to make.

Five years on from the incorporation of colleges seemed a good time for the Select Committee to take stock of the sector, to assess its strengths and weaknesses, and to identify what we believe should be its and the Government's priorities for the future. We did not want to duplicate the valuable work done by Helena Kennedy and her committee, nor the study on lifelong learning recently presented to the Secretary of State by Bob Fryer's committee.

We tried to focus on key areas of current concern and on matters that are vital to the Government's education agenda for qualifications, skills and lifelong learning. We were also determined to place on the political agenda specific recommendations for the Government that we believe that they need to address and on which we think that a public debate is needed. Our report contains 50 detailed recommendations that we believe should equip FE to meet the challenges of the new millennium. Some are more controversial than others; all are important to the future health of the sector.

I know that many hon. Members wish to contribute to today's debate, so I shall focus on only some of the key recommendations. I shall first tackle the issue of funding. It is unquestionable that the FE sector was starved of resources by the previous Government. The Tories released the sector from the shackles of local authority control, only to burden it with unacceptable financial cuts. Although some colleges believe that the problem has been the distribution of the FE funding cake among colleges, the Select Committee believes that the real issue is the size of the FE cake itself. There is a funding crisis in the sector and it is left to the Government to confront it.

Further education has had a raw deal, and a much harsher deal than other sectors in education. The figures speak for themselves. From 1993–94 to 1997–98, the real-terms funding of full-time equivalent students in FE was cut by 27 per cent., while the funding of students in universities was cut by 13 per cent. At present, two thirds of the post-school budget is spent on universities, despite the fact that two thirds of those who continue in post-18 education do so in FE colleges. Indeed, if we exclude the controversial student maintenance. Government spending in HE stands at about £4,600 per student, whereas only £2,800 is spent on each full-time equivalent student in FE.

Similarly, Government figures show that unit funding for students in FE has dropped a dramatic 10 times more in that sector since 1993–94 than it has for students in schools. Think what that has done for young people in sixth-form colleges who found themselves, almost by accident, part of the FE sector after incorporation. The position is so acute that the Further Education Funding Council has categorised more than 100 colleges as experiencing financial problems, with the percentage in the weakest category in financial terms having increased from 6 to 27 per cent. in the three years to 1997. I have no doubt that more up-to-date figures would show an even more dire position.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): As my hon. Friend knows, I am entirely in sympathy with what she has said up till now, but one matter concerns me, and I hope that she will return to it. When the Public Accounts Committee examined the sector, it found a relationship between efficiency and financial viability, and the way in which the quality of management impacted on those aspects. I am a great champion of further education, but I am worried about bringing the two thirds up to the one-third best practice.

Ms Hodge: We, too, considered the governance and management of the FE sector. I am not sure whether I understand my hon. Friend correctly, but we, too, found that there was not necessarily a direct correlation between financial resources and good management. Be that as it may, the FE sector has not been able to sustain quality, partly because of the financial cuts with which it has had to deal.

If the Government are serious about their lifelong learning agenda, if they want to ensure that the new deal is successful, if they want the university for industry to bring real benefits and if they genuinely intend the individual learning accounts to provide new opportunities for the many, they must, through the comprehensive spending review, inject a considerable sum into the sector.

The Select Committee warmly welcomed the measures that the Government have already taken to bring in extra money but, in our view, they represent only the first small step. I personally believe that the Committee took a pretty moderate view of what resources are needed. We did not attempt to reinstate amounts cut in the past, but we thought it wrong to expect greater efficiency savings from further education in the future than the Government expect from universities. We thought it essential to inject moneys for capital investment in both buildings and information technology. We considered the £10 million set aside by the Further Education Funding Council to widen participation in education and training derisory and grossly inadequate.

We were conscious of the Prime Minister's pledge that an additional 500,000 students would enjoy further or higher education by 2002, which needed to be properly funded. In our view, all this means that, by 2001-02, further education will need at least an extra half a billion pounds each year to provide an efficient, high-quality service. That is a lot of money, but we consider it essential if we are to meet our pledges on education and training.

Britain's problem is not educating our high fliers; we do that as well as any country in the world. Our problem is our long tail of under-achievers—the 7 million British adults who have no qualifications at all. Nearly 30 per cent. of young people fail to reach national vocational qualification level 2 by the age of 19. Whereas 8 per cent. of adults in Sweden, and 14 per cent. in Germany, have no basic literacy skills, more than 20 per cent. of adults in Britain have not progressed past level 1 in basic reading. Investment in schools is obviously vital, but it should not be at the expense of further education. We must put right the failures of the Tory past if we are to equip our adults with the necessary skills and qualifications to ensure the competitive, productive economy that we need for the long-term wealth and stability to which we aspire.

If we are serious about widening participation and improving skills, we must address the issue of student support. While undergraduates are adjusting to paying partial fees, many further education students have been paying full fees for years. While most higher education students are given access to subsidised loans as of right, the system of support for further education students is close to collapse. Most local authorities have cut their funding for student support in recent years. Today, access to such support is entirely a question of geography rather than need. It is simply not acceptable that a student in Cleethorpes can receive a maintenance award for a management course while a student on a similar course in Exeter cannot.

It is further education students who most need that support. In contrast to students in higher education, two thirds of whom come from the top two socio-economic groups, many further education students are unskilled, out of work or, perhaps, taking time out from poorly paid jobs to better themselves. If we are serious about opportunity for the many, we must address that inequitable legacy of disadvantage for those who need it most. If we are serious about improving skills and tackling underachievement, we must provide better incentives to keep people in full-time education.

It is outrageous that only half our young people continue in full-time education up to the age of 18. It is unacceptable that the participation rate has failed to increase over the past five years, and it is shameful that we have fewer people in full-time education after the age of 16 than any of our international competitors. That is why the Select Committee wants the Government to introduce a financial incentive to keep more young people in full-time education; that is why we have recommended that the Government abolish child benefit for those over 16, and use the £600 million thus released to help fund a means-tested allowance that would encourage those from disadvantaged backgrounds, in particular, to stay in full-time education and training.

I know that changes in child benefit are controversial, but child benefit for 16 to 19-year-olds is not universal. It is paid only to those whose children stay in full-time education, and they tend to be the children from better-off families. Surely it is right to target the money better, to encourage those from poorer families to stay in full-time education. Surely that is a better route for the nation to follow to achieve both economic prosperity and social justice. We recommend that the Government consider the proposal seriously. We want them to work towards providing loans covering maintenance and tuition that would be available to all further education students on work-related courses.

Our inquiry poses a number of other important challenges to colleges, the FEFC and the Government. We recommend that the Government give clearer direction in regard to a range of matters. The Government should determine the funding priorities for the sector; failure to do so would, in our view, impede their ability to achieve solid progress in the nation's priority areas. In the immediate future, for example, work-related courses should take priority over leisure-related learning for Government funds. The Government must also take steps to create a level playing field between further education colleges and schools. They must always level up rather than down to maintain educational quality.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): I agree with much of what I am hearing, but may I ask a question about what I still call schedule 2 and non-schedule 2 courses? What was the Select Committee's opinion about finance for courses that serve people with special needs, such as disabled people and those with severe learning difficulties? Such people will never be able to work towards some form of accreditation and recognition under schedule 2, but their education is a lifeline and a way of affording them basic skills.

Ms Hodge: Our report contains a whole section dealing with qualifications and progressions. We hope for a more modular approach to qualifications. The instance cited by my hon. Friend would be seen in such a context—not as a leisure-related activity, but as a modular course that could lead to further qualifications, especially for people with specific disadvantages. Of course such activities should be supported.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Does the hon. Lady agree that the Select Committee's aim in referring to "levelling up" to bring about a level playing field for post-16 education was to deal with full-time 16-to-19 education? That would not cover the schedule 2 type of education to which the Minister referred, which, although vitally important—as he rightly said—needs to be treated and funded rather differently.

Ms Hodge: I think that my hon. Friend the Minister was taking advantage of a pause in my speech. I must, however, declare an interest in regard to post-16 full-time education. As two of my children are currently in that sector, I recognise more than others the way in which the quality of both enrichment activities and pastoral support has been threatened by some of the cuts imposed on sixth-form colleges.

We believe that the Government should review the qualifications that they fund. It should not be left to the media to highlight questionable qualifications, and, in so doing, to bring the whole sector into disrepute. Similarly, although the Committee welcomes the steps taken by the FEFC to tighten the rules on franchising, we believe that further action is needed so that franchising really adds value to the nation's education and training. To quote my favourite example, funding courses in ambient display, which is more commonly known as shelf stacking, can hardly be said to add value to anything much.

Done well, franchising can build valuable partnerships between further education, the private sector and the community. It can create training opportunities for some who would not normally get involved further education, but we believe that colleges should not be allowed to franchise courses outside their area, except in exceptional circumstances. The Government should consider time-limiting the subsidy to the private sector so that resources can be recycled and the private sector encouraged to accept responsibility for the funding of training.

Allowing a free market in FE in the name of consumer choice is nonsense. FE should be more actively planned, nationally and locally, to ensure the most effective and efficient use of resources. Our report recommends that local partnerships, led by the FEFC, should be established to bring together all those involved in further education, from local education authorities to training and enterprise councils to employers. The FEFC should set clear criteria for mergers, and encourage them.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Are not many opportunities missed by training and enterprise councils, which do not always take into account the fact that further education colleges are capable of delivering the training required by businesses? Does she also agree that it is important to encourage that kind of relationship, along with local authorities, to ensure that there is a coherent strategy for further education in a particular area?

Ms Hodge: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend, which is why we have suggested a planning framework and a level playing field between not only FE colleges and schools, but FE colleges and private providers.

I have talked about some of the most important recommendations in the Select Committee's report. We have laid down a strong challenge to the Government, and if my right hon. Friends are serious about lifelong learning, as I believe that they are, they must meet that challenge. After years of neglect, it is time for further education to emerge from the shadows: it has a vital role to play in the Government's central purpose of raising education standards; extending opportunity to the many, not the few; and creating a strong, competitive economy.

Out there in the colleges—among the staff and among the students—people are waiting to play their part in turning the Government's vision into reality. That will require money, commitment and effort. I hope that our inquiry and our report will set that ball rolling, and that FE will gain its rightful place in the educational landscape.

4.52 pm

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I congratulate the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) on her Committee's report, which has raised many thought-provoking issues. I merely regret that, although this is exactly the right debate to have about the future of an important part of our education system, we are, unfortunately, condemned to have it at exactly the wrong time: we are all waiting with bated breath for the results of the comprehensive spending review. To an extent, that will prevent the Minister from giving us as much information as he would wish to. Indeed, the luxury of making his speech before the comprehensive spending review is announced will allow him to play the sort of dead bat that would be extremely in order today in other parts of the nation, such as Old Trafford.

The Select Committee raised many issues in its interesting and important report—funding, expansion of numbers, franchising, governance and standards—but the greatest is money, as the hon. Member for Barking made clear. The distribution of money is a subject of infinite fascination in the FE sector. In the relatively few weeks in which I have been covering this brief, I have already discovered that discussions about the methodology of funding could, if we wanted, keep the debate going all evening, to the extent that we would squeeze out the debate on freedom of information. I shall resist the temptation to go down that route, and merely touch on some of the wider issues raised by the Select Committee report and by other important, recently published documents such as the Kennedy report.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the reasons why FE colleges are fairly obsessed with money at the moment is that the unit of resources fell so dramatically in the 18 years of Tory government, and that that is causing the stress?

Mr. Green: I was about to come to the wider issue of funding and address the rather unbalanced presentation by the hon. Member for Barking of what happened to FE under the previous Government.

All our arguments about FE are based on what has happened since incorporation. Incorporation and the reforms introduced by the previous Government have, broadly speaking, been hugely welcomed by the FE sector. Indeed, the FEFC memorandum to the Select Committee states:

"Further education colleges have responded magnificently to the challenges of incorporation".

They have obviously been placed under an obligation to produce efficiency gains, but the fact that they have done so year after year suggests that those gains were capable of being achieved. The result is that many more students have been able to gain the benefits of FE courses. Labour Members should welcome that.

The Select Committee report states:

"The number of colleges and their structure has changed only marginally, but there has been a rapid expansion in the number of student enrolments—up by nearly one-third since incorporation."

If such an enormous expansion of numbers had taken place in a non-compulsory education sector under a Labour Government, the hon. Members for Barking and for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) would have been the first to get to their feet to ask the Under-Secretary or the Prime Minister to agree with them that the Government should be congratulated on that performance.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point. Will he comment on the fact that the number of students at Harrogate college, which is in severe financial difficulties, increased from 7,899 in 1994–95 to 15,087 in 1996–97, although funding went up by less than £100,000 on a £7.1 million budget? That is the real issue, which his Government failed to address—more students, but less money.

Mr. Green: There are more students and more money. Clearly the unit cost has gone down—no one can argue with the facts. I invite Liberal Democrat Members and Labour Members to acknowledge that the massive expansion in the FE sector over the past five years is a matter for congratulation, not only for the FE colleges, which have done good work, but for the previous Government, who enabled it to happen.

Mr. Sheerman: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. My hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) had to make a couple of political points—one expects that in this place—but she more or less kept to the Select Committee report and the long-term challenge. I urge the hon. Gentleman to do that. He was absolutely right to say that no party can claim any real bonus over the years; after the passing of the Education Act 1944, Labour failed to introduce the crucial aspects of community colleges recommended in it. Labour has not been good: this area has been the Cinderella, and it has been neglected by all parties. We should take that as read and stop making party political points: let us get down to discussing the future of FE and what the hon. Gentleman intends to do about it.

Mr. Green: I should be more than happy to do so; I mentioned that matter only because the hon. Member for Barking introduced it in her speech. Indeed, I have been making a point that has been interrupted by constant interventions from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Of course, I am always more than happy to take interventions. However, I am more than happy to do what the hon. Gentleman suggests, because the bulk of what I want to say is precisely to do with the future—where we are now, how we can go forward and the challenges and problems that face the Government as they attempt to improve the FE sector.

The Select Committee makes some important long-term points, not least that FE colleges are now the main provider of education for 16 to 19-year-olds. The hon. Member for Barking was possibly right to refer to the sector as a Cinderella. One of the least-known facts outside the FE sector is that more 16 to 19-year-olds undergo education in FE colleges than in schools or higher education. That is a key point. The FE sector provides many students extremely cost-effectively—not just 16 to 19-year-olds, but those in other age groups—with a vital bridge between education and employment.

That is where we are now and the future is likely to bring another huge expansion of the FE sector. The Select Committee calculates that, of the 500,000 students whom the Government wish to see going into further and higher education over the next few years, 430,000 will go into the FE sector, which provides 140,000 full-time equivalent places. That is where the main message of the debate arises: where will the money come from?

If the Government are going to meet the aspirations of the sector itself, of the many students who want to go into it and indeed of the Select Committee, the central issue is whether the Government will be able to will the means as well as the ends, otherwise FE will continue to be a troubled sector. The issue of funding will continue to be the ghost at this evening's intellectual feast. If the Minister seeks to reassure, simply with warm words, hon. Members on both sides of the House, particularly his hon. Friends and the Chairman of the Select Committee, one will be entitled to be a little suspicious, because we have reached the stage, given the number of commitments that the Government have made to FE, when warm words will not be enough.

I agree with the hon. Member for Barking: it would be foolish to deny that there are difficulties in the FE sector. A number of colleges are experiencing financial difficulties. Indeed, the evidence that was given to the Select Committee suggests that the financial pressures on the sector are such that the achievements over the past five years are at risk, as well as any future improvements to the sector.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): On that point about the financial health of colleges, will the hon. Gentleman comment on this matter? Between 1994 and 1997, the percentage of colleges that were deemed reasonably robust went from 70 to 43 per cent. and, in category C, the percentage of colleges that were deemed financially weak went from 6 to 27 per cent. Why did that happen?

Mr. Green: I should be grateful if Labour Members could get their act together. Those who have the brief to read out constantly try to push me backwards. Others who want the debate to go forward constantly urge me not to make party political points. I wish that Labour Members could decide what type of debate they want this to be. Do they want a sensible and constructive debate, or constantly to look backwards? I am happy to bandy figures about with the hon. Gentleman until the end of the debate, but I do not think that the more sensible Labour Members think that that is a useful way to spend our time.

As I and, indeed, the Select Committee have observed, it is the quantum of money that will be available to the FE sector that is the key to the Government's meeting the ambitions that they have set themselves. The amount that they have given it so far simply does not meet the aspirations. If the Government are to meet their targets, there needs to be a balance between the various education sectors. Clearly, the main need is to balance the resources available among the three education sectors.

Since the sector was set up many decades ago, FE has at times been the least regarded sector. The severe danger is that, with the Government's many commitments to schools and with the commitment that they like to make to higher education as well, FE will again fall into the hole. That will hugely disadvantage not just the sector itself, but the many types of students who find FE education much more congenial than other types of education, and the country as a whole. Clearly, we need a balanced education system which allows a range of people to reach their potential and to provide and enjoy the skills that this country needs if it is to continue the economic progress of the past 18 years or so.

That is the key area with which I hope the Minister will deal in his speech. Are the Government going to move beyond mere rhetoric? If they are, will there be any losers in other educational sectors? It would be naive for anyone speaking in the debate to assume that simply more money will be available across the board in education. The Minister would make a serious contribution if he explained the priorities that the Government will take into the comprehensive spending review. Without that, we will be back to mere warm words.

The concept of the level playing field for funding is clearly important, but the TEC National Council Ltd. has made an important point:

"Whilst we want equity across post 16 funding we think equity is about treating everyone differently, not treating everyone the same."

One theme which I should like to impress on the Minister is that the idea that a level playing field means simply applying the same formula to different types of people in education is likely to prove both short-sighted and destructive. Whatever comes out of the comprehensive spending review, the Government's attitude to further education should be more subtle than that.

To that degree, I agree with the Select Committee. It does not think it is sensible to create a common currency for the funding of post-16 education. That would be an unrealistic ambition. It is one of those areas where tidiness is the enemy of common sense, and I hope that the Government will not go down that route.

The other great funding issue is convergence. Again, I hope that, when the Government move towards convergence, as I am sure they will, they do not do so in a way that is too mechanical. There have been arguments—I have heard them from South Kent college, the FE college in my constituency—that convergence inevitably creates losers as well as winners and that trying to move too far, too fast will mean that the losers outweigh the winners. This is an important issue when discussing other important issues such as access. In particular, one of the sectors that would be damaged by too quick a move towards convergence would be inner-city colleges, especially those in London. Indeed, as the Minister will be aware, the Inner London Colleges Group said:

"If convergence continues at the current rate, then a sizeable portion of the FE infrastructure that will be necessary to deliver the Government's aims in the most deprived areas of the country will be dismantled."

I am sure that he is aware of that evidence to the Select Committee and that he is conscious of the fact that he will need to be fairly nimble and light on his feet to avoid that type of, I am sure, unintentional damage to the sector.

On the wider issue of the expansion of numbers, which is, to some extent, the central thrust of the Government's hope in this area, I should be interested to hear whether the Minister agrees with the Select Committee's figure—whether he thinks that 430,000 of the extra 500,000 will indeed be educated in the FE sector. If so, does he agree with the Select Committee's views on money? The hon. Member for Barking has made it clear that her bid is for £0.5 billion. She described that as modest, and I dare say that many people in the FE sector could come up with much bigger numbers fairly easily. She will know as well as I do that the Minister has to juggle with the various demands of the education brief. Battles are being fought across Whitehall, from which only the occasional strangled cry emerges through leaks to the outside world.

The FE sector will be doing very well if it obtains the money that the Select Committee recommends. People in the sector would find it illuminating if the Minister could bring himself to give us any clues about whether the Select Committee is in the right ball park.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Is the hon. Gentleman not a little embarrassed by the almost total lack of interest in this subject shown by Conservative Members? Apart from the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Sir D. Madel) on the Front Bench, only one Conservative, the hon. Member for

[Mrs. Anne Campbell]

Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), who is a member of the Select Committee, is present on the Back Benches. [Interruption.]

Mr. Green: There are now two, and others have attended the debate. I hope that the hon. Lady will recognise the difference between quality and quantity.

Support for students in the FE sector, especially if it is expanded, is an issue worth addressing. I must part company with the Select Committee on this matter. The hon. Lady seemed to elide the Select Committee's recommendation. She referred to loans as the recommended way of proceeding, whereas the Committee's report clearly refers to grants.

Ms Hodge: Both are required.

Mr. Green: The hon. Lady says that she is in favour of both. This is an extremely interesting area for the Minister to address, as the Government have already gone against the Dearing recommendation that maintenance grants for students in higher education should be continued. If the Minister has no intention of responding positively to the Select Committee's recommendation for FE students to have maintenance grants, he should say so this evening so that we know where we stand.

The Opposition support the Dearing report. We believe that maintenance grants for students in higher education should be maintained. However, I part company with the Select Committee on the issue of converting child benefit money into grants. Wider aspects of the use of child benefit to hold families together are possibly not relevant to this debate.

Ms Hodge: I am interested that the hon. Gentleman parts company with the Select Committee. He said that he recognises the pressures on public expenditure and the battle that the Minister will have to find the extra £0.5 billion by 2001-02. If he does not want maintenance grants for 16 to 19-year-old FE students to be funded through child benefit, how does he propose they should be funded?

Mr. Green: I do not have to take that decision for a few years.

Dr. Howells: That is convenient.

Mr. Green: The Minister has to take that decision, and it would be extremely interesting to hear what he has to say about this matter. It will be a few years before we have to make that decision, and we shall do so. We take the use of child benefit to support the family and family values extremely seriously. We would consider carefully whether the hon. Lady's suggestion would be the best use of that money, even for 16 to 19-year-olds. I am at best dubious about her proposal. I would be fascinated to hear the Minister on the matter.

Funding affects the wider issue of access. The Kennedy report, which is seminal in this area, is an interesting and radical document. What it boils down to is that there should be access for all, and that, if necessary, there should be discriminatory funding to achieve that. That is a radical idea, and, to be candid, the Government's response was pretty thin. They are slightly worried and embarrassed about how to approach this issue, and they have not said anything concrete about what is required.

There are dangers in the Kennedy approach, some of which were identified in the Select Committee report. Identifying favoured students from different areas in certain towns—the right postcodes—would give rise to discriminatory funding that may not, in individual cases, either be fair or be seen to be fair.

Dr. Howells: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman seizes on that aspect of the Kennedy report. I shall leap to the Baroness's defence. She was referring to partnerships with training and enterprise councils. Focus can be placed on specific postcodes and addresses where there are great difficulties. The previous Government looked into some of those projects carefully. I know of TECs that have fostered successful partnerships between education and business, and that has raised attainment in the area. The hon. Gentleman would surely acknowledge that such an approach has value.

Mr. Green: It may have value if it is done sensibly. The crudity of the measures gives rise to concern. The term "Kennedy student" is already in the public domain. The Further Education Funding Council uses that term, and the Select Committee sensibly said that it did not want to go down that route. If students are identified as "Kennedy students", they may be stigmatised. The next phase will be "Kennedy estates". Such an approach has dangers.

Dr. Howells: Sink estates.

Mr. Green: The Minister uses the term "sink estates". I hope that he does not propose to introduce a method of funding that stigmatises individuals or people who come from a particular area. The danger implied by the Minister's well-meaning intervention is that he will go down that route.

There are other dangers. It is interesting that the new deal, which should, broadly speaking, be welcomed by the FE sector, has already created a degree of danger. FE colleges have pointed out the disadvantages of the new deal for their funding. The Times Educational Supplement on 20 March ran a story under the headline "New Deal strains college coffers". I hope that the Minister will reassure colleges that that will not continue. That claim was based on the early pilot projects under the new deal. The article states:

"Some inner-city colleges are looking at cuts in excess of £300,000, while having to increase significantly the time spent teaching trainees."

Many people are taking courses under the new deal similar to those that they were previously taking, but they are doing more hours, so they cost more and are funded from a different pot, which pays the college less.

The principal of Stoke-on-Trent college told the Select Committee:

"the sum of money we will get through the New Deal will be somewhat smaller than what we are getting through the current 16 hour rule . . . It is not clear that the sum of money to deliver this will necessarily be totally adequate".

The Select Committee report says that the director of FE development at the Association of Colleges has stated:

"the New Deal is a major area of uncertainty".

Does the Minister have any concrete proposals to compensate colleges for the losses that they may incur as a result of the new deal?

The Select Committee addressed some other important areas, including franchising, to which the hon. Member for Barking referred. The key point is not to be over-prescriptive. It is extremely dangerous to try to produce an all-embracing set of rules in which all good franchise courses fall inside and all bad ones fall outside. The danger is that, by trying to drive out all of the bad, some of the good will go as well. I am sure that the Select Committee would recognise that there are dangers, and that some courses may not bear much scrutiny—the hon. Member for Barking pointed out one. The danger of driving out the good with the bad is one that I hope the Minister will bear in mind.

I take the Select Committee's point about the danger of confusion about the Government's criteria for funding the training of those in employment. That is another difficult technical matter which I hope the Minister will address.

I wish to refer to an area that the Select Committee thought was important—the role of regional development agencies. Frankly, those are the potential fifth wheel on the coach. I am happy to agree with the noble Baroness Blackstone that RDAs will be too big to carry out the role of co-ordinating FEs. I think that RDAs will be too big to carry out the role of co-ordinating anything and will be dangerous in almost all areas, so I am happy that—in at least one area—the Government have recognised that the role of RDAs should be minimised rather than maximised.

If the Government and the Liberal Democrats are—as they seem—so besotted with regionalisation, and if the Government are to move towards convergence in funding, perhaps regional convergence would be better than national convergence. At least then the Government would be following the logic of their own argument, false though it is on the issue.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Before the hon. Gentleman leaves regionalisation and training and enterprise councils, is he aware that the British Chambers of Commerce recently produced a powerful document which wholly endorsed the wish of the Education and Employment Select Committee to have all the funding for TECs routed through the RDAs? That is not the same as having the RDAs co-ordinating further education, I grant him, but let him not dismiss regionalisation, or even more of his erstwhile friends may desert him.

Mr. Green: I commend the latest report of the British Chambers of Commerce, on the British economy, to the right hon. Gentleman. The friendship of chambers of commerce with the Government is about to disappear, given that their overriding view is that the Government are making a supreme mess of the economy on which all of their members depend. I will not dwell on regionalisation; I merely point out that it is inappropriate in this area, and I am happy that the Government have noticed that.

On the standards, terms and conditions which the Select Committee thought were very important for those working in the sector, I urge the Minister again not to be over-prescriptive. A degree of local freedom for the colleges to negotiate terms and conditions is extremely important. I hope that the Minister and the Government recognise that as time goes on.

In summary, the Minister clearly has a number of balls to juggle, and the severe danger for him is inflated expectations. I am fully aware that the FE sector was one of those which welcomed the advent of a new Government who were going to cheer the sector up and provide everything that it needed. Already, those expectations are moving away from the Minister. Professor John Field of the university of Warwick is a professor of lifelong learning. There cannot be anyone who is more interested in the Government's project. He has said:

"Imaginative and innovative proposals . . . will help if properly resourced. Nothing I see convinces me that the Government has got to grips with the task."

Dr. Howells: He is a good bloke.

Mr. Green: The Minister may say that, from a sedentary position. Unfortunately, we can see from that quotation that that is not reciprocated. The Minister will have to reassure Professor Field as well as everyone else.

FE colleges will be vital in any lifelong learning prospectus. The hon. Member for Barking said that she had taken a modest view that £500 million would be required. These are the last few days when the Minister will get away with warm words. When we see the comprehensive spending review, we will know whether he will put his money where his mouth is. My great fear—which I hope is wrong—is that, after all the Government's words and rhetoric over the past few months, Cinderella will still not get to the ball.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I hope that the Select Committee report will mark the beginning of the end of the Cinderella status of further education. A recent survey in my local area found that nearly a quarter of employers with more than 100 staff have identified gaps in skills in their work force, yet the percentage of school leavers in Staffordshire who are to remain in full-time education has fallen since 1994.

Blame cannot be laid at the door of further education lecturers. Efficiency gains made by the sector since incorporation have been greater than in any other part of the education service. Over the past five years, student numbers have increased by a third, but costs per student have been cut by a quarter. That is not a matter for congratulation—the impact has been damaging.

Staff have faced growing job insecurity and new so-called flexible contracts which mean teaching more hours but spending less time supporting students. The increasing numbers of part-time staff—and, worse still, agency staff—have meant that staff have been parachuted in just to lecture. Students inevitably suffer. Staff cannot get involved in curriculum issues, and student pastoral care flies out of the window.

Some colleges have tried to make ends meet by franchising. While, at best, franchising can widen participation in further education, at worst it just pays the employer to provide the training needed to keep the employee on the payroll—he or she would have done that anyway. Franchising can be a real money-spinner, particularly for those 20 colleges which carry out nearly 60 per cent. of all franchising.

For other institutions, such as my local college in Leek—which chose not to franchise because it is a small college and felt that it might overstretch itself—the effects have been damaging. Effectively, colleges have been penalised by the distortion of the funding process by franchising. That has led to my local college having to close its creche—an important part of increasing participation—and its refectory. I strongly support the Select Committee recommendations on the funding and operation of franchising; it should grow from the college's primary task—helping students to learn—and should not be merely a way of maximising income.

Ten miles from Leek, the college at Stoke-on-Trent demonstrates yet another weakness in the FE sector—college governance and accountability. There, the unhealthy control exercised by the previous principal and the chairman of the governors led to the college having to repay large sums of money to the funding council. That led to big cuts in courses and staff posts, devastating the college. What shocked me most about the whole episode was the hands-off approach of the funding council. Even when it was alerted to the problems several times by staff at the college, the funding council refused to intervene.

One recommendation is that the funding council must have a duty to intervene at the first danger signal. That is vital. Colleges must be more open, and allow information from governors' meetings to be revealed and easily accessible to staff and students. Transparency is vital. Otherwise, we will have more colleges such as Stoke-on-Trent to worry about.

FE students are very often those whom the school system has failed. Further education is not their second chance—it is their only chance to get back on track. No investment gives a better return than education, especially if it is focused on the most disadvantaged. Without it, we make potential design engineers into assembly workers, potential nurses into supermarket shelf stackers and potential retail staff into benefit liabilities. The under-realisation of potential is, in human terms, catastrophic; it condemns millions to unemployment or to boring jobs well below their potential. It is also catastrophic economically. The undereducated students whom we are currently turning out will be underperforming in the economy for the next 40 years.

Underfunding FE is a bit like progressive arsenic poisoning; if one waits for the symptoms to show, it is too late. Additional financial support for FE students and additional funding for the FE sector are an essential investment in the future.

5.29 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): The Liberal Democrats welcome the Select Committee's report on further education—indeed, we warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) and the Select Committee on producing what we believe is a powerful report; it has considerable cross-party support, broadly reflecting, as it does, the views of Liberal Democrats and, I hope, of the Labour party. I am sure that the hon. Lady and the Minister will accept that Liberal Democrats offer a different perspective on some matters, reflecting our policies, but I trust that we shall be more positive than the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green). It was distinctly disappointing to hear a Conservative Front-Bench spokesperson speak in such a negative and carping way when there is the will for us to move forward.

The report reflects the strong recognition that the further education sector is in a state of crisis; it is good that that has not been hidden. That crisis was born not of a lack of commitment by the vast majority of college staff, principals and governors but of a lack of policy direction and, above all, of financial support.

The Select Committee acknowledged the huge task that the FE sector faces if it is to help to solve the problem of underachievement, which was identified in the Green Paper on lifelong learning and which has been mentioned by all hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. The fact that 30 per cent. of young people fail to reach national vocational qualification level 3 by the age of 19 is depressing; the fact that 21 million adults do not have level 3 qualifications is even more depressing.

What hit home hardest was the 1994 national literacy survey, which calculated that 8.4 million people aged between 16 and 65 had a level of literacy so low that they would be unable to compare and contrast simple pieces of information or to fill out a simple standard form. That is a terrible indictment of an education system that has failed so many people. In the words of the song, things can only get better.

Mr. Sheerman: Never heard of it.

Mr. Willis: My daughter's boyfriend sang it, so I have to plug it.

The Select Committee's report must be judged against its vision of the size of the problem to be tackled. There is a recognition that, although incorporation in 1993 brought many benefits, strategic planning has been a problem. We fully support both Baroness Kennedy and the Select Committee in their view that central Government should not interfere in the detailed operation of the sector. We should not go back to those days, or, indeed, to the days when local education authorities were in control. Central Government's role is to make clear what they expect the sector to deliver and to set clear targets for evaluating performance.

We welcome the Select Committee's proposals on regional and local planning, but we do not think that they go far enough. The reliance on planning through funding control alone has severe limitations. Although the Further Education Funding Council should have a greater role in strategic planning, we believe that the regional development agencies—and the regional assemblies that we hope will be their parent bodies—should also have a significant role.

We accept that, under current legislation, RDAs have no direct educational responsibilities, but there is no reason why, as we move forward to the next millennium, they should not have. The RDAs should have a statutory responsibility to produce a lifelong learning development plan for the region, following detailed consultation with all relevant employers, organisations, FE colleges, private sector providers, the local education authority and the training and enterprise councils—indeed, the right hon.

Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), who has now left the Chamber, made a powerful point about the recent report by the British Chambers of Commerce.

If FE colleges are to have an enhanced role in the provision of lifelong learning, they must become more open and publicly accountable. The governance of many FE colleges since incorporation has given rise to grave concern, and the Select Committee's proposals on that are excellent. It is right to allow wider participation for staff, students, community groups and the local authority and to maintain a strong business community presence; that is a proper balance. Liberal Democrats also whole-heartedly support the proposals to appoint independent clerks, to open meetings to the public, to register the interest of governors and, in particular, to introduce a further education ombudsman.

As well as changes in governance, there must be a change in attitude to teaching and support staff in further education. Frankly, the Select Committee report does not do justice to the significant achievements of the vast majority of FE lecturers and their support colleagues. Few sectors would have tolerated the changes to conditions of service and to career and salary structures which have been imposed on the majority of FE lecturers over the past four years.

The report recognises the need to raise morale and to improve professional standards. The development of a national training organisation is a positive proposal, but greater emphasis must be placed on postgraduate training before entry to FE teaching. We believe that the General Teaching Council has an important role to play and that it should not be disregarded.

Nothing will do more to improve the morale and status of FE lecturers than dealing with the basic conditions of employment. Liberal Democrats do not support a return to silver-book conditions of service. We recognise the need of colleges to be able to vary contracts and to meet changing needs but such changes must be achieved by negotiation, not by threat and imposition. The Select Committee's proposal for a model contract represents a way forward, but a minimum national entitlement, backed by regulation, is required. We hope that the Minister will confirm that that is what the Government intend. FE lecturers, both full time and part time, are waiting for him to give a strong signal, and I have no doubt that he will give one when he responds to the debate.

Liberal Democrats welcome the Government's promise to investigate the casualisation of college lecturers. A strong signal must be sent to colleges immediately to start reversing the trend to casualisation. Flexibility is one thing; exploitation is another. If we want a dynamic and energetic work force in FE colleges, we must stop treating staff as expendable commodities as budgets come and go.

We are pleased that the Select Committee did not lay the blame for casualisation entirely at the door of the colleges, the Education Lecturing Services or even Roger Ward. The root cause is the previous Government's gross underfunding of FE and their almost complete disregard for the sector's well-being. How else can the huge disparity of treatment between the different educational sectors be explained?

There are many ways in which to present what has happened to FE college funding. The hon. Member for Barking did it in one way and, last week, the Select Committee heard another set of figures. However, let us accept that school funding has been largely neutral since 1993, that higher education funding has declined to 86 per cent. of its 1993 level but that FE funding has dropped to 81 per cent. of its 1993 level, which is a significant reduction. It is no wonder that 60 per cent. of our colleges are operating with deficit budgets and that the number classified as weak by the FEFC has trebled since 1994.

My college in Harrogate has been technically bankrupt for the past three years—indeed, it has been since incorporation. This year, it was unable to meet debts to the FEFC totalling £500,000 and I must thank the Minister and the Government for agreeing to the merger of Harrogate FE college with Leeds Metropolitan university, which was announced last week.

Mr. Sheerman: May I say, merely in passing, that I think the Harrogate college needed an infusion from Huddersfield to help it over its crisis? Like the hon. Gentleman, I have three excellent further education colleges in my constituency: Greenhead, New college and Huddersfield technical college. We should not underrate the role of principals as managers, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that they are saying that they have been distracted from getting on with the job of delivering good teaching and learning by the constant barrage of bureaucracy, whether from the FEFC or as a result of worry about how they will carry on next year? That distracts them from their job, which is all about good learning and teaching.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful for that intervention because of the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the subject and because Huddersfield lent us Dr. Rossiter, who has been an excellent principal. The hon. Gentleman has a good point, but I think he would agree that many of our FE colleges have had to deal with another fundamental problem, which is managing debt. In 1993, many of the colleges began incorporation with significant debts, which they have retained—they have not been able to trade out of them. Judging from the FEFC report on colleges, some of those with the most severe debts are not criticised for poor management. The historic funding issue is a major problem. I want far more of the time of our college principals—their planning and structuring time—to be spent on dealing with moving their college forward rather than simply managing debt restructuring and reorganisation, as would the hon. Gentleman, I am sure.

The Select Committee has recognised the problems of FE funding and the new resources that it proposes are welcome. However, the Treasury has seduced the Select Committee—[HON. MEMBERS: "Seduced?"]—although not the hon. Member for Barking, obviously. I would never accuse anyone of seducing her. [Interruption.] I think at this point I had better move on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Perhaps it would be helpful if the hon. Gentleman found another metaphor.

Mr. Willis: I believe that the hand of the Treasury has been on Labour Members in the Select Committee. The hon. Member for Barking was honest enough to say that she did not feel that the Select Committee had gone far enough to give the FE sector what it needed, and I agree.

Even if the proposed efficiency savings of a further 1 per cent. bring us into line with higher education funding reductions, they are unrealistic for a significant number of colleges. The 1 per cent. saving will in fact mean further loss of provision in many colleges that are already facing major financial difficulties.

The sector sought about £250 million to halt the decline and to meet the needs of existing students. There were variations on the figure, but it was roughly that total. The Select Committee has asked for somewhere in the region of £84 million, with a further £60 million for capital works. The widely quoted £500 million figure would come into play only when the additional students announced by the Prime Minister at the Labour party conference had been recruited—that is where that figure comes from. The £350 million extra suggested by the Committee would be on top of the money already requested.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) last week questioned Michael Bishard, the permanent secretary at the Department for Education and Employment, and revealed that the Department does not know not only what proportion of those students will be full or part time, but what proportion will be FE or HE. What is more, until the comprehensive spending review has been concluded, targets for FE will not be clear. It has now emerged that the amount of money that the spending review allocates to FE will equate directly to the number of students that it can recruit, which is a different tale from the one that we have been told so far.

The Select Committee may have worked on the basis of about 430,000 extra students, but as was revealed last week, only the Prime Minister knows where the original 500,000 extra students came from. The Minister may well be able to explain that figure in more detail—I am pretty sure that the Prime Minister will have brought him into his confidence.

The Committee has suggested a further £350 million by the year 2000–02. Frankly, until we have the results of the review, that figure merely clouds the present crisis. It would be wrong to bandy about the figure of an extra £500 million when that is not really what the Select Committee report asks for.

For those reasons, we ask the Government seriously to consider the future role and funding of training and enterprise councils. While they have never reached the £3 billion of expenditure that was first envisaged, their annual grant last year was around £1.46 billion compared with the FEFC budget of £3.1 billion. The huge bureaucracy of the TEC empire, with the lavish office complexes and even more lavish publicity materials, and the TECs' complex audit and monitoring proceedings

"mean that for every pound of Treasury funding less than 20p actually gets down to the person that needs it."

That is a direct quotation from the House of Commons Employment Committee report of 1995–96. Surely the Minister and his colleagues need to consider that funding and how it can be reallocated.

Dr. Howells: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have noticed that four weeks ago, we announced the first ever review of training and enterprise councils. That subject will certainly be one of our major areas of focus.

Mr. Willis: i am grateful, as always, for the Minister's intervention. Indeed, I would hurry that process along. The transfer of a mere 20 per cent. of resources from bureaucracy to front-end delivery would meet the present FE shortfall. That is where a simple transfer could take place.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could help us by telling us how much, as a ratio of their own funding, the TECs receive from the private sector for spending on training?

Mr. Willis: If the hon. Gentleman wants an answer, he should read research paper 97/48, "Training and Enterprise Councils", which contains much of the detail. We are talking about Government money and where FE will get its funding in the future. We Liberal Democrats propose that TEC funding should be studied carefully. If only 20p of every £1 is being used, a simple transfer of some of that money would solve many of the problems.

However, it is not simply TEC funding that must be reappraised. The whole basis for funding post-16 courses must be examined. A level playing field needs to be created, as the Select Committee recognised. It cannot be right to fund a student taking three A-levels in a school sixth form differently from a student on an equivalent course at an FE college, although we understand that exact parity will never be possible.

We do not want a levelling down of provision. I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Bath shout a stout "Hear, hear" when the hon. Member for Barking mentioned that, because it is at the root of the problem. There must be not a levelling down, with money taken from school sixth forms to fund something else, but a levelling up.

We believe that the time may well have come to examine whether school sixth forms should be funded via the FEFC, rather than the LEA. We would like schools to be liberated to bid for more traditional areas of work in the FE sector. Schools are often ideally placed to offer aspects of FE provision to students of all ages, and should be given the freedom to do so, but only on an equal footing with FE colleges and other private sector providers.

The Select Committee rightly recognised that, without an improved package of student financial support, the expansion that we urgently need is unlikely to take place. The damning conclusion of the Policy Studies Institute was:

"Access to financial support for students is a lottery".

The previous Government may have devastated the financial stability of the FE sector with their draconian cuts, but worthy of even greater condemnation was their almost total withdrawal of financial support for students, and especially part-time students. Let us not talk about widening participation unless we are prepared to offer greater support for students, and especially those who choose to study part time.

It was a pity that the Select Committee did not have access to the Lane report, "New Arrangements for Effective Student Support in Further Education". That report estimates student support costs at £400 million a year—significantly more than was recommended by the Select Committee. I hope that the Minister will accept that students must be given support in the crucial areas of transport, fees, child care and maintenance, and that such support must be universally available.

Further education is at last receiving the attention that many of us have long wanted it to receive. Cinderella is preparing for the ball; a golden coach awaits; charming Prince Blunkett is already at the palace; and it only remains to be seen whether Baroness Tessa is a fairy godmother or a wicked witch. When the clock strikes midnight, and the results of the comprehensive spending review are announced, we will know whether further education can stay at the ball or whether, like Cinderella, it must return to its present lowly status.

Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). I remember his heartfelt contribution to a debate on corporal punishment; as I spent the six years before I became a Member of Parliament as a further education lecturer, my contribution today will be similarly heartfelt.

I and all my former colleagues in further education are a little tired of the sector being called the Cinderella sector, and we should try to move away from that classification. We owe it to all our students and would-be students no longer to use that term; we should value more highly that crucial part of our education system. I had intended to make some comments about the Minister and Prince Charming, but as allegations have been made about Labour Members toadying, I am glad that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough got there first.

Much of what hon. Members say will allude to the comprehensive spending review. That will always be the case with further education, because it has been so poorly funded for so many years. In the review, the Government must deal not only with revenue funding but with the increased capital investment for which further education is crying out.

The university for industry and universal access to all the information on the internet are very well-meaning ideas, but I remember that, in my old college, my department—the department of management and professional studies—had one computer for 26 staff. The ideas are fine, but we need the capital investment if they are not to become totally meaningless.

When we talk about widening participation and encouraging the so-called "Kennedy students" into our colleges, we must consider the extra capital costs of, for example, increasing the number of creches that are available. The creche at my local further education college is booked out the year before people embark on their courses, such is the demand. If we are to encourage people back into education, we must consider the capital investment that is needed.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough mentioned the bitter and prolonged dispute between lecturers and employers. I do not think that the previous Government did all they could to bring that to an end. They left it to local colleges to go their own way, but those colleges were more often than not encouraged by the then College Employers Forum to consider the most "productive" use of the lecturers' time.

Lecturers such as myself bitterly resisted the attempt to force us to sign new contracts. No lecturer thinks that the silver book is there for ever, but we were faced with the decision of signing a new contract, and getting a pay rise for doing so, but knowing that that would lead to a deterioration in the quality of teaching that we could provide.

That dilemma has not yet been fully resolved. I hope that the Select Committee's proposal of an agreed standard contract will help. It will certainly be warmly welcomed by all concerned. I am glad that the Association of Colleges and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education are now talking to each other. That has been a long, long time coming, and it is most welcome.

The previous Government washed their hands of their responsibilities for the governance of further education colleges. We were promised many things from incorporation. As a further education lecturer, I listened to the candidates in the 1992 general election campaign talking about what they thought would happen post-incorporation.

In my college, the two staff governors suddenly found that their places were gone; we never had a student governor; and the LEA representatives disappeared from the governing body. A search and nomination committee was set up with the deliberate intention of recruiting "like-minded individuals" to run the corporation. I warmly welcome the idea of not only allowing but forcing corporations to have staff governors. A community facility cannot be run without stakeholder representatives. Student representation is also vital if we are to have a truly representative board to run a college.

I have been lobbied by the chair and principal of my local college, who seem to think that there is something wrong with having democratically accountable representatives on the board, and prefer the idea of continuing to seek and nominate. They have two staff governors, whom they selected, and two LEA representatives, whom they also interviewed and selected. That is not in the spirit of democratic accountability in which I believe colleges should operate.

On part-time and full-time students and the casualisation of labour, I speak as someone who has managed courses, and I know that it is great to have the flexibility of being able to bring in experts part-time, to do the hours that full-time lecturers may not be able to do, given the increased hours for which they are expected to teach. It is not possible to get all the people together at the same time and in the same place to discuss important quality issues about a course. With the comprehensive spending review in mind, I must say that the rate paid to part-time lecturers sometimes leaves a little to be desired, particularly if we expect them to do preparation and to contribute towards the assessment of students.

I promised to keep my speech short, but there is a lot to be done in further education. Please let us not keep referring to it as a Cinderella; it is not.

5.59 pm

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I am delighted to speak tonight, just as I was to participate in the Select Committee on Education and Employment. I must apologise to the House because I shall have to leave before the debate ends for a service at Guildford cathedral to celebrate 50 years of the national health service. My speech will be somewhat shorter, therefore, than it would otherwise have been, and I know how much that will disappoint other hon. Members.

[Mr. Nick St. Aubyn]

I do not want to sound a note of controversy, but the previous Government's decision in 1993 to give further education colleges their freedom may, with greater hindsight, come to be seen as almost as significant as the changes to our health system 50 years ago. Colleges of further education are to be the prime avenue for lifelong learning, and all of us share the belief that the development of lifelong learning lies at the heart of any modern society's efforts to improve itself.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has told us that there were no prizes in further education until now. I am not here to claim prizes for the previous Government, but our debate must remain rooted in reality. We must examine objectively, as the Select Committee did, three vital events. The previous Government's 1993 act of independence for colleges changed their funding, changed their governance and promoted franchising. I am pleased that the Committee's sixth report treats objectively the way in which the subsequent five years treated the colleges in those three areas.

Paragraph 88 of the report states:

"while the sector has achieved much in the five years since incorporation, it will not be possible . . . if it continues to have to find the same levels of efficiency savings as in recent years."

The critical point is that a significant one-off efficiency gain has been achieved by that sector, which is a great credit to the sector and to the policy that underpinned the saving. Many more people have gone into further education, and the resulting economies allow the Government to plan for hundreds of thousands more to have the benefit of further education.

It is a measure of the current financial situation that the report proposes an additional £54 million to fund the service provided by the colleges. That is in the context of a budget of £3.1 billion, so it means an increase on current provision of less than 1.5 per cent. There is a further proposal for £60 million—another 1.5 per cent.—for expenditure on capital improvements. We should use those terms to judge whether the service has been overfunded or underfunded.

Ms Hodge: The hon. Gentleman quotes selectively from the report. I am sure that he would share the Select Committee's concern that more than 100 colleges are experiencing severe financial difficulties as a result of previous cuts. Does he agree with the point that he himself made during the Select Committee, that it is easier to find efficiency savings during a period of growth than during a period of standstill? It is the total quantum of £500,000 that will count if we are to see the institutions return to financial health.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for offering to help me to write my speech. There is no dispute between us that a critical juncture has been reached. The process of one-off efficiency gains and convergence has been highly successful, but, as the report suggests, there is a need to change tack. The question is how we do so.

On the question of governance, we were all aware of one or two horror stories when the Committee began to look into the matter. However, the more we looked into it, the more we found that those were isolated cases. Paragraph 160 of the report quotes from the second report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life—the Nolan committee—as follows:

"we are dealing with isolated cases . . . that indicate no deep-seated trend. In the circumstances of challenge and change . . . the 'failure rate' has been creditably small."

It is worth bearing in mind the evidence of the Further Education Funding Council that the total losses so far accumulated out of a budget of £3 billion a year for five years are about £9 million to £13 million, which is less than 0.1 per cent. of total expenditure. That is a great credit to the discipline and control that the FEFC has developed.

My final point relates to franchising. There was proper concern at some of the stories that we heard before the Committee got under way. We were worried that qualifications in shelf stacking in supermarkets would be the genre of activity represented by franchising, but that has not happened. Paragraph 129 of the report states:

"We believe that high quality franchising can play a valuable role in the FE system."

That is an important finding. The report also discusses time limiting, and the amount of support that should be given to the development of new franchising schemes. On balance, that development was a successful initiative under the previous Government.

Let me look ahead to the future funding of colleges. As with our earlier debate on child support, there is a balance to be struck between fairness and clarity. The FEFC has developed a formula that is complex, but which the colleges understand. It has achieved a high level of convergence. We hear of £2 billion being taken out of the sector, but let us remember that there has been a levelling down of those colleges that overspent or used resources inefficiently, and a levelling up of those colleges that had the lowest level of funding under the previous, local education authority-run system. That progressive change is why many colleges on low levels of funding look forward to further convergence.

I endorse the Committee's finding that convergence is a process in which it is better to travel than to arrive. Working towards convergence has created greater fairness. However, absolute convergence would make the system more complex so that it could deal with individual anomalies at each college. That process would become self-defeating at some point. Convergence within a band is surely the right approach, rather than the reductio ad absurdum of what the FEFC was heading towards previously.

It is instructive to consider convergence in the context of sixth-form colleges and provision in FE colleges. We condone the idea of convergence within a band of plus or minus 2.5 per cent. It is worth putting on the record the fact that table 5 on page xxiv of the report shows clearly that there is convergence of A level funding within a band of 5 per cent regardless of whether a pupil attends a school sixth form, a sixth-form college or a general FE college. While the differences remain significant—I agree that there should be some levelling up—they are not so great as to imply that those who have attended an FE college have been particularly disadvantaged compared with those who have attended a sixth-form college.

One might go even further. It is in the nature of different types of provision for different children that there may be some funding variation. An even more significant factor is whether the quality and nature of the course is relevant and helpful to a particular pupil. That is a much more important criterion when considering narrow band differences in funding.

That brings me to my next point: whether we should develop a single qualification for those aged 16 to 19. I urge the House to reject that option, as I believe that there is a vocational path. While undertaking the report, the Committee also examined the plight of disaffected children over the age of 14. We found strong evidence for developing a vocational path for those for whom that is suitable not just from 16 but from 14. That would imply a different, but equal, route to qualification that is not inferior to the gold A-level standard, but more vocationally oriented and distinct.

If we are prepared to be rooted in reality and to make those distinctions, we can credibly say that that is the right route for certain children in that age group to follow. They need not feel disadvantaged at the end of that path. In fact, someone who follows a vocational route from 14 or 16 may be far better off economically for at least the next 10 years than those who follow the classic academic university route, given the burden placed on them in the form of the cut in the maintenance grant and the loading of tuition fees.

Dr. Howells: I will not take a natch out of the bait offered to me, but I will ask the hon. Gentleman a question. If young people follow the vocational route—it is an interesting idea about which there has been much talk—should universities recognise the equality of that qualification and allow those young people to take up degree courses? Does the hon. Gentleman believe that all universities should now recognise the validity of advanced GNVQs as a route to university?

Mr. St. Aubyn: The fine university of Surrey, which is located in my constituency, does a great deal of work with the corporate sector in devising and assisting with courses that may lead to HND qualifications. There is also much growing co-operation between the college of further education in Guildford and the university at Kingston regarding which body offers the most appropriate courses for individual students. Rather than getting hung up on equality of accreditation, we should be concerned about ensuring that those who choose the vocational route can develop their skills and enter fields of higher education.

To answer the Minister directly, it is misguided to suggest that someone who achieves a vocational qualification at 18 would have any complaint because a specific university preferred to take for a specifically tailored course a student with an A-level qualification. It is important that, having followed the correct route, such individuals can develop their skills at sound and able institutions for the rest of their careers.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): In line with the Minister's comments, equality of accreditation is absolutely fundamental to the debate about vocational and academic education. Without that equality, we get first and second-rate courses based on whether pupils follow the academic or vocational route. The only way of overcoming that divide, with which we have been beset over the years, is by ensuring equality of accreditation and parity of esteem.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I fear that the House is in danger of confusing equality of opportunity with equal opportunity. Equal opportunity means that everyone must follow the same type of course, which is completely detrimental to the achievement of a diverse education system. Equality of opportunity means that there is no brick wall at the end of any route that the individual chooses to follow. Having followed the vocational route, nothing should prevent people from switching to a more academic course if they are late developers, develop a different interest, or discover a new educational aptitude.

We must be flexible in this area, and I am worried about the Minister's comments. I shall read his speech carefully in Hansard, as, unfortunately, I cannot be present to hear it tonight. We must not have a dogmatic accreditation system that, in trying to achieve equality of outcome, destroys equality of opportunity. Genuine opportunity meets the needs of the individual, and is not the same for everyone.

I think that I have spoken long enough on this diverse subject, but I conclude by urging the House to disregard the suggestion by the hon. Member for—

Mr. Willis: Harrogate and Knaresborough.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I shall one day remember both parts of the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

We must disregard the hon. Gentleman's suggestion to abolish the TECs. In Surrey—evidence was presented from Manchester and other areas also—there are some excellent local partnerships between further education colleges and TECs. Through such partnerships, we shall develop the courses that the local economy needs.

It is moonshine to suggest that a regional development agency covering the whole of the south-east could devote sufficient time to the needs of Surrey as distinct from those of Kent, East Sussex, West Sussex or any other area in that region. For us, that idea carries no weight. I commend the report on its excellent conclusion that the RDAs should be limited to a strategic role. In some ways, the report is more balanced than the debate that we have heard this afternoon.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): At this stage in the debate, I shall use the experience of one college to underline the importance of just two of the recommendations in the report of the Education and Employment Committee. The City of Bristol college is crucial both to the city and to younger students, and it announced last week its exciting plans to make provision in the city centre. That provision would be located next to the central library and adjacent to the harbourside, where developments for new centres in science, natural history and the performing arts are proposed. It is an obvious location for a college.

We know that the majority of colleges are situated in the suburbs, in dilapidated buildings, with equipment that is long out of date. Therefore, by making plans to look to the future, the college is doing exactly what the report asks of the further education sector. However, those plans will not be realised without capital support. Therefore, I underpin the report's claim for further investment of £60 million per year. That capital investment must be allocated, year on year, to this crucial sector. These demands are made on behalf of students going into industry, who need to use updated equipment and to be attracted to the college by modern buildings.

[Valerie Davey]

The college's principal highlighted the fact that, with all the new equipment and the college's accessibility, it is not possible to deliver all that the Government ask without supporting the students. That is why the Committee asks for resources even greater than the £500 million for the institutions and the £400 million mentioned by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). The Committee seeks more than £1 billion to go into support for students. I believe that that is the balance needed in the further education sector. We must support the students.

At a recent awards ceremony at the college, more than 80 students aged 20 to nearly 70 completed a year's course that gave them the qualifications to enter higher education. Not one of those students had a contribution from grants or loans to fees, books, child care or transport. They all completed the course on their own account, yet the principal knows that many more people would have had the qualifications, determination and enthusiasm to do the course and go on to higher education had they had the minimal support necessary to get them through that year.

The House has been united in all our debates on getting more students from a more diverse background into higher education. Already, 30 per cent. of students going into higher education come through the further education route. Many more could do so, as the House wishes, if there were greater support.

It has already been said that the Lane report was not available to the Committee, which is a pity. That report emphasises that the funding of transport should be a top priority. I talked to a small group in a country area not far from Bristol. A key demand of parents and lecturers was that their 16 to 19-year-olds should be able to get to whatever provision was available, whether a sixth form in their school, a sixth-form college or a further education college. To get there, they need transport to be available, and they need to have its cost funded. The Committee would have taken more account of that if we had had the Lane report to hand.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I am interested in my hon. Friend's remarks on transport. I agree that it is vital that young people are given opportunities through good transport. Is she aware that my constituency's further education college runs its own transport, giving people in rural areas the opportunity to travel into the city to take advantage of further education opportunities?

Valerie Davey: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution. I am delighted that her college is able to do that. Most colleges that I know have had to cut such provision, as have local education authorities. The Lane report notes that, in 1992-93, local education authorities were giving students £187 million a year in discretionary awards that included travel costs. That figure has fallen to well below £100 million. The injustice is that the ability to claim a discretionary award depends on where people live. The whole system must be considered carefully, and something like the Committee's proposals introduced.

Unlike the Opposition, I think that this debate is timely, coming before the final statement of the comprehensive spending review. I urge the Government to realise that this crucial area of education must be very high on their agenda. For the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) to describe the report as inflated expectation was very rich. His Government expected further education to go on increasing the number of students and continue producing quality education while reducing its funding. Theirs was the inflated expectation. The Committee's report is realistic, and I recommend it to the House and to the Government.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I shall be brief because many hon. Members wish to speak. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) rightly said that it was important to pay tribute to the work of the further education sector over the past few years, given the number of changes and challenges that have been presented to the people who work in it.

From talking to the principal of my excellent local FE college, Arnold and Carlton college, I know the challenges that face it and many of the other colleges in and around Nottingham. In facing them, they have had a poor deal. Hon. Members agree that the funding of further education has been inadequate. The message to the Minister from the Select Committee report, from his experience and from the experience of all hon. Members is that we must address funding. We have started to do that, and we should recognise that the Government have already made some additional money available. We must continue with that and, in so doing, we shall address another issue: poor morale. We must reinvigorate the FE sector's work force so that they can start to deliver many of the things that we want.

I forget which philosopher said that there is nothing as practical as a good theory, but if we want the FE sector to deliver what we want we must be clear what we want it to deliver. A multiplicity of demands is being made of it. Of course we want improved funding and to widen participation but to do that more money is needed. We must also address some of the other issues that my hon. Friends have raised, especially student support. Such issues are crucial in respect of the people whom we want to go back to education, such as women returners.

For many of those people, alongside funding lies the issue of child care provision. The concept of lifelong learning is important, as is delivering training to support our economic needs. We must recognise that FE colleges often deliver courses in the most difficult circumstances and in remote areas. When the pits in my area shut, it was the FE college that moved in to try to retrain miners who had lost their jobs. We still have people out of work or in need of retraining and the FE colleges are trying to reskill them. We should pay tribute to the FE sector; we often fail to recognise the valuable work it does. It is not the grandiose, fantastic, multi-million-pound research that many universities proclaim—important though that is—but the small-scale individual courses delivered in a village hall or community centre that are vital if we are to provide opportunity to all our people.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) has gone, because I suspect that our views are not as far apart as he thinks. As deputy head teacher of a city comprehensive for a number of years I was involved in ensuring that further education colleges and the 14-to-16 school sector worked together to raise achievement and increase the participation and staying-on rates of 16-year-olds. I am not saying that FE colleges are institutions solely for problem pupils, but they offer the sort of opportunity that schools often find it difficult to offer, in a different environment, which can often help disaffected young people to stay in the education system.

We talk about social exclusion and about offering opportunity, so I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider ways in which FE colleges can work with the key stage 4 curriculum, which is the 14-to-16 curriculum, to increase participation rates and to encourage young people to stay on in education. I can see numerous ways in which colleges in Nottingham and the schools sector can work together, but that is extremely difficult to organise because of lack of flexibility in funding arrangements. It is to colleges' great credit that, in many cases, they offer courses at or far below cost to ensure that opportunities remain open.

When talking about widening participation and trying to get more young people into colleges, we have to recognise that the colleges need support. Many city and inner-city colleges are trying to persuade among the most disaffected and difficult young people in society to stay on in or to return to education. Colleges need support to deal with those young people, but too often—this is not a party political point—they are left out on their own when there is a problem as though it is the colleges' fault that the problem has arisen. We need to work with colleges and to recognise that difficulties are likely to arise when we try to re-engage in education disaffected young people who have failed at school, who may have been in trouble with the police or out of work, and who have been left on the shelf.

If we support colleges and avoid apportioning blame when the odd problem arises—I think all hon. Members know what I am talking about—we shall start to address some of the issues of social exclusion in our cities and of disadvantaged young people. I want to emphasise the role of the FE sector in helping schools to deal with disaffection and in dealing with some of the disaffected members of the post-16 age group. FE colleges have a fundamental role to play and we should support them in that role because they offer opportunities to enrich and extend the curriculum that schools cannot offer on their own.

In my view we have to speak more of the 14-to-19 curriculum and less of the 16-to-19 curriculum. To my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), I say that I thought that the Select Committee report was excellent. It offers an opportunity and a way forward, but we have to grasp the nettle and recognise the way in which FE colleges can contribute to raising achievement in schools and tackling social exclusion and disaffection across the age range.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): One of my proudest moments this year came when I attended an awards ceremony at which my constituent, Mrs. Sheila Gravel, won the national vocational student of the year award. My hon. Friend the Minister met her afterwards.

Sheila left school at 16 and went to work as a machinist in a garment factory. After decades of work, she found herself redundant. Despite having a family and a dependent father to look after, she decided to take the opportunity, which had not been open to her at 16, to go into further education. In doing so, she embarked on a course that not only provided her with skills for the future, but enriched her life. Having completed her first course, she went on to take a higher education course, which she started at Doncaster college and is continuing at Leeds university.

Sheila's achievement is one testimony among the many of mature students in Britain who have taken advantage of our further education system even though education and training have not played a role for large periods of their life. That is good and, as far as I am aware, the number of mature students returning to further education is increasing. However, our problem is the number of Sheilas who continue to leave school at 16 and wait decades before taking up education and training once more. We in Doncaster, where almost 50 per cent. of school leavers do not go on to further education, whether at school or at a further education college, recognise what a huge challenge faces us.

It is important to consider the reasons why young people do not choose to continue their education. As has eloquently been said by my hon. Friends, the key is to treat 16-year-old school leavers as young people rather than as children—and therein lies the importance of financial support. I should like to point out to the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) that child benefit is taken up only by families whose child is in full-time further education; it is not available to families whose children have left school, perhaps to take up a low-pay, low-skill job, or to families whose children are unemployed. I agree that there are issues relating to support for family life and to recognition of parents' contribution toward their child's upkeep, but we have to look at the motivation and incentives for young people to continue their education. In its report, the Select Committee tried to highlight that as an issue for the Government to consider when determining different funding priorities. Child benefit has to be considered in that respect.

Mr. Green: If the hon. Lady feels so strongly about maintenance grants for 16 to 19-year-olds, may I ask which way she voted on the issue of maintenance grants for students at university? Did she vote for them to be taken away, or is she consistent in her views?

Caroline Flint: In the first place, students in higher education get loans. Let me make it clear: having in the past year dealt with several constituents in further education who pay for their courses, who combine that with work and who are on low incomes, I have no hesitation in supporting a fairer and more equitable system whereby people in further education, whether young or mature students, get a better share of taxes and more support for continuing their education, such as currently benefits those in higher education. I want a fairer and more equitable system and, for that reason, I had no hesitation in supporting the Government's recommendations.

Many graduates understand that their future level of income is enhanced by undertaking a degree course. We have to get across to young people the message that undertaking further education can enhance their future employability and standard of living. A person with a level 3 qualification earns, on average, 25 per cent. more than someone with no qualifications. A person with a degree earns, on average, twice as much as somebody without any qualifications. The unemployment rate among people with level 3 qualifications is half that of those with no qualifications. We must impress on young people that investment in their education and training at 16 will really make a difference to their prospects and those of their future families.

Child care has been commented upon during the debate. Only 0.1 per cent. of Further Education Funding Council funding to colleges is devoted to child care. I am pleased that this year the Government granted an additional £5 million, but I hope that that is only the start.

I shall give an example of how child care is important. I visited in my constituency a unit that is for young parents under 16—girls who find themselves pregnant and are able to continue their education with the support of a young parents unit working in harmony with schools. Child care and support is offered. However, once they reach the age of 16 and leave the school system, the project breaks down. The local FE college has a creche, but it is only for children aged two and above. That creates a vacuum. In the most difficult circumstances, young women are supported in continuing their school education, but they can find themselves at a loss when they have to leave the establishment.

When I asked the person in charge of the young parents unit what happened in the vacuum that I have described, she said that young girls often seek to assume more parental responsibilities, thinking, "I might as well have more of my family now than delay for the future."

We know from the evidence that nine out of 10 lone parents would like to go to work. The two major barriers to their succeeding are child care and access to education and training qualifications. I impress on my hon. Friend the Minister that this is an area that is regarded as important to the life chances of young people and their children.

The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), who had to leave the debate early, for which he apologised, mentioned that in the evidence given to the Education and Employment Committee on the governance and accountability of further education colleges it appeared that on the whole there were few examples of governance and accountability breaking down. The hon. Gentleman was right. It is testimony to the sector that it has successfully made the transition from incorporation, but it was made clear to the Committee that where governance and accountability had broken down it had been to the detriment of the entire sector. The scale of the difficulties caused by that breakdown was such that it left a slur on the whole sector. In addressing that, various suggestions have been made, including the appointment of an ombudsman.

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): My hon. Friend makes an important point about governance. There are calls for more funding for further education, but unless governance and accountability are right, more money will not of itself serve the purpose. In my constituency, the board and management of the Wirral metropolitan college managed to create considerable debt by over-grandiose ideas, by straight mismanagement and by creating over-dependence on European funding that did not continue. In those circumstances extra funding would not help, yet the very same board and management comprise people who are closing facilities to address a problem of their causing. They are entirely undemocratically unaccountable. That cannot continue. We need to address the issue of governance and management, which cannot be done separately from funding.

Caroline Flint: I endorse my hon. Friend's comments. It is important, as in other sectors of public life, that governance and accountability in the FE sector are transparent and that people can put trust in our national further education service.

As for model agreements in terms of staff, I do not think that anyone on the Select Committee felt that there was no need for flexibility. What was interesting was the evidence we received from the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers on sixth-form colleges. When asked why there had been little publicity about rancour and disputes in its colleges, it said that flexible models based on a national framework had helped it to succeed, whereas in FE colleges the absence of national models had led to disputes.

We have had a timely debate that has enabled us to draw attention to the importance of the FE sector. I know that under the Labour Government it will have a healthy future.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): I shall be as brief as possible because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak.

My local college is an interesting case for examination, given the investigations that are taking place, but I welcome the debate, the Education and Employment Committee report and the Kennedy report that preceded it. Those reports have highlighted the important issues in the further education sector.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) said, it is important that we use the debate to highlight the tremendous work that goes on in FE and sixth-form colleges throughout the country, which involves both staff and students. They should be congratulated. Often the work goes unnoticed.

The contribution to the country's economy, never mind local economies, and to cultural and social developments in communities, is outstanding. It would not be possible to take away a FE college or a sixth-form college without that being noticed. The removal of a college would be a massive blow to any community and to the economy of the country as a whole.

Funding is crucial—I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has heard the argument about that. It is important that we fund the FE sector well. There are, of course, priorities to be determined and decisions to be made by the Government—and they have made a start. The previous Government incorporated colleges and established certain formulae. Many colleges have suffered as a result.

I shall give a brief example. Widnes sixth-form college in my constituency is successful and has achieved tremendous educational attainment. It is used by many of my constituents. However, the college is about 25 per cent. worse off now than it was under previous local authority funding. The principal is in no doubt who is to blame. He says:

"This is a direct consequence of the horrendous funding cuts imposed by the last Government."

Demand-led funding has been mentioned briefly. The way in which the previous Government cut off funding was abominable. They did not just stop it; they stopped it overnight without warning. That created massive panic throughout the FE sector and in colleges throughout the country—I remember receiving a call from my local college. The Opposition will not respond to this issue. Similarly, they will not respond to the fact that more colleges are now in financial trouble. Why are more colleges now facing financial risk? The Opposition have sidestepped these issues. Earlier, the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) suggested that I was quoting from a party brief. Actually, the facts are in the Select Committee report. They also appear in the Library figures.

The Government recognise the importance of further education. They have started to make that clear with their commitment to lifelong learning and the learning age. It is important that there is specific help for people on low incomes or with low educational attainment. We can help them improve their education.

In Halton, there are major problems as a result of structural unemployment. Learning difficulties and low educational attainment are also important to my constituents and Halton college has a fundamental, pivotal role to play. There are special needs and young people with learning difficulties. What happens to them when they leave school, whether it be a special school or a school integrated within a normal comprehensive school? What happens to their education? What role can FE colleges play? It is clearly crucial.

In terms of national and multinational companies and the economy as a whole, support for FE colleges and the courses that they put on should be recognised as important.

Halton college is under investigation. The principal and deputy principal have been suspended. A number of allegations have been made. For obvious reasons, I shall not go into them, but the college will be an interesting study, given the current system, especially in terms of franchising. I shall say a little about the college because the investigation may have clouded the good work that goes on there.

Halton college was formerly Widnes technical college and has existed for more than 100 years, so it is not a new innovation; it has been part of the community for a long time. In 1993 it was incorporated with other colleges. It has 38,000 students, but I bet that it is not the largest college. The students' programmes of study are at the college, in the local community or at their place of work, so they can choose how the courses are delivered, which has a massive impact.

The college has not only a local impact—it has students from all over the country. A number of issues are under investigation at the moment, along with the franchise. Many colleges have students from all over the country, so they make an important contribution to the economy. The age profile of students is interesting; 12 per cent. are aged 16 to 19 and 88 per cent. are 20 or over. Forty-four per cent. are male and 56 per cent. are female. The college provides work for about 800 people, of whom about 50 per cent. live in the Halton area.

Crucially for the success of the economy and our future, colleges such as Halton offer a range of courses. Halton offers courses in hotel and catering studies, health and community care and humanities. It also teaches computing and information technology, multimedia and science and engineering, which are four of the most crucial areas for our economy in terms of reskilling and re-educating people.

Halton college has recently won a number of beacon awards and been commended for its work. It does a tremendous amount of work on links with the local community. There has been specific investment and improvements in links with local schools, such as video conferences, computer link-ups and distance learning in schools. Those innovations will be very important in the next century.

Several hon. Members have referred to better governance. I met the staff of Halton college last week. What was interesting was the clear split between those on the franchising side and those who delivered local courses. They seemed to be two separate bodies and I wonder whether that is linked to management and how the college has developed. It is important for the way in which the college is managed and assessed that there is wide community representation on the board of governors, including staff, students and members of the local authority. I welcome the Government's proposals on better governance, which will improve the situation tremendously.

The Further Education Funding Council, which controls the further education sector, has been conducting the investigation at Halton college. We must examine the funding council's role in providing financial controls and checks and balances for the whole sector to ensure that colleges are correctly run, that we get the best value for money from our investment in the FE sector and that we can rely on the work carried out in that sector.

The FE sector is vital to our economy and our local communities and it deserves the support that the Government can give it.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I welcome the debate and the Select Committee report. The points that have been made about the timing of the debate are worth dwelling on because, if it had taken place earlier in the year, it might have set the context for the debate on maintenance grants and tuition fees in the proceedings on the Teaching and Higher Education Bill. That would have strengthened people's awareness of the fact that the overwhelming majority of students aged 19 and over in further education have no maintenance grants and pay their tuition fees.

The problem for FE is that it has a different meaning in different parts of the country. In my constituency, every 16-year-old in the state sector is in further education because we benefit from a highly coherent system of education whereby there are eight schools for 11 to 16-year-olds and two colleges—one Catholic sixth-form college and one general tertiary college. Both are of the highest reputation, and one has received an inspection report that was recently described as the best ever written of any similar college. Further education is particularly important for my constituents.

As the years go on, we might need to think of a different term for further education. The boundary between further education and adult education is increasingly irrelevant because the majority of students in further education colleges are now adults. The growth of tertiary colleges and the incorporation of sixth-form colleges into the sector mean that the old Cinderella image of FE is increasingly inappropriate. I congratulate the Government on getting lifelong learning firmly on the agenda and I hope that, in future, the House will have an annual debate on lifelong learning.

I do not want to go over the previous Government's failures, but they bequeathed to the new Government a legacy of a chaotic and fragmented internal market and a chronic funding crisis leading to intense demoralisation in colleges throughout the country, which in turn led to disastrous industrial relations in many colleges. That is a sad and tragic bequest. I congratulate the new Government on the work that has been done in the past 12 months to remedy the deficiencies of the internal market that we inherited. I particularly welcome not only the Select Committee report but the Kennedy, Fryer and Lane reports, which have all contributed to an important debate on lifelong learning in the past 12 months. I welcome the Government's commitment to increasing by 500,000 the places in further and higher education.

I want to dwell on three issues arising from the Select Committee's report and then comment on more detailed points. First, I cannot entirely agree that the problem of funding is merely one of the quantum. The funding methodology itself has created a bureaucratic nightmare. Although it does not, perhaps, rival that of the Child Support Agency, on which we had a statement earlier, it is not far short of it.

I shall quote one example. Several hon. Members have referred to the problems of franchising and the fact that their colleges have experienced severe financial crises because of the vagaries and instabilities of franchising. That is because the funding methodology specifically encourages franchising without there being a full understanding of the consequences of that. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take on board the fact that the specifics of the funding methodology have to be changed. We must bring about, exactly as we have done for the Child Support Agency and its formula, a simpler and more stable system. I am not entirely convinced that the changes that have been made to this year's funding methodology, particularly on franchising, will bring about that stability as quickly as is necessary.

On funding, I also add my support for the proposed changes for maintenance for 16 to 19-year-old students via the reform of child benefit. That is a cause that I have long supported. It is self-evident that the reform proposed in the Select Committee report is the only way forward, and I hope that the Government take that on board.

My second point on the report relates to planning. I welcome the acceptance that there has been a chronic lack of strategic planning in the sector. I also welcome the improved and enhanced role for the Further Education Funding Council regional committees and the voice that is given to the regional development agencies. Again, I am not sure that the report fully spells out exactly how strategic planning should be done. I agree with the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) that we cannot plan through the funding mechanism alone. If we do that, we shall simply reproduce the mistakes of the previous Government. The Government should spell out, in the near future, exactly what powers the FEFC regional committees and RDAs will have.

I shall quote one brief example of the chaos that exists, particularly in the 16 to 19-year-old sector, in the constituency in which I live, which is not the constituency that I represent. I live in one of the smallest metropolitan districts in the country, in which education for 16 to 19-year-olds is provided by two private schools, two grant-maintained selective schools and five grant-maintained notionally comprehensive schools, which are becoming increasingly selective because of the inevitable dynamics of opting out. There are also four local authority comprehensive schools and a general further education college that has an associateship with a sixth-form college outside the district. In addition, many young people at one end of the district go to the Catholic school for 11 to 18-year-olds across the border and many at the other end of the district go to one of the two sixth-form colleges in the adjacent district.

The result is chaos, fragmentation and a massive amount of unnecessary travelling by young people. There is inefficiency, duplication of courses and no concept of economies of scale. A generation of young people has lost out because of the failure of the previous Government—I hope that this Government will not do the same—to get to grips with the planning of provision for 16 to 19-year-olds.

The third major issue in the report on which I shall comment is that of widening participation. I found the appendix to the Green Paper extremely valuable in giving us the figures of those who participate in HE and FE, in adult education, and of those who do not.

This year, the Government, to their credit, have introduced a widening participation factor in the funding methodology to the tune of £10 million, but that is a drop in the ocean. If we are serious about implementing the Kennedy agenda, we should ensure that the widening participation factor—however calculated—is much greater.

Most people working in the sector would acknowledge that one reason why it is difficult to encourage those who have been alienated by their school experience to return to continuing education is that they need a great deal of personal support, because they lack confidence and communication skills. I question whether the big policies emerging from the Green Paper—the university for industry, and individual learning accounts—will, in themselves, succeed in widening participation, because the very people whom we need to encourage to become more involved in lifelong learning are the ones who will find it most difficult to handle the new technology that is implicit in the concept of the UFI, and to put some money into an individual learning account. We need to rethink how we might widen participation for people who have not been involved in any education or training since school.

Finally, I shall raise some specific points, to which I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond in his reply, or take back to the Department. The first concerns schedule 2—specifically, the changes that have been made to the accreditation of courses under schedule 2(a). I understand that that is the subject of lively debate. Many colleges fear that the changes to schedule 2(a) will have a severe financial effect on them because they have been introduced too quickly, after prospectuses for next year have been produced and students recruited.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider, and take a personal interest in, that issue, together with the issue of schedule 2(a) and the new deal. I understand that new regulations limit new deal over-25 participants to courses under schedule 2(a), whereas many of them will need to follow courses under schedule 2(c), 2(d), 2(e), 2(f) or 2(g). That point needs to be reviewed.

I shall be brief, as other hon. Members wish to speak. On schedule 2, my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) raised a point about drawing the distinction between education for work and education for leisure. That point is strongly made in the report. I am not sure that it is easy to draw such a distinction. I do not believe that we can draw a line between that which prepares people for work and that which prepares them for leisure. I ask the Government to think carefully before making any changes to funding regimes on the basis of such a hard and fast division. Increasingly, as we move into the next century, as work patterns change completely and as people's working lives change, educating people for leisure time will be as important as educating and training them for work.

The development of a credit accumulation and transfer scheme was also flagged up in the report. The difficulty is that, at the moment, there is no incentive for colleges to become involved in such schemes because the funding methodology works against it. That leads me to the important point that the funding methodology needs to be changed so that a fully flexible unitised curriculum can be developed.

The national grid for learning is a crucial development, widely welcomed in the school sector. No reference has been made to how that might be extended to the further education sector. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will mention that in his reply.

I welcome the work that the Minister and his colleagues have done in the past 12 months. There has been more discussion of lifelong learning than at any time in the past 30 years. All we need is for the Government to put their money where their mouth is.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I welcome tonight's debate and congratulate my hon. Friends serving on the Select Committee on Education and Employment, who were responsible for the report. It highlights the importance of further education and permits us to support it and to give it the recognition that it deserves.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) admonished us, telling us not to treat further education as a Cinderella service. He was right to do so; but when I look at those empty green Conservative Benches—on which one Back Bencher has just appeared—I can easily see why further education has been a Cinderella service. It is easy to see why, over the past 18 years, further education has been treated with appalling disrespect, funding has fallen and very few debates in the House have emphasised the importance of that crucial sector of the education system.

Like many Labour Members, I have been a lecturer in both further and higher education. I have also been a member of the governing body of Cambridge regional college, and chair of governors for three of the years that I was a governor. I was determined, in the years that I was a governor, to achieve a new building for Cambridge regional college. It was a matter of symbolic importance because, when I became a governor, Cambridge regional college existed in six ex-primary schools. It was run down; people did not identify with the place, and had great difficulty in finding it.

Now we have a magnificent new building in the King Hedges area of Cambridge, which the Minister has visited. He will agree that it gives the college the status and importance that it deserves, and sends a very important message to the students, because it makes them realise that they are important to the people who fund the service.

Recently, I had a meeting with the principals and chairs of governors of the three further education colleges that serve my constituency. I am very fortunate, in that my constituency has three excellent further education institutes, one of which, Hill's Road sixth-form college, is almost always the highest in the list of those state schools that achieve Oxbridge entrance. The other colleges are no less excellent, and produce a very high standard of education indeed. Nevertheless, funding is an issue, and one that must be addressed.

Before I discuss funding, I shall mention the collaboration that exists between those three further education colleges; it is probably unique to Cambridge, and might be emulated elsewhere. There exists in Cambridge a collegiate board, consisting of all post-16 organisations in the area. The board's mission is to provide informed access for all students to a coherent, flexible and comprehensive programme of high-quality post-16 education and training. The collegiate board is the forum where the heads of the pre and post-16 establishments meet, and in their meetings they are always joined by representatives of the training and enterprise council, of the local education authority and of the schools that have access to, or send their students to, the further education sector.

The areas of co-operation and collaboration include: common application procedures; guidance to students pre and post 16; strategic planning—which is important, and about which my hon. Friends have spoken a great deal tonight; curriculum development and curriculum mapping; staff development; personnel practices; marketing and promotional activities; and a host of other areas. That amply proves that a group of institutions, some of which are vastly different in character, can collaborate in a way that the previous Government did not think possible. The previous Government set one college against another, creating a competitive environment that was entirely destructive to the ethos of further education. The collaboration that we are now achieving is good for students, for lecturers, for further education and for the local economy.

On the issue of funding, there are considerable concerns among my colleges. The three colleges this year are delivering 1.2 million Further Education Funding Council units, equivalent to more than 25,000 individual student enrolments. However, FEFC funding is available for only 1.1 million units, so not only are the units of funding smaller than in higher education, but they are not being properly funded.

[Mrs. Anne Campbell]

All three colleges have been granted funding for about one third of the growth in the current financial year, which means that two thirds of the current shortfall will remain unfunded for next year, unless there can be some great influx into FE funding. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will have some good news for us later this year when the results of the comprehensive spending review are announced.

Another important factor is the serious adverse gap that is beginning to emerge between salary levels for teachers in secondary schools and teachers in sixth-form colleges. One of my FE colleges, Hill's Road sixth-form college, must find substantial capital investment from within a greatly reduced funding allocation. Unlike general further education colleges, many of which have a long history of private income and investment, which often leads to commercial and vocational opportunities, sixth-form colleges are largely dependent on FEFC income. As a result, they are paying their staff less and the funding gap is growing ever wider.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will address those issues. I welcome the debate, and am grateful for my opportunity to participate in it.

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): Incorporation has brought some benefits to the further education sector, but more needs to be done about the issue of governance. In my constituency, the board of the local college is cutting its costs by attempting to close facilities. That is presented as a move to a sort of education without walls or buildings, a virtual reality new and exciting world of education. There may be something in that, but to me, buildings, campuses and social interaction among students have been, are and will be a massive component of our further education. We cannot do away with that.

The pity of what is happening in my constituency is that, although it is presented as educationally driven, in fact it is debt driven. College principals may well be good educationists, but they are not necessarily good managers. Sometimes an inverse ratio is in play. Those who are the best educationists may be the worst managers. Those who talk the best game are often the worst players.

In simple terms, it is the principal who appoints the board, and the board that effectively supports the principal. That brings a false collateral and respectability to the business of governance. All appears to be well, but it is not. The proposed closure of a campus in my constituency comes on top of an earlier site closure, and presages the closure of a third. It follows the removal of creche facilities and of a theatre. It is a catalogue of disasters.

There are 7,000 signatures to a petition protesting against the board's actions, there have been dozens of letters, and people have written to newspapers and spoken to me. Not one has supported the action of the governors of the college, but the board presses on none the less. It takes no account of the views of the people. We must find a mechanism to deal with that. Notices go up on a site announcing that it is available for other uses, students are thereby put off the courses, and a self-fulfilling prophecy is at work. It is not good for further education in general or for my constituents in particular.

I commend the Select Committee's report and the Government's consultation paper, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply.

7.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): I thank hon. Members on both sides of the House, although Opposition Members are in short supply, for an excellent and well-informed debate, which arose from an excellent and challenging report. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) for chairing the Committee and introducing the report. It is an extremely important report. There have been many contributions, and I shall try to deal with them, but I hope that hon. Members will excuse me if I miss some.

We in the Department are pleased to welcome the report, which is wide-ranging, comprehensive and perceptive. We are pleased that the Select Committee chose the further education sector as one of its first areas for scrutiny.

The Government will respond in the next few weeks. That will provide the opportunity for a detailed assessment of the report and its recommendations, but I can say now that we welcome the general thrust of the Select Committee's report and its emphasis on the critical importance of FE. The sector requires all the encouragement that it can get.

The previous growth-at-any price strategy had run aground earlier in the year, with the abrupt cancellation of the demand-led element—DLE—by the previous Government, as my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) made clear. They had promised to fund DLE payments due in the 1997-98 financial year, and we had to make good that promise. We had to find the money—£65 million—to fill the black hole in FE finances left behind by our predecessors, before we even started to work out what additional sums the sector required.

The sector has been in bad shape. It has undergone continuing and swingeing efficiency gains. There is nothing wrong with efficiency gains, of course, as long as they are sensible and measured, and take full account of the sector's opportunities and needs, but when they become a constant factor in FE financing, they cease to be efficiency gains and become efficiency losses—not only a loss of good teaching staff, as many hon. Members have pointed out, but more seriously, a loss of morale, shared purpose, respect and, most important, a loss of direction. For far too many of our colleges, that has been the case.

I have travelled around the country visiting FE colleges, and some of them have been the best educational institutions that I have set foot in, including all the universities that I have visited, if one takes into account the task with which those colleges are charged, the use that they make of their limited resources and the brilliance of some of the teaching and practice that go on there. However, some FE colleges are pretty dreadful. Many hon. Members have emphasised that management requires careful consideration. My hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) made the point that being a brilliant teacher does not make one a brilliant accountant or manager. I know that college principals are giving close attention to that.

Our first priority, having sorted out the financial mess for 1997-98, was to assess the position for 1998-99. Within the rigorous approach to public expenditure to which we had committed ourselves, we have none the less, since last November, managed to make available more than £100 million for the sector, over and above our predecessors' plans. Further education occupies such a key place in our education and training system that the money must be well spent, and I have no doubt that it must be added to year on year. I entirely agree with what has been said about the need for adequate funds.

Mr. Sheerman: Does that not depend on how many colleges my hon. Friend has visited, and on what percentage he considers truly excellent—the best ever? If the proportion is only 5 per cent., or only 10 per cent., whatever resources we can put in will not be well used. What are we doing to ensure that we bring the remainder up to the best standards?

Dr. Howells: I will not hector college principals or managers about what they should or should not do. I think that Governments have been all too handy at telling other people how they should manage their businesses. I will say, however, that I think we are very bad at identifying and disseminating best practice in this country. All too often, we do not give credit where it is due. It is easy to use soundbites to criticise colleges, but colleges—some of the worst as well as some of the best—have been in dire financial straits. I will not appropriate blame in that way, and I do not think that there is a blanket method of doing so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) described the "bureaucratic nightmare" of the funding methodology. He is right: it is a bureaucratic nightmare—almost as bad a nightmare as the method of funding training and education councils, which we are reviewing. In many respects, we have inherited an awful bureaucratic mess, which we must help colleges to clear up—but through a partnership approach, rather than a "top down from Whitehall" approach.

The Select Committee set out its view of the mission of further education, which I consider worth quoting. It said:

"The further education sector supports the nation's economic competitiveness and social well-being by improving the skills of the existing and potential workforce and by creating opportunities for achievement for all members of the community."

I do not think that the position could be summed up better; what worries me is that not everyone may share that view. I am not sure that many employers share it, and I am very sorry if they do not.

There was a strong link between further education and polytechnics—in a different respect, but we saw the resulting service as being more seamless. I regret very much that, even now, many of our leading firms do not see the further education sector as a natural ally that could make it more competitive. It is vital that that trust and partnership are rebuilt, whatever we do with further education.

It is not just a question of funds, although funds are important. More employers should realise that, if they invest money in education and training—work-based training provided by colleges or other forms of training, perhaps campus-based—they, and we, will ultimately benefit.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Does my hon. Friend agree that restricting collaborative provision to local collaboration could damage relations between colleges and employers even further?

Dr. Howells: I know that my hon. Friend is concerned about the excellent further education college in Barnsley, which has emerged at the top of the spectrum in the examination of colleges. It is a superb institution.

We must look carefully at franchising arrangements, and I am glad that the Select Committee flagged them up. There is a variety of such arrangements, and there is no doubt that, even if they are at a distance, those that work must be encouraged. We must not be too prescriptive, and we must not barge in when we need to be sensitive.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) raised some important points. Most important, he told us that—I think—4.5 million people had great difficulty with literacy and numeracy and with simply expressing themselves to their peers. There can be no greater condemnation of an education system. Indeed, I have heard that the figure may be as high as 7 million. If further education is to widen access, and to engage people to whom education means nothing, it clearly faces a huge task. There can be no more important task. It has been called the Kennedy agenda, after Lady Kennedy. There is, however, another task for further education, which has not been talked about much tonight.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): I know that all Labour Members appreciate my hon. Friend's work for further education colleges. Before the debate finishes, however, may I raise a question about basic education? What is the position on new deal 25-plus? I am thinking especially of those—literally hundreds—who need basic education before they can proceed to courses that will give them the jobs that our Government want them to have. I hope that my hon. Friend will say that that is being addressed.

Dr. Howells: It is being addressed. We are in constant contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is currently running the great new deal project.

The Kennedy agenda must be one of the most important before the country. Its aim is to widen access to education, and to re-engage what is almost a lost generation. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough is right to stress the importance of that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) spoke of the need for further education to deal with problems of social exclusion and disaffection. That is hugely important. Another issue was hardly discussed tonight—

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Howells: I am sorry, but I will not. The hon. Gentleman has only just entered the Chamber, and I must finish my speech.

[Dr. Howells]

There is another agenda: the agenda of training expert technicians. It could be described as the other end of the further education spectrum. In this country, we have not been very good at teaching intermediate skills. We were good at it once, but we stopped somewhere along the line.

The hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) spoke of the benefits of incorporation, and there is no doubt that that has brought benefits, but it has also caused terrible disruption to the relationship between companies and further education colleges. I hope that the bridges can be rebuilt. If we can rebuild them, and use imagination in returning to further education its automatic sense of dignity and self-esteem, I think that we shall succeed.

Ms Hodge: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We ought to congratulate all who work in further education—not just on surviving, but on prospering over the past 18 difficult years, particularly the most recent. They have provided extended opportunity and improved training and qualifications for the many, and have begun to provide access for more people.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), the only Conservative Member who has been present throughout the debate. I do not suggest that that is because he is on the Opposition payroll, but one Conservative Back Bencher and nine Labour Back Benchers have been present throughout. That says it all: that is why further education has been ignored for too long by Members of Parliament.

The challenges facing the Minister are immense, and I have full confidence that he will rise to the occasion. FE is rich in its diversity, and it faces many difficult problems in the future. We have raised capital and revenue funding, and the funding of institutions and people. We have also made some controversial and challenging recommendations—we wanted deliberately to put them on the political agenda.

I thank the members of my Committee—we all worked extremely hard to put together a comprehensive report. I also thank our advisers, those who gave written and verbal evidence to the Committee, and those who work and study in further education for ensuring that it is a sector in which we can have confidence. The matter passes over to the Minister. We wish him luck, and think that we have timed the debate appropriately. We look forward to a welcome outcome from the comprehensive spending review.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum not exceeding £55,642,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1999 for expenditure by the Office of the Minister for Public Service on the central management of, and delivery of services to, the civil service including the delivery of cross-departmental IT systems; expenditure resulting from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's chairmanship of the Ministerial Committee on Food and Safety; and certain other services.—[Dr. David Clark.]

7.30 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): As Chairman of the Public Administration Committee, it is a privilege to commence the debate on the White Paper and the Select Committee's response to it. We published our report in May, and although it would have been beneficial to hear the Government's response to it today, we must bear it in mind that it was published only six or seven weeks ago. The Government are usually given two months to respond, and we hope that they will manage to do so within that time.

Tonight, we need to emphasise how important it is to pass freedom of information legislation along the lines of the excellent White Paper produced just before Christmas by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Draft legislation should be produced as soon as possible so that the Select Committee can go through it and listen to witnesses. A freedom of information Bill should also be in the Queen's Speech as part of the legislative programme for the 1998–99 Session, and I hope that we shall be enlightened on that subject.

From the Labour point of view, it is important to remember that freedom of information legislation was in the 1974 election manifesto, as well as the 1992 and 1997 manifestos. We formed the Government in 1974, so it is legitimate to ask why people lost interest in the matter. Unfortunately, part of the history of freedom of information legislation to which all commentators refer is that Opposition parties always commit themselves to it, but that, funnily, that commitment always falls by the wayside when they come into government.

I was told earlier today that, towards the end of their term in office from 1974 to 1979—just before they fell and when the Liberal party was committed to voting against them on a confidence motion—the Labour Government suddenly took an interest in Clement Freud's Back-Bench freedom of information Bill. By the time the Labour Government were buying, the Liberals were not selling, so the Bill fell and did not get through. We have an opportunity, 24 years later, to put that right.

The issue is always the same. People come into government with a flush of enthusiasm for freedom of information, but that needs to be driven forward to get the legislation on to the statute book before the iron of Administration enters the soul. We are at that exact point: the manifesto commitment has been made, the White Paper has been published, the Select Committee reported on it in May and we are waiting for the Government's response. We have been promised the draft Bill, although it will probably be published in the summer recess, and the expectation is that there will be a commitment to legislate in the next Session in the Queen's Speech later this year.

The events of yesterday, and the revelations in The Observer, serve only to emphasise how important it is to state the principle that was at the heart of Labour's manifesto: I cannot say too emphatically that information should be for the many, not the few. Restricting information to the few would provide those interstices into which lobbyists would insert themselves, and boast about how they could obtain information that was not available to the general public. Absurd though such boasts may be, in a climate of denial of information to the many, the few would seek to profit from that denial. Perhaps yesterday's events were providential in the light of the timing of the debate and the messages that we hope to hear from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

When they come into office for the first time, Governments want to open up government, but there is also the perception that, from time to time, the availability of information will undoubtedly be inconvenient to the operation of government. All Governments have a control freak tendency and a liberationist tendency, and this Government are no different. The Select Committee's report could not be clearer in welcoming the White Paper, but the litmus test of a Government is not what they put in their manifesto or in a White Paper, but what they enact in legislation.

We hope, therefore, that the draft Bill at least will be available before the 18-month period between last May's Queen's Speech and the next one, in November, has ended. We also hope for a commitment to legislate, although I do not expect my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to give such a commitment tonight, because the content of the Queen's Speech has not yet been determined. It is important that we repeat the welcome that the Select Committee gave to the strength of the White Paper, and I hope that the House will back that.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster produced an excellent document, "Your Right to Know: the Background Material". The Government suggested how freedom of information legislation would work in practice by implementing the principle in respect of the White Paper—they published the document. It commits the Government to practising what they preach—what the Americans call walking the walk as well as talking the talk. This useful document states at paragraph 11:

"The manifesto commitment implies that the Government intends the Act to go beyond the terms of the code of practice on access to Government information, quite apart from the obvious enhanced status of primary legislation over a non-statutory document. In keeping with this, the Government rejected within a few days of taking office options which would have involved simply translating the existing code into statutory form."

We expect that the legislation will be stronger than the previous Government's code of practice. Having gone back 24 years to the previous Labour Government's commitment, I can go back four years to what the previous Government did and the presumed reasons why they did it. The previous Government introduced a non-statutory code because they believed that a freedom of information Act would cut across the relationship between hon. Members and Ministers. Parliamentary questions could have been asked and not answered, but the Bill of Rights would have been cut across if that had been overridden by an information commissioner. Members of the public would have been put over and above Members of Parliament in their ability to gain access to information from Government Departments.

A Minister may decide not to provide information through an answer to a parliamentary question, and there is little that we can do about that. We can ask another question in six months' time or whatever. A member of the public, on being denied similar information, could go to an information commissioner and that would disadvantage hon. Members, so the previous Government said, "Let us have just a non-statutory code."

Unfortunately, as I think all hon. Members would accept, that code has not worked. It has not established rights clearly. The public are cynical about it. They do not use it much. When they do use it, they find the response is full of delays: Departments can always find reasons to fob off the ombudsman because there is no statutory backing.

Let me cite a recent case. I had submitted a request for information on behalf of Friends of the Earth, Cymru about the Gwent wetland reserve and the mitigating measure for the Cardiff Bay development corporation. I shall not bore the House with the whole thing, but I made a complaint around about Christmas 1996 and it took until a couple of weeks ago—18 months—for the ombudsman to reach a verdict, simply because of the development corporation's dilatory tactics, which the ombudsman could do nothing about. That is the problem with a non-statutory code. The ombudsman, however hard he works, does not have enough stick to penetrate the defences of Departments, next steps agencies or quangos—whichever is seeking to hold the information back.

That brings me to the most important point about the code. It is not merely the fact that it changes the relationship between Ministers, or could make us have to go to members of the public. One of the curiosities is that, if we do not do something about the House as well, by making freedom of information provisions apply much more effectively to information obtained by the traditional route of parliamentary questions, that route could fall into disrepute, and Members of Parliament could be asking members of the public to get information for them, rather than members of the public trying to get information via their Member of Parliament tabling parliamentary questions. What nonsense that would be. It would badly affect the reputation of the House if we did not sort that question out.

I refer to the Committee's biggest difference with the Government's White Paper. I have already read out paragraph 11 of the background document that the Government produced, in which they said that they wanted the legislation to go beyond the content of the code. In one respect—law enforcement—the White Paper retreats from what is in the code. We thought that that was a regrettable step. We believe that law enforcement should be subject to an exemption, as it is in the code, and not an exclusion, as it is in the White Paper.

Why is that difference between two Latin words, which appear to mean the same, significant? With an exclusion, there is no appeal to the information commissioner. With an exemption, there is an appeal to the information commissioner, so there is a possible override from the information commissioner. That is a critical difference. It seemed to the Committee that, if that was good enough to be in the previous Government's code of practice, it should be good enough to be in the legislation, and should have been in the White Paper.

We still recommend strongly that that should be in the draft Bill and in the eventual legislation. Otherwise, that area is untestable. Governments can abuse it if it is untestable and that will undermine the spirit of the freedom of information Bill, if and when we get it. Such a provision is not present in any overseas freedom of information legislation. That area is always testable, in the courts under the American system, or through a commissioner or a third party—an appeal body, if you like—under all the other systems, which do not use the courts as their ultimate court of appeal.

That was the one big difference: we felt that the Government should not have withdrawn that provision. We still need a change of culture in Whitehall. All the arguments that we read in the press over the weekend—about the meetings last week, about cost and about the need to consider what the impact might be in changing the balance between the criminal community and those attempting to detect its members through law enforcement and so on—seem to tell us only one thing: the culture of Whitehall has not yet changed. We believe that that culture needs to change and to be retrained, so that civil servants will participate, in a proactive way, in the passing out of information and will not seek to find every reason either to delay or to deny information to the public.

We also made points in the report about the need to co-ordinate the Data Protection Bill, which was working against the deadline of October this year, and therefore had to be finished in a great hurry, and the Human Rights Bill, which is another major Labour constitutional reform commitment. We said that they should be co-ordinated and linked.

We said that hesitantly, because we do not want any of our recommendations to be used as excuses for delaying the freedom of information Bill. We fear that, almost every time we refer to the need to strengthen or improve the Bill, that can be used by the Sir Humphreys in Whitehall as a reason for deferring it and saying, "Even the Select Committee says that more work should be done on it, so do not put it in next year's Queen's Speech."

That is the last thing that we want. Obviously, we want the Bill in next year's Queen's Speech, but we do not want it to be watered down. We want it strengthened and we want a commitment to it, but we believe that it should be closely co-ordinated with two other Bills that impinge on it—the Data Protection Bill and Human Rights Bill, which are still before the House.

The new Government's constitutional reform agenda—parts of which are already nearing the statute book—over the past 14 months has been massive. The legislative programme has been jam-packed generally and jam-packed with constitutional matters in particular—the Human Rights Bill, devolution to Scotland and Wales, the setting up of an executive mayor and council for London and other matters. Many matters have had to be taken on the Floor of the House because they are constitutional, but this Government's constitutional reform agenda cannot be considered complete without a freedom of information Bill because that is the Bill that will do most to change the culture of Whitehall and, therefore, the relationship between the people and the Government.

For a Government to earn their corn as a great constitutional reforming Government, they need to implement freedom of information. Only then can they really say that they have completed the unfinished business of constitutional reform, modernising this country's constitution and joining the community of civilised nations, such as the United States, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and, most recently, Ireland, that have freedom of information legislation—let alone Sweden, which has had freedom of information legislation for more than 200 years. We cannot join that community unless we take that step of having freedom of information legislation.

From everything that we have read in the newspapers over the past few days, the permanent secretaries and some Ministers have now drawn the covered wagons of Whitehall into a circle and are fighting back. They did not mind the White Paper—after all, what is a White Paper in the end? However, now that it looks as though there could be a Bill in the Queen's Speech in only three or four months' time, they have drawn the covered wagons into a circle.

It is much worse than anything that ever appeared in any script in "Yes, Minister" because this is not a television soap about top civil servants and Ministers in Whitehall. This is the reality of a struggle at the heart of Whitehall and Westminster about what we are going to have in the Queen's Speech and whether, over the next few years, we shall get the culture change and shift in the relationship between the governed and the governing that we want, so that this Government can be seen to be truly a great reforming Government.

The plea of the whole Committee, therefore, is that we want to make an honest woman out of the mother of Parliaments; that is why this issue is so important to the whole House.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I thank the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) for the manner in which he has introduced this debate, and I congratulate him and his Committee on some thorough work and an excellent report. I know that he will understand if I also say how good it is to see in the Chamber the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), who has taken part in the Committee, and, most particularly, my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who has been in the House for almost 20 years and who has campaigned tirelessly, often to his discomfort, on this issue. No one could begin to doubt his impeccable credentials in this regard. I hope that we shall have the benefit of hearing him later in the debate if he has the good fortune to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is one of the quainter ironies of parliamentary life that we should debate the Government's policy on freedom of information the day after The Observer suggested that some Government information is freer than others—the hon. Member for Cardiff, West also referred to that—and the day before we debate the Government's practice on supplying information to one of Parliament's most important Select Committees.

However, sufficient unto the day is the confusion thereof, and in spite of everything that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has said about the support he enjoys, it is fairly clear from articles written by normally well-informed commentators that the Government's policy on freedom of information is far from the seamless robe that he tries to wear. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West referred to that, and I hope that the Chancellor will tonight give us the latest insight into where the Government stand.

It would seem that the Chancellor, backed by another Chancellor in the other place, is fighting off assaults on his territory by sundry ministerial colleagues who have rallied under the Home Secretary's banner. What Labour leaders were happy to proclaim as the ark of their covenant in opposition, they now see as a rather different, storm-tossed ark. A new freedom of inquiry and other intrusions would, some Ministers believe, threaten their ministerial freedom to act.

We do not have to rely merely on press comment to know that there is anxiety in and around Whitehall. We just need to read the memos sent by the Ministry of Defence to the Select Committee on Public Administration. We are told that the Ministry anticipates

"an increase in applications for information, which could impose a heavy administrative load. . . . The change to a requirement to provide copies of documents, rather than providing information, will require time and effort to identify specific documents and"— these are the really important words—

"to decide whether all or part are suitable for disclosure".

It seems more than a few months since the Chancellor made his December statement. Although it was subject to one of the major leaks for which the Government have become notorious, it earned the Chancellor more plaudits than most of his colleagues have received for their statements to the House. I very much appreciated, as did many hon. Members, the thoroughness with which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster sought to investigate that leak, having denounced it very roundly, and apologised to the House for it.

This is the first occasion on which the House has had a chance to debate the White Paper. I make no particular complaint about that, but I do complain a little about the fact that we have yet to see the Government's response to the report of the Select Committee of which the hon. Member for Cardiff, West is Chairman. I appreciate what he said about the deadline of eight weeks, but the Government have chosen tonight for this debate, and it is a pity that they did not publish their response so that hon. Members could read it in time for the debate.

The Chancellor of the Duchy will tell us, I am sure, that he is consulting widely in Whitehall. All I ask is that he tries to get his ministerial colleagues to speed up their replies, because it would be scandalous if we did not get the Government's response before the House rises for the summer recess.

I confess to being a little disappointed with the Chancellor. He is an old friend, and I hold him in high personal regard. In what he welcomed as a constructive response to his statement on 11 December, I said that the Opposition would be very glad to take part in talks with him. I pointed out that, although we did not share his zeal for constitutional reform—he knows that only too well—we would be more than willing to participate in a constructive spirit, not least because we are proud of our achievements in government.

Unfortunately, the Chancellor has not yet responded to those overtures. I express the hope that tonight he will pledge himself to seeking to engage all parties, including the official Opposition, in substantive talks when the draft Bill is published, if not before.

As I said on 11 December, if ever there were a subject on which consensus is desirable, this is it. It is a pity not only that the Chancellor has not responded to my offer, but, more importantly, that the White Paper is almost overtly political in the tone of its criticisms of the previous Government. Specifically, it makes light of the code of practice, which was a substantial step forward. It falls back on that code towards the end: in paragraph 7.3 it says:

"Existing mechanisms for openness—including the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information—will remain in place . . . to smooth the transition to the fully-implemented legislation."

The simple fact of the matter is that the previous Government, under the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), made very significant strides in opening up government. They established the code of practice and introduced the citizens charter, which the present Government have rightly retained, although with scant recognition of the man responsible for it.

Where precisely do the Government stand now? I have to ask that question not only because of the recent press speculation and the concerns expressed by the Campaign for Freedom of Information, which, under Maurice Frankel, has done so much to advance this cause, but because we have not had the opportunity to discuss these issues in the Chamber. We need to know how the Bill will be handled and when it will be introduced.

What about the Chancellor's comments about the White Paper having green edges? How much notice has been taken of the many representations that have been made to him direct—not just those made by the Select Committee—and of the often critical comments contained in the Select Committee report and in the detailed response by the Campaign for Freedom of Information? The campaign's document is substantial: it is even longer than the White Paper.

I shall touch on some of the issues that exercise the Opposition, and that need clear, definitive comment from the Chancellor of the Duchy. How is reasonableness to be tested? After all, sometimes those with the greatest need for information are campaigning individuals or organisations that few would call reasonable. One wonders how a Wilberforce or a Shaftesbury would have fared if he had applied under these rules for information for fighting their, at the time, unpopular and unfashionable causes. What about "substantial harm"? Adjectives are notoriously difficult to define accurately or objectively. Why should the test be reduced to one of mere harm when it comes to Government Departments?

[Sir Patrick Cormack]

The White Paper tells us:

"Experience from overseas suggests that the essential governmental functions of planning ahead, delivering solutions to issues of national importance and determining options on which to base policy decisions while still maintaining collective responsibility, can be damaged by random and premature disclosure of its deliberations under Freedom of Information legislation."

One is tempted to say, "Quite so." Perhaps I can be forgiven a wry smile when I suggest that the Chancellor has had little success in persuading his ministerial colleagues, many of whom seem ready, for the sake of a soundbite headline, to proclaim to the "Today" programme what they have presumably agreed to keep confidential. There is little point in the White Paper defending rules which are so regularly broken unless there is to be a new determination to enforce them. Is there to be such a determination? We have a right to know.

There is a powerful argument to be advanced against the White Paper here, and it has been so advanced with remarkable and persuasive lucidity by Professor Vernon Bogdanor in his memorandum to the Select Committee, published in volume II of the report. I warmly commend the memorandum to any hon. Member who has not read it. He argues:

"To give Parliament the right to information, which may include official advice, is the only way in which Parliament can be enabled to fulfil its task of pinning responsibility on Ministers."

In support of his case, Professor Bogdanor cites this fact:

"Between 1994 and 1997, the minutes of discussions between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank of England were released six weeks after these discussions took place. On a number of occasions, the minutes revealed serious differences of opinion between the Chancellor and the Governor."

Why, I ask the Chancellor of the Duchy, does the White Paper not refer to that considerable advance in open government, which was quite revolutionary, and which has not continued?

Professor Bogdanor also refers to New Zealand, which is cited in the White Paper on a number of occasions and has constitutional conventions rather similar to ours. In New Zealand,

"It is now customary to release policy advice relating to decisions once they have been made. A New Zealand citizen can, for 20 dollars, purchase the official advice given to an incoming Government."

I would have been happy to pay rather more than that on 2 May last year. I suspect that some of the gentlemen referred to in The Observer yesterday would doubtless have been happy to fill the Government's coffers a little more.

Professor Bogdanor seeks to categorise those who take opposing sides on the issue as either embracing the Whig-Liberal view of the constitution—whose most prominent recent spokesman he cites as Sir Richard Scott—or the view

"given elegant expression in recent years by two ex Foreign Secretaries, Lord Howe and Lord Hurd. This view starts from the requirements of Government rather than Parliament."

At this point, I should ask who it was who appointed Scott, and gave directions that his report should be published. Again, there is a churlish refusal to acknowledge what the previous Government often did.

Professor Bogdanor also argues that we might have escaped the poll tax fiasco had policy advice been readily available. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) and I—who steadfastly opposed that item of Conservative legislation—would read that passage in the good professor's case with particular interest.

Professor Bogdanor rests his case by saying that, in the last resort, the fundamental argument for freedom of information derives from the principle that, in a democracy,

"the people have a right to know what Government is doing in their name."

If the Chancellor intends to preserve his White Paper position unchanged, he will have to come up with convincing answers to the Bogdanor thesis.

Central to the policy as advanced in the White Paper is the proposal to appoint an information commissioner. It is a pity that, in his enthusiasm for this new appointment, the Chancellor has—perhaps inadvertently— downgraded the role of the ombudsman. The Committee is rather tough on the Chancellor on that, recommending that he should,

"in his response to this report, correct the statement on paragraph 5.7 of the White Paper relating to the independence of the ombudsman—and cease to draw the wrong inferences from it."

I am bound to say that I am not persuaded that we need a wholly separate information commissioner. Much could be said for giving the extra responsibilities to the ombudsman, even though that would inevitably mean extending not only the scope, but the size, of his office. Such a move would certainly avoid the possibility of clash and confusion, which could arise if two similar but separate high officials exist side by side.

Certainly, if an independent commissioner is appointed, there will have to be a clear understanding of where his responsibilities begin and end and where they are different from those of the ombudsman—who, after all, has a specific role under the code, which will, as we have seen, remain important during the transitional period. Combining both roles would have the added advantage of giving all the responsibilities under the Act to an officer accountable to Parliament. That is not something that should be lightly dismissed.

Other points in the Select Committee report deserve the most careful answers. The Committee has serious doubts that the regime proposed by the White Paper strikes the right balance between privacy and openness, or whether it will be workable. It is important that the Chancellor takes on board the strong arguments advanced by the Committee in that context. The Committee goes further than the Opposition would wish with its comments on the excluded areas, but, again, the cogent case that it advances must be debated fully during discussion of the draft stage of the Bill.

I can sum up the Opposition's position simply, as one of wishing to play a constructive part in all the discussions, but only on the basis of genuine consultation. There has been little enough over the Government's other constitutional policies. They are referred to by the Prime Minister in the preface to the White Paper:

"We are committed to a comprehensive programme of constitutional reform. We believe it is right to decentralise power; to guarantee individual rights; to open up Government; and to reform Parliament."

In response, I would say that we have seen little of a coherent strategy, but rather haphazard, piecemeal reforms based on inadequate consultation, and often no attempt to think things out or to establish any consensus. When I think of the Government lurching from policy to policy in this field, I am reminded of the famous story of Winston Churchill dismissing the pudding at the Savoy because it had "no theme". Where is the Government's theme?

On this policy, Mr. Hugo Young—writing in The Guardian last week—said that the answer to those specific questions is being decided in the secret places. He added that that answer

"will be definitive for the entire life and meaning of the Blair Government."

The opening sentence of the White Paper is particularly prescient:

"Unnecessary secrecy in government leads to arrogance in governance and defective decision-making."

I rather suspect that that is a sentence that will come to haunt Ministers. I hope that we shall not see a particularly troubling visitation of the spectre tomorrow night.

8.6 pm

Mr. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): It seems from the attendance in the House tonight that freedom of information is the best-kept secret in Westminster. That is a great shame, but I very much welcome the debate.

I listened attentively to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack). I find it strange that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire cannot find the theme in the White Paper, or in the Committee's response. His speech was elegant, but he lost the thread. He should return to "Your Right to Know" and the Committee's response to it.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I was not accusing the Chancellor in the White Paper—still less the Committee—of not having a theme; I was referring to the Government's policies as a whole.

Mr. Bradley: Those who have read the White Paper attentively and with less cynicism will have found that it is proposing one of the most radical and irreversible departures from the culture to which we have become accustomed over the centuries—particularly in the past couple of decades; an obsession with secrecy by which, in the name of democratic accountability, previous Governments have limited rather than extended the freedoms enjoyed by citizens in this country.

The well-known sociologist and political commentator, Noam Chomsky, said some decades ago that freedom of speech, valuable though it is, depends on those who have the power to define language. The same is true of information. Freedom of information depends very much on those who control the flow of that information, and the White Paper—and the legislation that we hope and expect will follow it—will do much to redress the balance between the governed and the governors.

Until now, freedom of information has been curtailed by interests that are more concerned to limit participative democracy than to allow it to flourish. Ministers, civil servants and those with commercial interests understand that their authority, influence and power over our daily lives would be reduced if we had an automatic right to know and to question the way in which we are regulated and controlled. Now, I believe, we have a right to demand access, accountability and transparency in the conduct of national and local government.

Information is the oxygen of democracy; without it, our democratic system and our institutions cannot flourish. That is why I support what has recently become known as control freakery. I believe that it is important for Government to express messages that are clear, cogent and coherent. People want to know that their Government are under control. They want information to which they can respond and react. Without clear information, there can be no real dialogue or partnership between those who govern and those who are governed; there can be no real bond of trust, and there can be no real opportunity for people to react, to express their views and to participate in the management of their daily lives.

The White Paper is truly radical. It proposes one of the most important constitutional changes that the Government will pursue—indeed, that any Government for many years have pursued. That change will enfranchise and empower every citizen in the country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West said, it should be seen in the context of a wide-ranging programme of reform that, as a whole, constitutes a new and mature contract between the Government and the citizen. That is what is known as stakeholding, an expression that was current a couple of years ago but has fallen out of fashion—sadly, I believe, as it is an important concept.

The Government have been criticised for control freakery, but they are pursuing a wide-ranging programme of reform. That programme includes Scots and Welsh devolution, the return of democratically elected government to London, the introduction of regional development agencies and the modernisation of local government—as expressed in, I think, six recent consultation documents. There have been experiments with proportional representation, and Liberal Democrats have been put on to Cabinet Committees—I do not think that anyone could argue that that is entirely necessary, given the majority that the Labour party enjoys in the House, but it is welcome none the less.

Moreover, the European convention on human rights will be incorporated into our legislation and a White Paper on better government will, I hope, be published in the autumn. I should also mention the reform of the House of Lords and the whistleblowers Bill, which was introduced by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd)—I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to his part in bringing forward legislation on both freedom of information and on whistleblowers.

Freedom of information is the flagship of the programme but, as I said, it is a well-kept secret, which is a pity. That is partly because the press's obsession with personalities overwhelms its interest in policies. For example, when, a couple of months ago, the Lord Chancellor gave evidence for two and a half hours to the Select Committee on Public Administration on the Government's programme of constitutional change, he discussed the most far-reaching changes that citizens in this country will enjoy for a generation—indeed, for many generations to come. The press, however, were interested in one thing only. Those who recall that Select Committee meeting will remember that, the following day, the radio, the television and the newspapers were consumed by one issue—the Lord Chancellor's wallpaper. The story was not even new; it was a reheated version of a story that had kept the newspapers going for a couple of days in the previous week. The media's failure to discuss important issues seriously and to involve people in a proper debate represents a great disservice to the citizens of this country.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, on that occasion, the Lord Chancellor seemed to be grateful for the distraction provided by the cost of his wallpaper, as he did not want to talk about hon. Members' criticisms of the way in which judges are appointed? As the record of that meeting shows, the Lord Chancellor instigated most of the dialogue on the choice and the cost of his wallpaper.

Mr. Bradley: My recollection is not the same; suffice it to say we discussed constitutional change for two of the two and a half hours, whereas for half an hour two members of the Committee—the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) was not one of them—pursued Lord Irvine on what can be described only as trivia. I put it to the House that the Lord Chancellor's home furnishings are far less important than those constitutional issues.

This time last year there was much speculation about the delay in publication of the White Paper. When it was published, it was welcomed for its thoroughness; the delay had been caused by the pains the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Lord Chancellor and others involved in the drafting had taken to ensure that it was right. Indeed, the White Paper is exceedingly good.

It is important that the Bill preserves and builds on the key principles identified in the White Paper. I am relaxed about whether the Bill will form part of this year's Queen's Speech; I hope that it will, but it is far more important to ensure that the Bill is right than to have it quickly. So long as it is worth waiting for, we should, having waited for centuries, wait a little longer. The key issue is that there should be no retreat from the principles set out in the White Paper.

The Select Committee's report makes clear our disappointment at the relatively few examples of temerity in the White Paper. I hope that the lobbying done by and for the utilities—which is the subject of press speculation—so that they can escape public scrutiny will not be tolerated. When my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave evidence to the Select Committee, I found his reasoning unpersuasive that all police operations should be excluded from public scrutiny. If the public had had proper opportunities to know what happened in the tragic Lawrence case, for example, I doubt that we would be where we are now or that the Lawrence family would have suffered so much and for so long.

I find it inexplicable that the public should not have the right of access to information about police operations, particularly failed police operations. I have in mind fairly humdrum examples, such as were discussed by the Select Committee, relating to the management of disorder or of football grounds and football crowds. Police plans to control public events should be confidential but, after the event, especially when something has gone wrong, the public have an absolute right to know the police's dispositions, what instructions were issued and what accounted for the failure. That is a weakness in the Home Secretary's argument and the Select Committee stated its case plainly in the report. I hope that those who draft the Bill will resist any temptation to retreat from the report's recommendations on this important issue.

The conflict between the right to privacy and freedom of information is a problem. I believe that the right to privacy is very important; I also accept that freedom of information, while important, is not an absolute right. It is crucial that the Bill, and consultation on its drafting, strikes the right balance.

Once we have freedom of information legislation, the world will not be the same. It is doubtful whether the BSE crisis could have deepened as it did had the public had proper access to information. It is also doubtful that the arms to Iraq affair could have taken the course that it did had there been proper scrutiny through access to information. Quangos and utilities will not be able to operate under the cloak of secrecy as they do today.

The role of the press will undoubtedly change, not least because there will be fewer leaks and less of a market for leaking information that ought to be in the public domain. One would hope that there will be less scandal because the people in control of information will be much more careful to ensure that they are beyond reproach and those whose job it is to scrutinise their activities will have more access to information about the way in which they are governing us and the country.

Freedom of information will also come as something of a shock to Members of Parliament. As a new Member I frequently hear older Members in particular telling us about the sovereignty of the House and how important that is. In principle, in our parliamentary democracy, that sovereignty is important, but if it means a barrier being set up between Members of Parliament, Ministers and the people we serve, it is not a good thing. Freedom of information will do a great deal to lower the barrier between the people who sit up in the Strangers Gallery and the people who sit down here in the Chamber. Freedom of information will make truly participative democracy possible. In future, there will be a presumption to disclose information, instead of the culture of secrecy and denial.

For 10 years I was a member of Westminster city council, which was the subject of possibly the greatest political scandal of the century. When I and other members of the opposition elected by our constituents to serve them as well as we could asked for information from council officers because we suspected that something was going on that should not have been, we were consistently denied access to the information. We were asked to demonstrate why we needed it—to demonstrate our need to know. Frankly, one can demonstrate one's need to know only when one has the information and can justify the request. That is simply unacceptable.

One of the strongest features of the proposed legislation is that no one should be required to demonstrate why he or she wants certain information. There should be no denial of an individual's right to information on the ground that it is a fishing expedition. If my friends and colleagues on Westminster city council and I had had access to the information when we asked for it and had been given the right to scrutinise the administration as we were elected to do, many of the scandals with which everyone is so familiar about Westminster would not have happened. That would have been far better for local democracy there and it would have saved thousands of our constituents a great deal of suffering.

Freedom of information will make our democracy truly participative. When people have access to information, they can react and play their own role in decision making. It will no longer be possible for the great and the good, that small coterie of those elected and otherwise who dominate public affairs, to do so to the exclusion of our constituents. I enter a plea that, when we have an information commissioner, he or she should not merely have the common touch but common sense so that they can be truly representative of the people they are appointed to serve.

One of the most pernicious features of social exclusion is the exclusion of individuals and communities from decision making. Freedom of information and the technology that is making information so much more accessible will bring a radical cultural change to the way in which our affairs are managed. The onus is on the Government to ensure that freedom of information is truly liberating—not merely a subject for Hampstead and Islington dinner parties, but something that will be meaningful to every man and woman in the country.

In welcoming the White Paper, may I enter a plea to the Government? May it come soon, but above all may it certainly not be diluted. I hope that the White Paper is not diluted by those who are paranoid or retentive—by civil servants who feel that they will lose influence and control or by sectional interests who would rather cloak their activities in secrecy. The Government should keep up their courage and stick to the principles of the White Paper. If they do, it will be one of the enduring achievements of this reforming Government.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Like all hon. Members present tonight, I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on this subject. Like the Chairman of the Select Committee on Public Administration, I and other hon. Members are disappointed that we are debating the matter when we have not yet had the Government's response to the report that the Committee worked so hard to achieve. I must pay tribute to our chairman, the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) for all his work. I also compliment the hon. Member for Aldridge–Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who is the most experienced member of the Committee and who held the line on more than one occasion, preventing some of us from being misdirected. I am grateful for his help and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker), who I am sure will want to make some observations, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about information that he has tried desperately hard to get out of Ministers in the past 12 months and the frustrations that have caused him to ask close on 1,000 parliamentary questions.

Sir Patrick Cormack: An expensive fellow.

Mr. Hancock: Yes, very expensive. I am glad to say that not all his questions were directed at the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The Committee's deliberations could have been entitled, "The tale of the two Chancellors" because we had a different approach from both of them. The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Bradley) was right to remind us of the fun morning when we questioned the Lord Chancellor. Some of us expected a little more than we got and some were disappointed that he seemed to want to rush quickly on to discuss the quality of wallpaper, where he should buy it and his domestic activities, rather than the serious questions that we wanted to put to him. How different it was when we questioned the Chancellor of the Duchy and how right he was to take the issues so seriously and to spend some considerable time going into detail with Committee members on the rights and wrongs of the White Paper and his ambitions for how it would develop.

I also hope that the White Paper will develop into a Bill in the Queen's Speech, and will become an Act. That will give us a terrific trinity of good new legislation, with major breakthroughs—data protection, human rights and freedom of information—a trinity of usefulness for the population as a whole to use. Hon. Members stressed to the Chancellor of the Duchy that we hoped that this aspect would not develop into legislation that is available only to the rich and powerful, to big business and the media. We hope that the people whom we represent will have access to it.

In one of my contributions to the Select Committee, I reflected on the problems of my constituents. I considered five different areas. One was the nuclear test veterans—many of whom were national service men in the Army, the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy—who went to the Pacific 30 or 40 years ago and took part in the tests, which affected their lives. Sadly, many of them are now dead, but there are still unanswered questions relating to the activities of some 40 years ago. Those involved have been stonewalled decade after decade and there is widespread frustration that the Ministry of Defence is still cloaking in secrecy what happened and the position of those men.

Many Gulf war veterans live in the Portsmouth area. Once again, they are frustrated by their inability to get answers to questions. Service personnel in general are frustrated by what they come up against, particularly when they have recently left the service and want to query issues relating to their activities.

Immigrants are often frustrated by the fact that they cannot get answers when relatives are refused entry or they are denied citizenship. Portsmouth prides itself on being a cosmopolitan city, and we have a large immigrant population. The most notorious citizenship case outstanding is that of Mr. Fayed. Under the legislation, he would still not be able to find out who said what about him to frustrate his application. That cannot be right.

Only this morning, I had a conversation with a constituent who was a party to the arrest of two people who had robbed and assaulted him. He identified them to the police on not one but three occasions, including at an identification parade. When the case went to court, he was not even informed of the court date, and he subsequently received a letter saying that the police had dropped the case. There was no explanation from the Crown Prosecution Service or the police. He could get no answers and came to me in frustration. Under the current proposals, we shall never be told why that blatant crime went unpunished. The frustration will continue, and that cannot be right. Even at this late hour in the consultation on the legislation, we should consider those points carefully.

[Mr. Hancock]

On 14 September 1996, the right hon. Gentleman who is now the Prime Minister said:

"The case for a freedom of information act and the incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights into British law is now generally agreed outside the Conservative Party and even by some within it. The onus must always be on public authorities to explain why citizens should not have access to information and not vice versa."

In the Tribune of 29 September 1995, the right hon. Gentleman who is now the Home Secretary wrote:

"Labour wants to see far greater openness in government. That is why we will introduce a Freedom of Information Act to give people clear rights of access to information collected by public authorities. The balance of the presumption must be reversed so that in most cases information will be made available to the public unless there is a good case for secrecy."

I hope that both right hon. Gentlemen, who now hold high office, will remember their words and act accordingly. I was somewhat frustrated when the Home Secretary expressed to the Select Committee the view that we should still close the door on information from the police.

The conflict between civil servants and the ballot box should be won by the ballot box every time. The House and the will of the people should not be subverted by powerful Whitehall mandarins who might feel that their past life style and the ease—the deft touch of the unaccountable—with which they have governed the nation are being interfered with. We cannot allow this opportunity to slip away, because the nation would not forgive us.

The main purpose of the legislation is to allow people access to information that is pertinent to their personal lives. The balance has to be drawn carefully between the right to know and the privacy of the individual, but I believe that we can find the right blend when the Bill is drafted.

Some of the most intimidating agencies have been wholly excluded. At present, the police, the security services, social security and immigration are all excluded, except for administrative records. We want that to change. It cannot be too late for that.

Hon. Members have asked about the role of the commissioner, which is limited to a judicial review, concerning procedure rather than substance, so a Department has only to act "properly or reasonably", and if the statutes are drafted to give wide scope for what is proper and reasonable, the commissioner will have almost no opportunity to intervene. The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) made the same point when he said that the use of words could provide an easy route to stop information being made available. We should not allow ourselves to be frustrated by words. We must explore the situation positively.

Committee members were frustrated when we could not further examine the position of the public utilities. The monopoly companies appear to have lobbied successfully to escape the provisions, except where their activities are directly accountable to the public. Southern Water, which serves my area, is an offshoot of a much bigger company, and the larger implications of that multinational company's activities have a bearing on what happens with water in the area that I represent.

We need the right to question the parent company about its activities, and not only about its responsibility to provide clean water and decent sewerage. We need to explore the motivation that leads to investment being contracted or expanded and the pressures that exist on the board. Companies working in the public interest must be open to public scrutiny. Anything short of that would be a travesty of what most reasonable people would expect from the legislation.

We need time to scrutinise the legislation. I hope that the Select Committee will have that opportunity and that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will give us a timetable that will allow us to invite back previous witnesses and question new ones. Many groups would welcome that, and we would relish the opportunity of developing the draft legislation into the reality of a Bill to be introduced in Parliament.

We must ensure that the legislation on data protection and that on freedom of information interface correctly and do not become a means of foiling one another. They should work in tandem to develop freedom, transparency and openness. We must insist that those points are taken on board. Anything short of that will leave people sadly frustrated.

We must take careful note of the points made by the Campaign for Freedom of Information, whose submission to the Select Committee spoke of the harm test and how it is to be applied. In its report of March this year, it listed the factors that needed to be demonstrated to give real authority to that test. Those factors included which parts of the requested information would cause harm; the nature of the harm; the mechanism by which it was believed that the harm could be caused; why it was believed that it would be substantial; and the measures that had been considered for excluding part of the data or seeking the consent of a third party to make information disclosable.

All those factors need to be a fundamental part of the legislation. The harm test—the protection test—should be there. It should go both ways. It cannot be good enough for a Department simply to say that information would be harmful. The Department should need to demonstrate publicly what the harm would be.

Liberals have campaigned for the best part of five decades for freedom of information legislation. The White Paper goes a long way to delivering on our expectations of the incoming Labour Government. I am particularly grateful to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for his leadership and commitment in getting us this far. It would be a great disservice to the House to suggest anything other than that he is the right person to take freedom of information through its next stages, and I wish him well in his endeavours to do so. I congratulate him on what he has done so far, but ask him to take note of what hon. Members on both sides have said. Not one of us here—few though we are—wants anything but good from the White Paper, and 55 million people see it as a stepping stone to greater freedom to live better lives and to understand a little more about our country's government.

8.40 pm

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): I apologise for any unintentional discourtesy to the Chairman of the Select Committee on Public Administration or to other hon. Members arising from my absence at the start of the debate. I received a late invitation to meet a Minister, whom I had asked to see, and I felt it best to accept. Unfortunately, that made me a little late.

From what I have heard, I realise how united is the House's welcome for the White Paper and the Government's clear-sighted commitment to freedom of information. I join the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) and my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Bradley) in commending the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on his drive to ensure that the proposals are wide-ranging enough to create a climate in which open information is normal. I hope that the legacy of the legislation to arise from the White Paper will be that people will ask in future what all the fuss was about. People should find it normal to have access to information about what Governments, public bodies and elected representatives do, and there should be no question that it could be otherwise.

We should not underestimate the revolution in public affairs that that will require. It is good to hear the official Opposition being generally supportive of proposed legislation. That is a revolution in itself. It has not always been that way, although some on the Opposition Benches have always been conspicuously courageous in their tireless advocacy of freedom of information. Indeed, a full 33 per cent. of those now sitting on the Conservative Benches fall into that category. It took a careful mathematical calculation to reach that figure.

My hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin said that the Opposition's new attitude towards legislation might create a climate in which we may receive, from someone, an apology for what happened in Westminster. No apology has been forthcoming from the Opposition leadership, but that case exemplified what can happen when there is a climate of secrecy in local government and when councillors and officers make sure that people do not have the information on which to make proper judgments. Things go dreadfully awry when that happens, and we do not want those circumstances to recur in local government.

Nor do we want to see again in national Government the disgraceful circumstances of the arms-to-Iraq scandal. There was clear evidence in the Scott report of dissimulation by Ministers and civil servants, and that was engendered by the assumption that information was the property of those who had initial access to it, and was a privilege to be handed out in teaspoonfuls to anyone else.

Some people dismiss freedom of information as a problem merely for the chattering classes. However, the problem for freedom of information—or, in our case, lack of it—is that change must come about in public perceptions of what politicians and public administrators are up to. We must demonstrate our good will, our good intentions, our probity and our willingness to engage in proper debate about the issues on which we legislate. Public trust has been lost because of what the public have seen of many people engaged in public administration in recent years. It will take a lot of hard work to restore trust. We cannot do it overnight, or by a single stroke of policy. It will require consistent application over many years. That is why freedom of information is so important.

As the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South said, an Act such as the one that I believe that the Government will introduce will rank as one of the Labour Government's seminal achievements. It will create a climate in which the contract between the politicians and civil servants and the public can perhaps be built anew. Partnership and participation are essential to democratic government in any country, and especially so in ours.

I am pleased that the Select Committee's report broadly supports the Government's initiative. However, a thread—best described as fear of the implementation of legislation—runs through the report's examination of the White Paper and the evidence of witnesses. There were suggestions in the press and among those who gave evidence to the Select Committee that Ministers might seek to restrict the flow of information. It was suggested that Ministers might push for tight definitions of harm, or might argue for an extensive definition of commercial confidentiality.

It also appears from the White Paper that such bodies as the police and the security services might be given a blanket exclusion, perhaps because of fears of the effects that freedom of information would have on them. I can well understand that substantial parts of the operations of the police and the security services must remain operationally confidential. The reports coming out about the history of the troubles in Northern Ireland tell us that there are matters of which the public cannot be made aware for national security reasons.

However, we need not necessarily jump from those facts to the introduction of a class exclusion. The tremendous difficulty in making a distinction between policy and operations has systematically bedevilled implementation of freedom of information in local government. It also came to the fore in recent discussions between the Prison Service and the previous Home Secretary. A host of other examples exists. To put administration within freedom of information legislation, while other activities fall outside, could cause difficulties. The matter should be clarified, because the public must have confidence that the Government are conducting their business in an open, fair and even-handed manner. When it comes to the police, public confidence is vital at all times.

I shall tell the House about the fears that many people justifiably—in some cases, less justifiably—have about implementing the legislation by relating my experience of attempting to introduce a freedom of information platform when I was leader of Southampton city council. When my party took control of the council in 1984, there was a very tight regime in place. It was generally presumed that information was the property of officers, and sometimes of councillors, and items that came before the council for discussion were coded on paper of different colours—hon. Members who have served on local authorities will be familiar with the colour-coding obsession in which those authorities have historically indulged.

In the case of Southampton, an item coded on white paper could be talked about to anyone. If business came before the local authority on yellow paper, it meant, curiously, that one could not talk about it until the afternoon of the council meeting and subsequent to that. If it came before the council on pink paper, one could not talk to anyone about the matter before or after the council meeting—although most of the business on pink paper was systematically leaked to the press by persons unknown. Most importantly, that regime was put in place by officers who effectively had carte blanche in deciding what coloured papers went before the council for discussion. A catch-all definition allowed officers to grade the confidentiality concerns of the local authority.

As soon as my party came to power and I became council leader, I decided that the system should be reversed and that papers would be regarded as confidential only if the reasons for their confidentiality were written upon them. There were seven such reasons—including commercial confidentiality and the personal disclosure of details about a council employee—but no general catch-all clause that allowed someone to declare that a paper should be confidential. Every paper had to bear the reason for its confidentiality. That order completely turned around the atmosphere in the council. I am delighted that the White Paper says that Ministers or any other public servant who wishes to persuade the public that a matter should be confidential must make a case as to why that is so. The onus must be upon them to make that case, which is the right and proper way to proceed.

At the time, I received advice both nationally, and particularly locally, from several local authority officers that I was a foolish council leader—many others have told me that since then, but, on this occasion, it related to the confidentiality issue.

Mr. Hancock: You never heeded it.

Dr. Whitehead: I seem to recall that the hon. Gentleman was particularly complimentary some years ago about the wonderful way in which Southampton city council was run. I am grateful for that historical compliment.

It was suggested that my order would lead to a rash of inquiries and that the council would come to a standstill. The phrase "nutters' charter" was used—not an expression that I would choose—and I was accused of stirring up trouble. People said that, within a few months, I would regret my foolish actions and we would have to put the genie back into the bottle. However, there were no such complaints. The method of operation was not unmanageable and the system worked well. I believe that the public had much greater confidence in the city as a result of the changes. The Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985, in which the hon. Member for Aldridge–Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) had a substantial hand, installed the regime across local government—although in a slightly different form from Southampton.

There has been considerable resentment subsequently in local government circles about the difference between what local government is required to disclose, and how the House requires it to conduct its business, and the way in which central Government operate. There are startling differences in the level of disclosure required in the civil service and in local government service. Among other things, it is vital that freedom of information legislation rights that wrong: the same rules must apply across all public service. The public service generally must be required to give an account of what it does and the public should have access to that account in order to judge whether the public service is doing a good job on their behalf.

In that context, it is also important to consider carefully the disclosure of parliamentary information. The Select Committee's background paper refers to "an implied repeal of the Bill of Rights, which declares that the freedom of speech in debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament."

I do not see how what we do in Parliament fits that description. I think that Parliament should take a lead in this area. We must restore our good name through our deliberations with the general public. In my short time as a Member of Parliament, I have observed that hon. Members overwhelmingly deliberate in good faith: they examine the details and think carefully about their actions. The Government take great pains to get their consultation right so that everything is in order and the public are protected properly by the legislation that we pass in the House. The more the public know about the process in this place, the more they will understand that, despite occasional press comments about us, the House is an effective guardian of probity in public life. If that is made apparent, public confidence in public life will be restored.

My small contribution in this area was to publish in my annual report a full financial breakdown of my income and expenditure as a Member of Parliament. The lucky citizens of Southampton will receive about 20,000 copies of that document in the near future—whether they like it or not. That financial information may come as a surprise to people in the first year. However, if I publish that information every year, it will be assumed that that is a natural occurrence. As soon as it becomes the norm, no one will worry about the new regime and the new climate. If the legislation can bring about that new climate and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster can ensure that it permeates the conduct of public life in this country, he will have done our country a great service.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) spoke about the difficulties of this process. Twenty years ago, the then Home Secretary, now Lord Merlyn-Rees, used to sit in a little room behind the Speaker's Chair with the representatives of the Liberal party to thrash out the details of freedom of information legislation. The splendid Lord Merlyn-Rees told us during various debates on official secrets legislation that he often used to nod off in those long dark nights as the Liberal party made a vigorous case.

Lord Merlyn-Rees nodded off because he recognised three features. First, there was no will among his colleagues for freedom of information legislation. Secondly, he could not necessarily command a majority on it. Thirdly, the life of the then Labour Government was coming to an end and it was unlikely that the legislative programme would have allowed the legislation. Those were the conditions of 20 years ago and it has been a long haul since.

There was Clement Freud's Official Information Bill. I notice that two great men are within the precincts of this building: a former chairman of the Campaign for Freedom of Information, who is now an adviser to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the director of that organisation, Maurice Frankel, who is sitting under the Gallery. It is due to the efforts of extraordinary private citizens for little or no return that a society—a great society, I would argue—advances. It is undoubtedly the assiduity of such people in pushing, cajoling and helping Members of Parliament introduce a raft of important legislation that has given citizens rights of access to personal information and a range of other details.

We are debating the Government's White Paper and the observations and comments of the Select Committee on Public Administration, on which I have the honour to serve under the distinguished chairmanship of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan). I hope that I can look forward to a positive Government response to some of our comments. The White Paper has introductions by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. They are the most positive advertisements and arguments for freedom of information. They forced to me to think of the arguments that I had adduced over the years in the House. Why do I believe that freedom of information is important? I do not have the eloquence of the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, or of the Cabinet Committees that brought this together.

First, I had always argued that we want freedom of information because of who we are as a people. It is our sense of ourselves and our responsibilities, the nature of a public society, the relationship of the citizen to the Government. We are the elected representatives of the people, ours is a democratically elected Government. Freedom of information affects the relationship between the two. It is in our language. In his "Areopagitica", Milton says:

"Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely".

Those are the essences of our society and who we are as a people.

Secondly, I have always argued that freedom of information is central to accountable government. Again, we can invoke our literature, poetry, language and constitutional development. Remember Pope's "Essay on Man":

"What can we reason, but from what we know."

It is the knowledge of what Government are doing, the knowledge and arguments that form public policy, for which Governments are responsible to us in this House as elected representatives, that gives equality of argument. Governments in Britain have never feared the expression of public opinion. They fear the ability to argue on an equal basis about facts.

That gives me my third reason for arguing for freedom of information. If we have open government with free access to the information that is available to Government, public policy is more likely to be better. We are likely to make better decisions and judgments. What the Government have done is not only important and purposeful but important in a very specific respect.

In the first edition of his "Freedom of Information" Professor Birkinshaw notes:

"Information is inherently a feature of power. So too is its control, use and regulation. Take away a government's preserve on information, and its preserve of when and what to release, then you take away a fundamental bulwark of its power".

What the Government are going to do is remarkable, which is why we watch with anxiety the translation of a White Paper into a draft Bill. I would draw attention to certain causes of that anxiety: for example, the dark clouds that have gathered in the past week, whereby journalists were so much better informed than Back Benchers, seem to show some resiling as Ministers come to reflect on the burden of what the measure may mean. British government has always been deemed to be traditionally a secretive thing and I have tried to argue that that is a product of war, the Defence of the Realm Acts and "Careless talk costs lives".

I noticed that my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), in his excellent speech from the Dispatch Box, referred to the distinction between types. I think that I must be a Whig Liberal—whatever that means—in terms of constitutional development, so I give a cheer to what the Government have put down in the White Paper. That is not just my view, that of the Campaign for Freedom of Information, or that of Members of Parliament; it is the view expressed in an extraordinary report from the information commissioner in Canada, Mr. John Grace—a man for whom many of us have great affection and regard for his advancing of freedom of information in Canada. In his last report, a section reads, "Left in Britain's dust". He praises the Prime Minister and the Cabinet Minister responsible and observes of the Chancellor of the Duchy:

"What he has drafted, represents nothing other than a breathtaking transformation in the relationship between the government and the governed."

He quotes the Chancellor's words, that the legislation

"would transform this country from one of the most closed democracies to one of the most open."

That is a profound compliment, paid across the waters, for we should never forget that Canada is also a parliamentary democracy.

All the arguments that have been adduced in the past—ministerial accountability, responsibility to the House of Commons—have been used to shore up secrecy, not to open up government, but, as I have argued, how can we have accountable government if we, as Members of Parliament, and informed public opinion cannot participate in understanding the balance of the argument? When I look back on the only period from which I can draw examples, I see that most of the major difficulties that previous Governments got into were a consequence of the extraordinary holding on to secrecy—the when and why and where to release information.

Some of the most shaming and difficult episodes for our Government have lain in that culture of secrecy. We had a distinguished former Foreign Secretary defend the secrecy surrounding the change to the arms guidelines on the ground that, had the British public and the House of Commons known that they had been changed, they would have been outraged because they had been influenced by Saddam Hussein's bombing of the Kurds. He was defending the culture of secrecy on the highest grounds of grand bureaucracy, in the belief that only experts can know best. Ours is a public society: that is what the White Paper recognises and that is what my party now profoundly believes.

I cannot give such an open-handed compliment to the major players in all this without also saying a few words about the exclusions, in respect of which hon. Members on both sides have made valid points. We are concerned about the role of the commissioner: I do not want to see any rowing back from the extraordinarily strong position identified by the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the Duchy and the Cabinet Committee that issued the White Paper, but newspaper reports give one cause for pause. Another important issue is the nature of the damage test—"where it is necessary". Both the Select Committee and the Campaign for Freedom of Information have expressed concern about the proposal to exclude a number of bodies and functions from the scope of the legislation. The most serious of the proposed exclusions relate to the law enforcement functions of the police, police authorities and Government Departments such as the immigration service. Others include security services, prosecution functions of the Crown Prosecution Service, personnel records and legal advice.

[Mr. Richard Shepherd]

I am particularly concerned about the police. There is, as far as I know, no other freedom of information Act, in the advanced democracies and parliamentary democracies that follow our model, that excludes the police wholesale. I must express some disappointment with the Home Secretary's evidence. The right hon. Gentleman was rather like the Queen in "Alice in Wonderland"—"Off with their heads." There was no reasoned argument. Instead, we had the assertions that we have heard under previous Governments—for example, that it is quite improper, that somehow by aggregation, by putting together little pieces of information, the entire law enforcement edifice of the United Kingdom would crumble.

I do not think that anyone could take the argument at that level very seriously. It was so totalitarian and absolutist. No one has suggested that the operations of our police forces should be under the scrutiny of freedom of information legislation. However, every other society has enabled certain questions to be asked.

The Home Secretary instigated—it was by his fiat, no one else's—the Lawrence inquiry, an inquiry into the murder of a fellow citizen. None of that information was available. As the evidence has come out in front of the Lawrence inquiry, we understand why some of the police want to be so secretive. It is the most appalling outlaying of information. It must be deeply damaging to many people's perception of the most important service for the protection and well-being of us all as a civic society. It is extremely important, so of course they say, "Keep it closed." In fact, it is only by opening it up that we can see where faults lie, that we can insist on improvements, that we can encourage and we can get it right.

I represent, as does the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Bradley), a constituency in the west midlands. The serious crime squad there had to be disbanded. The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has told us that a high proportion of police officers are inadequate, dishonest and not suitable. These are drips of information which do not enable us to give a balanced view of what matters. That is a real argument for including certain aspects of the police in the legislation.

I shall push that point to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, as has the Select Committee on Public Administration and other hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. I know that these battles are not easy and I know that, instinctively, the Home Office is anxious about anything that could undermine the police and the integrity of law enforcement. I am suggesting that, on the periphery, inclusion can reinforce and elevate the esteem in which the police are held by their fellow citizens.

The difficulty about exclusion is that no information about a body or its function would be available, even if disclosure would cause no harm. As I have said, no overseas freedom of information law adopts such an approach. Information should be available unless disclosure is shown to be potentially harmful. That is the test set out in the White Paper. I hope very much that, in managing the Committee with the continuing help of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Lord Chancellor will ensure that the Bill features in the Queen's Speech for the next legislative programme; that is all-important. I am disappointed to note that it will not be published until the summer recess, although the Committee on which I serve can meet in September to review it. I am concerned, as I said, when the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis talks of his minority of officers who are corrupt, dishonest and unethical. However grave the misconduct, it should not be excluded.

There was an important development in the years before the White Paper—the code of practice introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). That seems so small a step now only because we are offered such a great prize, but it is still the governing principle of freedom of information. We should not forget that the code is more liberal than the White Paper in one important respect: access to information on immigration matters. That that should be a matter of difficulty in the White Paper disappoints me, but I commend my right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister on his action. Each time we take a step, it is forward, and the White Paper is also a step forward.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I want to reflect on why the right of freedom of information is so important and to focus not only on the big issues, as many hon. Members have done, but on some of the smaller issues. Freedom of information legislation is crucial, first, because the Government make mistakes. Unless we know what action they have taken, what they think and what information they have, we are unable to correct them. For many people, and in much decision making, that is one of the crucial reasons why we need a legislative guarantee of freedom of information.

Secrets can have devastating effects on people's lives. It was, after all, only when a Minister went to court and admitted that he had lied that people who risked going to gaol because of arms exports were freed from that risk. It is essential that we have a robust mechanism that ensures that information about the truth is available.

That is why I share the disappointment that many hon. Members have expressed about some of the exclusions in the White Paper. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), whose record on freedom of information is second to none, referred to the information about policing that has come out as a result of the Lawrence inquiry. I cannot believe that the basic inadequacy of police officers' knowledge of the law and appropriate procedures has expressed itself only in that single case. Yet we know about that case only because of the inquiry. There should be a general presumption of the right to know about policing, and it should be subject to a harm test only on the grounds of prevention of crime, public order and so on.

As many hon. Members know, I am particularly concerned about immigration issues. I praise the Government for showing greater openness than any of their predecessors on one important point: for the first time, the instructions to immigration officers and entry clearance officers overseas on how to interpret the immigration rules have been made publicly available. They are available in the House of Commons Library and will one day, I hope, be available on the Home Office website.

Many of us who have been worried about the rights of people subject to immigration control have campaigned for that step for many years. It is a huge step forward on openness. I am really depressed that a Government who have the courage to do that—unlike their predecessors, who consistently refused to do so—do not have the courage to say that the operation of the immigration service should be subject to freedom of information measures, provided that it does not harm the proper administration of immigration control.

The effects on people's lives of what is done by the immigration service are devastating. It determines whether they can live with their families or whether they can ever see their grannies again. Such matters are the day-to-day concern of my constituents, and are not sufficiently subject to public scrutiny because of the inadequacies of parts of the appeal system.

The other crucial issue is that, unless we have freedom of information, the relationship between the Government and the governed is one of feudalism—those who hold the information are the masters and the people are the servants. That is upside down. We are in government to serve the people of Britain. We cannot do that adequately unless they know, and can use that knowledge to hold us to account.

In an information age, when information is power, when people are used to greater openness and trust in their dealings with others, the lack of that information, openness and trust between Government and the people is a key factor in creating disaffection and alienation from the political process. That can be overcome by stripping away secrecy and being open.

I believe that many hon. Members share my horror at the behaviour of some young oiks who have been selling information, and have been ticked off by our newspapers for doing so. That reminds us all how valuable this information is, and reminds us that sometimes it is available only to people who can pay for it. There is a very simple way of changing that: give it to the many, not the few. The Government can give it away or, at least, allow such information to be made available without excessive charge. When the Bill is introduced, we must ensure that, as far as possible, information is given away, so that it can be the people's information. I urge the Minister to ensure that.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): I point out, for the record, that the type of information that The Observer managed to get, as it were, ahead of time, is not really that with which the Bill is concerned. The hon. Lady plays it down rather, but did not The Observer find that people from new Labour who were in the know, in the right pressure groups and lobbies, could get information of commercial value out to clients, perhaps 24 or 48 hours before it would have been released anyway?

Fiona Mactaggart: I believe that the hon. Gentleman suffers from an excess of credulity. My reading of the piece in The Observer is that the charge was that these people claimed that they could provide such information. I did not see that any of them had actually done so. I called them oiks earlier; it is not very wise for anyone to trust oiks' claims.

In the historical debate, since I have been a Member of the House, I have pooh-poohed those cynics who said that the strategy that the Government chose to use—to start with a White Paper, to have a debate and then to introduce legislation—would lead to the failure of the possibility of legislation because, once we had tasted power, we would fall into the nasty habits that every other Government had shown, and would want to keep our secrets to ourselves and under our jumpers. I have always said that that is not true. I hope that I shall be proved right by what happens next.

I believe that the evidence shows that I am right. The Government's record of giving away power and opening up the process of government shows that they have done that more dynamically than have any other Government this century. They have given power to the Welsh assembly and the Scottish Parliament. They have given the people rights through a "Bill of Rights"—the Human Rights Bill—and, let us make no mistake about it, that is how the incorporation of the European convention on human rights will work. That is one of the tools for fundamentally changing the constitutional relationship between the Government and the people. I believe that we will do that, but it is easy to be frightened, and there is ample evidence that the civil service is frit. Successive reports from ombudsmen show Departments scuttling around trying to find reasons why they do not need to provide information under the code—in the words of one of the ombudsmen, "haggling about issuing information". My message is that Departments should not be scared and Ministers should not listen to them.

We have a chance to end the popular vision of government in this country as a bunch of Sir Humphreys pushing Ministers around intellectually. The Sir Humphreys must be put back into the cupboard and the secrets taken out of the cupboard. If we do that, we have a great opportunity to change Britain's democracy radically. We should ignore the fearful, be bold and implement the words that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) quoted, predicting that they might prove to be our downfall. Those words were not only in the introduction to the White Paper, but in Labour's manifesto.

We know what the truth is. Unnecessary secrecy in government leads to arrogance in government and ineffective policy decisions. We have a chance to show definitively that this Government will end the arrogance of government and improve the quality of policy. We will do that by introducing an effective freedom of information Bill. The White Paper is a step on the road. Let us take the next leap.

9.26 pm

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): It is wonderful to be in the Chamber to speak on the subject of freedom of information and the Government's radical proposals. One of the reasons why I entered politics was my commitment to the freedom of information. It is a building block on which so much else rests, and if it is not right, so much else suffers.

I agree with the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) in his analysis. Bad government follows from secrecy; better government follows from freedom of information. For that reason alone, every Member of Parliament should embrace proposals to open up government. Moreover, it is people's right to know what is going on. When Government get it wrong, people at large gain the information and pull Government back on track. For those two reasons, freedom of information is essential.

[Mr. Norman Baker]

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and his Committee for keeping their eye on the ball and not being deflected; to hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Aldridge–Brownhills who have campaigned so hard on the issue; and especially to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who has been unswerving in his commitment since the election in May last year and, no doubt, before that as well. It is disgraceful that attempts are continually made through the national media to disparage the Minister, probably by people who are after his job, and I hope that, under the freedom of information proposals, we will find out who is responsible.

Mr. Hancock: We should be so lucky.

Mr. Baker: I hope so.

The White Paper was very good indeed. I have only two main comments. The first relates to the total exclusion from the proposals of the security services and the police. Why is not the test of substantial harm applied to the security services, as it is in the rest of the paper? I accept that that means that a great amount of material relating to the security services would not be released, but if the substantial harm test were applied, some information would come out.

Why are we not even allowed to know, for example, how the money allocated to the security services is split among MI5, MI6 and GCHQ? Why do we not know how many telephone lines are tapped, as opposed to warrants issued? There is much information that could be given out without in any way endangering national security. That will not be taken forward by the proposals in the White Paper.

Secondly, I am disappointed that the 30-year rule is not to be reduced to 20 years. I note for the record that, last Friday, the Government Whip blocked my Bill to achieve that. I would be grateful if the Chancellor would explain whether the objection is on principle, or is on the basis of the cost or the practicality of reducing the limit.

I do not wish to strike a note of discord, but there seem to be two sorts of Labour Member, at least in the Cabinet and possibly outside. That is one way of looking at it, anyway. Let me simplify what I am saying: some members of the Cabinet are good guys, and some are not. At present, a battle seems to be in progress for the soul of where the Government are going in regard to freedom of information. Members of the Cabinet have woken up to the fact that the issue may embarrass them, that it will produce difficulties for them and that it will mean matters they would prefer to remain secret becoming public. As hon. Members have said, a rearguard action is in progress in an attempt to stop the Bill—not overtly, because that would be too unpopular; to delay it for a Session, and then another Session. Then it will be a question of "It is too near the election, Minister. You cannot do it now."

We have had that sort of thing before. In 1979 the Conservatives came to power having promised such an Act, no doubt in good will; that was put off and put off, and never materialised. I do not underestimate the forces of darkness, if I may call them that, which will conspire to stop such legislation.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Prince of Darkness.

Mr. Baker: Perhaps.

I ask for a clear commitment from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that the Queen's Speech will include legislation, and that legislation will not be delayed for a further 12 months—and possibly 12 months after that, when everyone else has lost interest.

I have spoken of the dichotomy between members of the Cabinet who wish to pursue matters openly and those who wish to keep them secret. Let me now say something about the other report, which has not been dealt with at much length. I refer to parliamentary questions—a subject that the Chancellor might be disappointed if I did not mention tonight. Contrary to what was said earlier, tabling written questions costs nothing; it merely means that civil service time is redirected towards answering questions from Back Benchers rather than matters raised by Ministers.

It is clear from answers given that not everyone in the Government shares the commitment of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to freedom of information. The report from the Public Administration Committee recognises that written questions are crucial: that is the wording that it uses, and I am grateful for that endorsement. The Chancellor himself has said:

"Ministers should be as open as possible with Parliament, refusing to provide information only when disclosure would not be in the public interest".—[Official Report, 16 December 1997; Vol. 303, c. 78.]

I asked the minister Without Portfolio, in a parliamentary question, whether he would list

"persons within his office who have complained to the media about the reporting of the Government's activities."—[Official Report, 10 November 1997; Vol. 300, c. 452.]

The answer was

"No."

I asked him whether he would

"estimate the percentage of his working time spent on . . . Ministerial duties", and was told:

"I devote whatever time I judge necessary for the fulfilment of my ministerial and other duties."—[Official Report, 28 July 1997; Vol. 299, c. 25.]

That is not a blocked answer—I refer to a point made in the report—but an answer that, although not blocked, tells us nothing.

I asked the Prime Minister to "list the meetings and events since 2 May at which the Minister Without Portfolio has represented the Government."

The answer was

"Since 2 May my hon. Friend has had a wide range of meetings with ministerial colleagues and others."—[Official Report, 29 July 1997; Vol. 299, c. 114.]

I knew that before I asked the question, but I was not told much more than I knew before I asked it. Such answers are designed to give no information. They are designed to cock a snook at Members of Parliament who want a freedom of information Act.

Only recently, I asked the Prime Minister—I think this was very germane—whether he would list

"Labour party events which have taken place since 14 May . . . at . . . 10 Downing Street . . . 11 Downing Street . . . Carlton House Terrace and . . . Chequers."

We know that such events are taking place, because they are in the papers. The Prime Minister said:

"Any private receptions have been held in accordance with the Ministerial Code."—[Official Report, 25 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 597.]

In other words, he will not tell the House something that we ought to know.

There are good guys and bad guys. My money is on the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who is doing a splendid job. I hope that every hon. Member will support him in his attempt to bring about a freedom of information Act

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): I thank the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) for curtailing his remarks so that I can contribute, although I wonder how many written questions he could have tabled in the time that he was on his feet. Perhaps we should have detained him a little longer.

I was a little bemused by some contributions from Opposition Members. Do they see the vessel as largely full, half empty, or more than half empty? There is no doubt in my mind that a massive step forward is being made with the White Paper and the draft Bill, which I hope will be published later this year—that is the thrust of the report of the Select Committee, of which I am a member.

We are on the brink of a revolution in information. That is being brought about not only by the White Paper and legislation, but by the advent of greater access to information via the internet and all the implications that that has for our society, for neighbouring societies and for the whole globe. That revolution will have a great impact on how much progress we make with the legislation and how we make that progress—although it is interesting that few hon. Members felt the need to refer to that.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) commented on the code of practice and complained that we have not given it sufficient credit in the debate, but much larger steps forward will be taken through the White Paper. The Select Committee report refers to crucial differences between the code and the White Paper. For example, the scope of the code is much more limited in general; documents can be withheld under the code, whereas people will not be able to do that under the proposals in the White Paper; the test under the code has been one of harm, but we propose a test of substantial harm in many cases; and there is no means of enforcement under the code—the ombudsman only has powers of persuasion to bring to bear. All that makes a marked difference, which is one reason why the code, which was introduced four years ago, has not been given the place that it could have occupied.

As hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, there is no doubt that freedom of information will change things for the vast majority of people: we have to introduce it for the many, and it will be a meaningful step forward for the general public. It is easy to forget that, although some hon. Members may be exercised by the burning issue of how many receptions have been held at No. 10 Downing street, for many members of the public freedom of information will mean that they can get from the Intervention Board, the Inland Revenue, the Milton Keynes development corporation, the Commission for the New Towns, the Child Support Agency, the Benefits Agency or the Marine Safety Agency answers to the various questions and problems that they have had as individuals.

Such matters—information on the fees paid to lawyers, for example—sometimes go beyond the individual, but are often confined to an individual's difficulties with gaining access or recourse to something to which, under the current system, he cannot gain access. Although hon. Members worry about access to information in the corridors of power, those other issues matter to many people—they affect their lives.

As a society, we have developed many anxieties about the presumption that information should be accessible, and we have a secretive culture. It is interesting to look through the report of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration on what has happened with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of contracts for the disposal of cattle infected with BSE. We have already commented in the report and again this evening on the fact that the course of the BSE saga might have been different, and the cost to the public purse and to farming might have been much less, if a freedom of information regime had been in place. It is clear from the commissioner's report that, in response to a question, the MAFF people would not release details about the contracts because they did not refer to the code of practice at all. The report shows that MAFF and many other Government Departments are only just—there is a list of the improvements that are being made by Government Departments in that document—beginning to take steps, with the civil service, to become much more open and that the anxieties to which I have referred are still to the fore.

We need to have legal backing to the right to information, as the Government propose. That is crucial. When we went to Sweden and Ireland, we found that the improvements that need to be made in the civil service are important. Much time has been spent, particularly in Ireland, where this is a new issue, looking at the changes that need to to be made in the civil service, in civil service training and in codifying practice and manuals.

We heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) about the improvements that have been made in the openness of immigration procedures and manuals, although she made other comments about that as well. However, there are other areas where we need to codify practice and make it more readily available to people. We need to explain what information is kept, how it is kept and why. Those are not the sexy parts of freedom of information, but they may make a big difference to people's lives.

The confidence and competence of a Government are to be tested against the extent to which they will open information and against the belief that they represent the interests of many people, so that their interests will not differ from those of many people. A Government who are confident about their competence will be prepared to share with people, and to take the step towards freedom of information. Once that step is taken, I believe that we will not go back on it; we will only make progress. The prospective legislation is part of a major constitutional change towards more open and accountable government. It brings about the presumption of openness. For that reason, it is a major improvement.

[Miss Melanie Johnson]

We have heard much about striking the right balance on privacy. That will be difficult. When we went to Sweden, we heard how, if an under-age pregnant girl wrote a letter to Sweden's Prime Minister, that letter could, because of that country's freedom of information regime, become public property, which would be highly undesirable. If, however, the same girl wrote to Sweden's Ministry of Health about those matters, the letter would be protected and the privacy of the individual would be rightly preserved. We need to strike the right balance. It will be difficult, but we need to include safeguards to ensure that people in this country do not run into such problems.

I endorse what we say in the Select Committee report: this is a "radical advance in open and accountable government", of which this Government should be justly proud.

9.44 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark): This has been an excellent debate. The House is indebted to the Chairman and members of the Select Committee for examining the White Paper and for persuading the Liaison Committee to recommend to the House that this item should be debated. I welcome the debate and I have listened carefully to the almost unanimous views of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

It is interesting that the House appreciates how critical freedom of information is to our democracy. We have been through a difficult time and, because we are all aware of the breakdown of trust between Governments and citizens, we are beginning to realise, as we move into the next millennium, that democracy is more than casting a vote every five years, important though that may be. I am enthused by the mood of the House, which showed that hon. Members recognise that freedom of information and the right of our citizens to know information that affects them is a critical part of our democratic institutions. They also appreciate the fact that open government is good government. I have believed in that thesis for many years and I am delighted that others now share that view.

I shall try, in the time at my disposal, to deal with as many as possible of the points that have been raised. I apologise to the Select Committee for not giving it a formal reply, but work on the Government's response is well advanced and I hope that we will meet the two-month deadline. We shall give the Committee a detailed and considered response.

This is a well-produced and well-thought-out report. It has raised a number of issues that we are considering. We take the Select Committee's point that this is a particularly difficult concept to understand and get right. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) made the point forcefully that there is a fine balance between openness and privacy and that we should learn from the experience of other countries. In preparing the White Paper, we spent a long time studying the experience, often over many years, of other countries.

The Government take on board the Select Committee's 44 detailed recommendations. We may not agree with all of them, but we shall examine and test them. The Select Committee recognises how fine the balance is, and accepts that this is "an ambitious and highly complex piece of legislation".

It is conscious of the fact that it has taken us a long time—rightly, in my view—to ensure that we attained the correct solution. It says:

"we have some serious doubts . . . about whether the Government has been able to give sufficient attention to the relationship between the Freedom of Information Bill and the Data Protection Bill."

As we have followed the debate and weighed up the results of the consultation, we have shifted our position slightly on the relationship between freedom of information and data protection and have looked anew at some of the concepts.

No one should doubt our commitment to freedom of information. It is clear in our manifesto. My hon. Friends and hon. Members on the Liberal Democrat Benches have acknowledged that the Government intend to push ahead with a radical programme of constitutional change. Freedom of information is a key part—I would argue, a central part—of the programme to modernise British politics. As the Prime Minister said, freedom of information is not some isolated constitutional reform, but a change that is absolutely fundamental to how we see politics developing in this country. He is absolutely right and the overwhelming majority of hon. Members share that view.

In our 1997 manifesto, we said that we would introduce and we will. Both parts of that statement are correct. They are related, but not dependent on each other. Governments can, should and will be open in providing information to citizens and to Members of Parliament.

"a Freedom of Information Act, leading to more open government"

Mr. Baker: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Clark: I shortened my speech to allow everyone to get in and I do not want to exclude anyone, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I do not give way. I want to try to answer points raised by the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members.

We have to be more open. That is why we published the background papers leading to the White Paper and why we have published much more information on the internet.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) criticised me for not acknowledging the code of practice, but we do acknowledge it in the White Paper. We have not laid great emphasis on the code because we intend to surpass it, but it has had a part to play. It has been the yardstick against which we have tried to measure our progress but, by and large, all hon. Members—including the hon. Gentleman—believe that the time has come to move on.

I should point out that the annual monitoring report for the code—which I announced only last month—states that the Government recognise the continuing value of the code. In planning the transition to a statutory regime, the Government will therefore seek to build on the experience gained and the lessons learnt from operating the code. We acknowledge the importance of the code in taking forward the White Paper.

We have made progress in the White Paper. As has been pointed out this evening, we are extending the coverage to almost the whole of the public sector. We are widening and deepening the information available. It is no longer just information that people will have access to, but the original document. We are reducing the exemptions from 14 to seven. We are creating an information commissioner. Some hon. Members may not have quite understood the full powers of the information commissioner.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) was a little critical—I put it no higher than that—because he felt that all the commissioner could judge was the reasonableness of the decision of the civil servant. That is not the case. Under our proposals, the commissioner will examine and rule on the merits of the refusal to disclose information. The point of reasonableness comes in when we have a final appeal—if there is one—under the judicial review. The hon. Gentleman can be reassured by that point.

We have, for the most part, imposed harm tests that are much more stringent than any of the existing mechanisms. I think that the House will accept that we are moving forward from the code and that we are making a quantum leap.

I am encouraged by the response of hon. Members on both sides of the House, particularly by that of the official Opposition, who are now prepared to change their stance and to support a statutory freedom of information regime. That is welcomed by Labour Members and by Liberal Democrats, who spent many years trying to persuade the previous Government that they were wrong on this matter.

Hon. Members have also raised the issue of process, which is a difficult matter to get right. I assure the House that the process remains on course and that progress is good. I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and other members of the Select Committee who have expressed concern that the Government have an agreed timetable to publish a draft Bill by the end of September for pre-legislative consideration. Indeed, nothing whatever has happened to affect the Bill's candidature for inclusion in the Queen's Speech later this year; I cannot be more open or definitive than that.

The Government's declared intention is that there will be further consultation. That is why we are publishing the draft Bill and why the Select Committee will have the opportunity to consider it before the legislation is finalised and brought before the House after, I hope, the next Queen's Speech. The Opposition will have the opportunity to feed in their views on the draft Bill, but the issues are so difficult that, unless the Government give a lead after consultation—as is their duty—we shall have no framework within which to work. The White Paper "Your Right to Know" is a declaration of the Government's intent. It contains the principles on which the Government will build and from which they will derive their draft Bill.

As has been acknowledged, we are going much further than other countries. That is right and proper, given that we have been so far behind. However, I want to correct one or two of the points that were raised today. It is important that hon. Members understand that we intend to exclude only the security services; we shall not exclude the police or the immigration service per se. Paragraph 2.21 of the White Paper states that "the Act will exclude information relating to the investigation and prosecution functions of the police, prosecutors and other bodies carrying out law enforcement work such as the Department of Social Security or the Immigration Service."

We do not intend to exclude administrative functions of the immigration service or the police.

Deciding what constitutes administration and what constitutes investigation has taken up much of our time and attention; finding the right definition is a difficult task, but we are trying to do it. Once we decide that a matter is not excluded, we shall have to determine whether it belongs to one of the seven specified interests and, finally, whether disclosure is against the public interest.

We are trying to bring forward a Bill that strikes the right balance between privacy and freedom of information.

We have taken on board the fact that the Select Committee pointed out that we should integrate data protection and freedom of information. When the Lord Chancellor appeared before the Select Committee, he pointed out that the two pieces of legislation must be dovetailed. We are very much persuaded by the Select Committee's argument that we need to get that absolutely right. Probably, most of the applications on subject matter will be under the data protection legislation, but we are also aware that it does not go as far as we would like and does not cover as much as the freedom of information legislation.

PETITION

Overbuilding (West Sussex)

10.1 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I present a petition on behalf of the citizens of my constituency in the county of West Sussex, which is further to three petitions presented to the Prime Minister in 10 Downing street. The petition expresses the concerns of the citizens at overbuilding in rural areas, in particular in West Sussex, and the requirement to build 12,800 new dwellings additional to the county's structure plan, all of which will be built on green-field sites.

The petition has 507 signatures and, in addition to the previous petitions presented to the Prime Minister, makes a total of 45,000 signatures on the subject. It reads:

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, to ensure that more homes are built in city areas instead of in the countryside or in the Green Belt, both to breathe new life into our cities, and to protect the valuable countryside, and in particular, that of West Sussex, for future generations.

To lie upon the Table.

Education (East Sussex)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

10.2 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): The Prime Minister used to describe his three priorities as "education, education, education". We have heard rather less of that recently. Reducing class sizes was one of the Government's so-called "early pledges" when in opposition. The spin doctors now tell us that we got it wrong, and that, when we thought an early pledge was one that would be delivered early, it was in fact one that was made early. That minor embarrassment does not, of course, stop Ministers announcing all sorts of wonderful developments in education. However, after 14 months in office, I thought it was time to examine whether, in East Sussex at least, the reality on the ground matched the rhetoric.

Of course, education funding in East Sussex must be seen against the Government's general policy to switch funding from counties to urban areas. I pointed that out in the House during the debate on the revenue support grant on 5 February.

Since February, there has been a change in control in East Sussex. We now have a Lib-Lab pact, faithfully mirroring the one we have at national level. Voters in East Sussex will have noted that the net result of the pact was the installation of a Labour chairman of education. So far, he has not exactly bombarded me with protests at the effects of Labour Government policy on education in East Sussex.

Be that as it may, the effect of Government policy this year has been cuts in primary education of 1.53 per cent. or £886,000, and in secondary education of 1.85 per cent. or £1.178 million. I am sure that the Minister will say that an extra £9.2 million was given for education in East Sussex, and that it was passported through.

How does that convert into real cuts in education? The overall revenue budget allowed for East Sussex in 1998-99 was £324.8 million, but forecast committed necessary revenue was £329.7 million. Education needed £13.17 million extra, compared with the extra £9.2 million offered by the Government. In other words, there was an initial shortfall of nearly £4 million. Moreover, the previous Liberal Democrat administration ran the reserves down to almost nothing, making it impossible to cushion the blow by drawing on reserves.

At the same time, the Government changed the way in which capital debt was treated, at a cost to East Sussex of £1.67 million. To add insult to injury, the Government's raid on pension schemes cost the county council £800,000, and changes to what is now called the standards fund are costing a further £900,000. That is to say nothing of the extra cost to the local education authority of new Government initiatives; yet the cost of our central administration is only about half the national average.

How are those across-the-board cuts affecting individual schools in my constituency? Mr. Arthur Cornell, the head teacher of Cavendish school, says:

"we received £39,000 less than expected . . . There have been no redundancies because of retirements . . . There has been a 5% cut in spending on books and equipment".

Mr. Salmon, the acting head teacher of Ratton school, says:

"We have lost the equivalent of one and a half teachers".

The headmaster of Bishop Bell school, Mr. Terry Boatwright, says:

"Our annual growth in pupil numbers averages an impressive 13% per annum with an increase in number on roll from 520 to 660 pupils."

That is impressive in anyone's language, but he goes on to say:

"Our budget in the last financial year was £1,348,000 and, with a 13% increase in pupil numbers"

he would have expected

"a budget of £1,455,000 assuming that the teachers' pay award was fully funded . . . Our actual budget is . . . £60,000 less . . . This leaves us in real terms £38,000 short . . . When basic running costs and salaries are taken out . . . I have only around £150,000 per annum to spend on educational resources. You can imagine the effect of a cut of £38,000, or 25%, on that budget!"

One of my local infant schools is in a similar predicament, having lost £27,500 from its budget. The chairperson of the governors says:

"in September we will have to lose a teacher in order to balance the books . . . our S.E.N. teacher must take a class instead of being peripatetic . . . This makes a mockery of this claim of increased funding and apart from being very depressing for the school staff it means that the recruitment of caring governors will be even more difficult in the future."

I fear that those horror stories are replicated throughout my constituency and the whole of East Sussex. I am indebted to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) for passing me letters in a similar vein from his local schools.

The head teacher of Hellingly county primary school, in a letter to the Prime Minister, says:

"For the very first time ever in 39 years of my adulthood, I voted for your party at the last election, because as a Headteacher I was very disheartened with the Conservative Government's devastation of education. However, since your party took office"—

I am being very fair, and reading the whole of this—

"I have become more and more alarmed about your proposals for education and about the impact that your new legislation is having on my children in my school."

She says that her budget share is more than £25,000 short, despite a rising roll. She concludes:

"I have never been so disheartened and disappointed. If I could afford to retire after giving my life to the profession, . . . I would most certainly do so as the burden is intolerable. Many of my dedicated colleagues will be feeling the same."

That is not a ringing endorsement of the Government's education policy. History does not relate whether she received a reply from the Prime Minister, or, if so, to what effect.

A letter to my right hon. Friend from one of the governors of St. Philip's Roman Catholic primary school in Uckfield states:

"In 1997 we had 197 pupils with a budget of £297,000. This year we have 198 pupils . . . we now have £294,000, a 2.5 per cent. overall cut . . . We now have another staff vacancy—a loss of a very experienced employee—and here we are thinking this is a good opportunity to save money by employing another newly qualified teacher."

I have had representations from Conservative county councillors about the massive contradiction between the Government's policy on class sizes and their professed support for parental choice. Ministers may insist on a maximum of 30 in a class, but in rural areas there is often no room to build extra classrooms, and in most areas there is no money to do so. Last weekend, a worried mother phoned to tell me that she wanted her son to go to St. Andrew's Church of England school, a choice that I can certainly understand, as it is an excellent school with a dedicated headmistress. The child is apparently unable to go to the school of his parents' choice, because admission numbers were reduced across the board this year. The boy is one of three children left out in the cold. My constituent and her father went to that school, and, she said, she received an excellent education in a class of 36.

Another assault on local education is the Government's intention to take away the right of parish and town councils to appoint a governor to their local schools. The Opposition fought that tooth and nail in Standing Committee, and I welcomed the Government's defeat on the matter in the other place last week. The Government's proposal caused concern in rural communities up and down the country, and I hope that the Minister will confirm that that ill-considered proposal will be abandoned.

The situation is not much happier in the pre-school sector. The nursery vouchers scheme was popular with private nurseries and playgroups in my constituency. I know that, because I took the trouble to visit them. I also met on several occasions members of the Independent Preschool Nursery Association, an excellent organisation based in Eastbourne. For purely dogmatic reasons, the former Liberal Democrat administration in East Sussex refused to participate in the pilot scheme. Then the new Labour Government abolished the scheme, again for reasons of dogma.

Nursery operators are supposed to be working in partnership with local education authorities through the early years development plan. It is some partnership. Nurseries must wait upwards of six weeks for payment, a serious burden for small businesses. Whether through incompetence or design, our LEA seems to be sitting on funds received from the Department. Barbara Davies of IPNA, who runs the Tots and Time Out nursery, contacted the Department to establish that the money was sent out on 29 May. Yet she received her money only in the past few days, and after threatening legal action. How many others are still waiting? The situation is wholly unacceptable, and I hope that the Minister will undertake to investigate it.

Let me turn finally to students' tuition fees. I do not recall the Labour candidate in my constituency saying that a Labour Government would impose fees. I know that many parents in Eastbourne feel betrayed on that issue, among others. For poor families, it could make the difference between a son or a daughter going or not going to higher or further education.

For once, I agree with the Prime Minister that education should be an important priority for any Government. That is why the Conservatives placed such emphasis on driving up standards in education and on parental choice. Children and young people are the future of any nation, and a Government who betrayed that future would deserve condemnation.

I call on the Minister tonight to accept that his policies are simply not delivering improved education to my constituents and to promise that he will put things right. Empty rhetoric may have been all right in opposition, but he and his colleagues are now in charge. I hope that we can expect the political equivalent of the Minister's staying behind after school and writing out 100 times, "I must try harder."

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): I welcome the opportunity to put some facts before the House this evening regarding the Government's policies on education in East Sussex and across the country. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) failed to acknowledge the good work that is being done in many schools in his constituency and in East Sussex generally. As Minister for School Standards, I put on record my thanks and congratulations to those schools in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and throughout East Sussex that are doing a very good job. One needs only to look at the standards being achieved to realise that real improvements are taking place in schools in East Sussex.

In 1997, at key stage 2, tests for level 4—the level that we expect 11-year-olds to achieve—revealed an average of 63 per cent. for English and 61 per cent. for mathematics. Those figures are broadly in line with the national average. What is particularly impressive is that they show a dramatic increase on the 1996 figures, when, in the key stage 2 tests, the figure was 55 per cent. for English and 52 per cent. for mathematics. Schools in East Sussex are making real improvements. Although the hon. Gentleman failed to do so, I congratulate those schools, the teachers and the parents on the improvements that have been made this year. I hope that standards will continue to rise.

I began my speech by referring to standards, because that is the Government's No. 1 priority. That is why, contrary to the hon. Gentleman's comments, we have provided a substantial increase in funding for schools in East Sussex and across the country. In light of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, it is worth reminding the House of the facts—we shall rely not on the prejudice that we have heard from the hon. Gentleman, but on what is happening and the actions that the Government have taken.

On capital spending, which is used to repair the fabric of school buildings, the new deal for schools means that we expect to spend some £2 billion repairing, renewing and improving school buildings, security and information technology by the end of this Parliament. In the March Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer allocated a further £100 million to support education capital spending in England. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment announced details of that funding last Friday. On day-to-day spending, we have allocated an extra £835 million this year in England alone over and above the spending plans of the previous Administration—whom the hon. Gentleman supported.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): The Minister will be aware that Sussex has received more than £7 million extra funding this year. When I served on Sussex county council, there was a £12.6 million cut in central Government spending in 1995–96; an £11.5 million cut in 1996–97; and an £11.3 million cut in 1997–98. The county council coped with those spending cuts by drawing on reserves, and it had to spend £22 million in order to maintain standards in East Sussex.

Mr. Byers: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that illustration of what went before. His experience of the county council is informative about the cuts that were made year on year by the Conservative Administration. That contrasts starkly with the steps taken already by this Government to remedy the wrongs imposed on our schools system by the actions over not three but 18 years of the Conservatives.

In the general election, we pledged to raise the proportion of national income invested in education as we cut the misuse of Government money elsewhere. We are delivering on that, and next week the outcome of the comprehensive spending review will be announced. I am confident that we will bring good news for schools in East Sussex and the rest of the country, and it will not only be about extra funding for priority areas such as education.

The review provides an opportunity to develop a new approach to public services, with targets for improvements set and outcomes publicly identified. All too often in the past, simply spending more was good enough. No thought was given to raising standards or improving the quality of education on offer. Those days have gone. Increased spending must be linked to specific, clearly stated outcomes. Funding to support reform and modernisation must be the key.

We have not simply awaited the outcome of the comprehensive spending review. We have taken action already and provided increased funding—real money—for East Sussex. The education standard spending assessment for East Sussex for 1998-99 represents an increase of 5.9 per cent., or some £9.2 million. That is well above the rate of inflation, and should be sufficient to meet the needs of schools in East Sussex, even after allowing for inflation, pay awards, rising pupil numbers and any other spending pressures that they might face.

It is informative to consider the per pupil increase. Total figures often do not clearly illustrate the amount of extra money that is being provided. This year's per pupil increases bring home the extra funding that the Government are providing. East Sussex is getting an extra £132 for every primary pupil and an extra £156 for every secondary pupil. In percentage terms, that represents an increase of 6.3 per cent. for primary pupils and 5.7 per cent. for secondary pupils. That is a real-terms increase of around 3 per cent., which we expect the county council to use for raising standards in schools.

It is worth contrasting those real-terms increases with the funding provided by the previous Conservative Government. It is only by considering those figures that we can find out whether they were committed to education. The figures reveal clearly the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster).

Under the previous Government, it was cuts not in one year, but year on year, for the schools and the pupils of East Sussex. Over the final five years of the Conservative Government, education standard spending assessment in East Sussex was cut in real terms for secondary pupils by £218 per pupil, or 7 per cent. It says something about the different priority that this Government give education that, in stark contrast to that reduction of £218, for secondary pupils there has been an increase in spending of £156 in one year. Those are real figures, affecting real children, in the schools of East Sussex.

While the Government have allocated an extra £9.2 million to East Sussex county council, we are disappointed that the full £9.2 million has not been passed on to its schools: £3.6 million has been held back. Schools are receiving only £5.6 million of the money allocated by the Government. That is bound to have an adverse impact on schools in East Sussex.

However, East Sussex gets a fair deal from the Government. It receives 4 per cent. more in the education standard spending assessment per pupil than the average for shire counties. The formula that the Government use to allocate resources through the education SSA is currently being reviewed, because we are not happy with the formula that we inherited from the previous Administration. We want to, and we shall, make it fairer, and many authorities and schools throughout this country want us to do so.

Decisions will not be taken until the autumn, and nothing has been ruled in or out, so it is too early to say how the review might affect funding in East Sussex or in any other authority. However, I can say that there will be a new system of allocating finance to local authorities that is both fair and transparent, which is not the case at present.

In addition to putting the extra £835 million into day-to-day spending through education SSAs, we have secured a substantial increase in specific grants for local education authorities, the most important of which is the standards fund—money that is specifically earmarked for raising standards and improving the quality of education. I shall mention just three of the 23 programmes that are helping to raise standards in East Sussex.

The first relates to class sizes. I was interested in what the hon. Member for Eastbourne said about St. Andrew's Church of England primary school and the difficulties there, but I have to tell him that that has nothing to do with the measures being introduced by the Labour Government. The legal powers that we are seeking for ourselves in the School Standards and Framework Bill are not yet on the statute book, so any action taken in respect of that school have nothing to do with the Government's proposals as they affect class sizes.

We have pledged to reduce class sizes for all five, six and seven-year-olds to 30 or fewer by September 2001 at the latest, and we shall do that. Positive steps are already being taken to achieve that goal, with £116,000 being made available to East Sussex that it must use to reduce infant class sizes. That is money redirected from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme, and is a good example of redirecting resources from a privileged few to benefit the majority.

By ring-fencing those funds, we shall ensure that every school in Eastbourne, in East Sussex and throughout the country will have classes of 30 or fewer by September 2001. That pledge will be delivered in a way that enhances parental preference. That is our commitment, and it is one that we shall deliver. We have also allocated an extra £1.3 million to schools in East Sussex for school improvement and raising standards, and £783,000 specifically for the national grid for learning.

[Mr. Byers]

We have been able to go beyond improvements in day-to-day revenue spending by providing additional funding for the maintenance and repair of the fabric of school buildings. The new deal for schools means that we were able to allocate East Sussex £2.1 million to improve school buildings. In addition to the new deal for schools, we have allocated more credit approvals in the form of annual capital guidelines.

For the financial year 1998-99, more than £10 million of credit approval has been allocated to East Sussex. In addition to the main allocation, £860,000 has been made available for capital expenditure on special educational needs. On top of that, a specific grant of £700,000 is being made available to Church schools, in recognition of the fact that such schools are often popular with parents, and offer a high standard of education.

Taken together, all that means that, through the actions of the Labour Government, East Sussex is receiving £225 capital funding for every pupil in the county. That is almost 90 per cent. more than the national average allocation of £120 per pupil. When people can see the facts, they will be in no doubt that the Government are investing in the children of East Sussex.

Eleven schools in the hon. Gentleman's constituency will benefit because of successful applications to improve and repair buildings, and to make them more efficient. Teachers and pupils will all benefit from a better environment in which to teach and learn. Investing in education in this way also means that, over time, more resources will be able to be spent in the classroom, rather than on premises costs. We are sure that that will help to raise standards.

In the end, it is for East Sussex county council to determine the level of budgets of the schools it maintains from within the resources made available by Government. The hon. Gentleman has talked about cuts for some schools in his constituency. It is certainly true that some schools have suffered budget cuts, but what is hard to explain are the differences in funding per pupil. Looking at primary and secondary schools in Eastbourne, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, changes in per pupil funding range from about minus 8 per cent. to plus 8 per cent. I have to say that I find that difficult to accept. I would urge schools in the hon. Gentleman's constituency to ask the local education authority to explain precisely why that is happening.

It is not my job to set the budgets of individual schools, but the Government have allocated an extra £9.2 million. We are disappointed that not all that money has been passed on to benefit schools in East Sussex. The county council has to explain why it has withheld £3.6 million of that sum from the raising of standards in schools within the area covered by the county council. We believe that the Government have acted properly in relation to the schools and the pupils of East Sussex. It is for the county council to discharge its responsibilities.

There can be no doubt, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, that education, education, education is the Government's priority. We have acted to demonstrate that that is the case. We have acted in a way that will benefit pupils in Eastbourne, in East Sussex and in the country generally. We look forward to working in partnership to deliver those improved standards.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Regeneration

1. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): What plans he has to assist the regeneration of peripheral areas of the country. [47619]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): May I extend to the House the apologies of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning for their absence today? As you know, Madam Speaker, both are abroad on official business.

A Bill to introduce regional development agencies is being considered by Parliament. Those agencies will play an important role in stimulating new economic growth while tackling the effect of industrial decline in all areas of their regions.

Mr. Blizzard: Does my hon. Friend accept that peripherality is a major factor which affects economic under-performance and competitive weaknesses in certain parts of the country? I believe that that fact is recognised by the European Union. Does my hon. Friend accept also that peripheral areas are sometimes forgotten by those at the heart of government? Will she consider that point when making appointments to regional development agencies? Bearing in mind the fact that the Department is integrated, does she agree that one of the best ways of assisting peripheral areas is by improving transport links, thereby making them less peripheral?

Angela Eagle: On my hon. Friend's latter point, the Government have clearly already made a start with the rural transport money announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It will have a big effect in rural areas that have been cut off as a result of the deregulation of buses perpetrated by the previous Government. The Government recognise that peripherality can be a significant factor in creating economic difficulties. For that reason, we have negotiated with the European Union to ensure that it gives sufficient recognition to those points in its on-going review of European Union structural funds.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Will the Government be minded to introduce an element of rurality as well as peripherality? By wiping £100 million off this year's budget for shire counties, is the Minister doing anything to improve the circumstances of rural, as opposed to urban, areas?

Angela Eagle: I disagree with the hon. Lady's view of local authority funding. It is clear that rural areas have particular needs. That is why, through the creation of regional development agencies, we intend to ensure that rural and urban development issues are dealt with strategically.

Mr. Stephen Timms (East Ham): Does my hon. Friend accept that parts of the Thames gateway might be properly regarded as peripheral? Will she reaffirm the Government's commitment to regeneration of the Thames gateway area? Given that the Thames gateway is divided between three regional development agencies, will she consider the proposal that one agency should be designated with a lead responsibility for that whole area?

Angela Eagle: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his creativity in framing that question. I agree that the Thames gateway is an important area for regeneration, but I will have to think carefully about designating a lead agency. Sub-regional and cross-RDA boundary regeneration projects, such as the Thames gateway, can continue within the new structure. I envisage that the Thames gateway will be successful through real partnership, rather than through one RDA taking the lead. I should like to see the Thames gateway initiative taken forward in partnership, with agreement and co-operation.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): Will the Minister please distinguish between economic peripherality and geographic peripherality, as some areas in United Kingdom cities can be economically, but not geographically, peripheral? Will she also consider the question of peninsularity, where the problems of peripherality are compounded?

Angela Eagle: I do not think that I should even try to say "peripherality". Clearly, however, rurality and peripherality are important points. I think that the hon. Gentleman should congratulate the Government on their recent success in securing NUTS 2 status—the nomenclature of units of territorial statistics—for Cornwall as an economically peripheral area.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): Does the Minister agree that the vigorous pursuit of a sustainable energy policy could make an important contribution to the dispersal of economic activity and prosperity to peripheral regions? As for bio-energy and energy crops, is there not an important opportunity now for policies to be put in place to encourage their development? Would that not help the agriculture sector and would it not be good for jobs and economic prosperity? What discussions is the Department having with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to put policies in place to ensure that these developments can take place to assist rural areas?

Angela Eagle: The hon. Gentleman is right to point to the potential of biomass and crops as forms of sustainable energy. One of the core functions of the new regional development agencies will be sustainable development. The Government are considering how best to achieve and improve on the renewable energy resources targets set down by the previous Administration. There is a cross-departmental view, because of issues such as the non-fossil fuel obligation, which helps to ensure that energy generation on the edges of economic viability can be developed.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): Does the hon. Lady believe that the regeneration of peripheral areas is assisted by the Government's policy of granting planning permission to build on green-belt land in areas such as Sussex and Newcastle?

Angela Eagle: I congratulate the right hon. Lady on her creativity in putting that question. As has often been said from the Government Dispatch Box, the issues of planning, housing and the green belt have been dealt with in reviews of planning guidance in the Government's determination to ensure that they devolve decision making to a level where it is most obviously appropriate for these difficult issues of future planning of housing to be dealt with.

Mrs. Shephard: I thank the hon. Lady for that attempt to reply. It is important for peripheral areas, however they are defined, as well as for the rest of the country, that the Government should come clean on their policy for the green belt. Does the hon. Lady accept that, until they do, their position is as defined by the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning, that the green belt is "up for grabs", or by the comments of Mr. Derek Draper, that the green belt is "just a . . . bunch of mud tracts at the edge of town"?

Angela Eagle: I should like to point out to the right hon. Lady that there is more green-belt land designated under this Government than was ever designated previously. Moreover, we shall achieve our targets for building on brown-field land, unlike the previous Administration, which achieved only 42 per cent. during their all-too-long tenure of office.

Local Authorities (Pilot Schemes)

2. Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): What progress has been made by local authorities undertaking best-value pilot schemes. [47620]

The Minister for Local Government and Housing (Ms Hilary Armstrong): All best-value pilot schemes started in April and are implemented in accordance with the plans set out by the relevant local authorities. Under the research programme, a comprehensive overview on progress will be produced in October. Any assessment ahead of that time is necessarily rather selective, but authorities such as Leeds, Newham and York are clearly making good early progress in implementing their plans.

Mr. Colman: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I am pleased that pilot progress is so good. I believe that the best-value arrangements require a level playing field to ensure that employers and employees have the same expectation contractually, whether in the public or the private sector. Would my hon. Friend like to comment on the discussions involving the United Kingdom standing committee on local authority pension funds, the public sector trade unions, the private sector employers and the Association of Direct Labour Organisations to ensure that the pension arrangements for local authority employees now, and perhaps future employees working for private sector contractors that contract with local government best-value arrangements, are equal and fair to all sides in terms of the cost of those pensions and of ensuring that the value and type of the pensions are maintained for the employees?

Ms Armstrong: That is an important aspect of moving forward into a changing situation in local government, where the key issue is not who delivers services but ensuring that services are delivered in the best interests of local people. It is important that employees know that they have as much security as possible so that they can play their full part in changing and modernising those services so that they produce the best value for local people. We are pleased with the way in which discussions on pension arrangements are progressing, and I hope that we shall return to that matter to achieve the level playing field to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Does the Minister accept that the enthusiastic use of compulsory competitive tendering by Wandsworth borough council, among many others, has resulted in Wandsworth having the lowest council tax and the best services in England? Does she agree that the acceptance of that approach by local people is precisely why, during the local government elections last month, every ward in the constituency of the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) was won by the Conservative party?

Ms Armstrong: I am afraid that the Audit Commission does not agree with the hon. Gentleman on the quality of services in Wandsworth. However, we are determined that all services, not just those that were ideologically targeted by the previous Government, deliver the best value for local people. Unlike compulsory competitive tendering, that is not an ideological approach. Instead of being narrowly confined to a contract culture, that approach will be dedicated to responding to the aims and aspirations of local people.

Vehicle Emissions

3. Mr. Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough): How many deaths each year he estimates are hastened by air pollution from road traffic. [47621]

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): The Department of Health's Committee on Medical Effects of Air Pollutants estimates that, each year, between 12,000 and 24,000 deaths are brought forward by short-term exposure to certain air pollutants from all sources, including traffic.

It is, at present, not possible to say by how much lives are shortened. It is also not possible to attribute a proportion of those effects to traffic alone.

Mr. Ennis: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Given the number of deaths attributed to air pollution and road traffic, does he agree that the Government should take serious action to address the problem? May I suggest that my right hon. Friend consider three courses of necessary action: first, clamping down on the worst polluting vehicles on our roads; secondly, reducing even further the exhaust emissions of new vehicles, and, thirdly, reducing road traffic congestion throughout Britain?

Mr. Meacher: We aim to address all those objectives. First, with regard to the worst polluters, we have instigated in seven local authority pilot areas the roadside testing of emissions and summary fines for owners of those vehicles with emissions above the prescribed level. Secondly, I am pleased to say that, almost in the last day of the British EU presidency, we managed to conclude negotiations on the auto oil dossier, which is an extremely complicated matter and will reduce vehicle emissions and improve fuel quality to such an extent that new cars will be 30 to 50 per cent. less polluting. My hon. Friend is right to stress the need to reduce the quantity of traffic on our roads, as against technological improvements, and that is precisely why we shall shortly issue our integrated transport strategy, which will do just that.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): Is the Minister aware that one in six children in my constituency suffers from asthma, and that, at Lullington Heath, the Government's ozone monitoring site, the maximum recommended level has been exceeded 719 times since 1 January 1997? Can he confirm that the White Paper will be radical and will concentrate on encouraging walking, cycling and transfer to rail; and that the lunches that the Prime Minister has had with the Automobile Association and others will not in any way weaken its radicalism?

Mr. Meacher: To take the serious point in what the hon. Gentleman said, we are concerned about the increasing incidence of childhood asthma. There has been something of an epidemic over the past decade or more. We need an integrated transport strategy, partly to reduce vehicle emissions; but reducing the number of vehicles on the road is precisely designed to deal with the asthma problem. Under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, local authorities have powers to direct traffic in their area to pedestrianised areas, shut off certain roads to prevent their being used by vehicles, and install traffic-calming measures. All those are being used by local authorities to protect those who are most vulnerable to air pollution.

Local Government Finance

4. Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): What responses have been received to the consultation paper on improving local financial accountability. [47623]

The Minister for Local Government and Housing (Ms Hilary Armstrong): We have received 491 wide-ranging responses to the consultation paper on improving local financial accountability from local authorities, other organisations and members of the public. In due course, we will place a list of respondees in the House Library and full copies of the responses in the Department's library.

Dr. Starkey: One of the issues that will undoubtedly have been covered in the consultation is whether local authority self-financed expenditure should be treated in the same way as central Government spending for control purposes. There are strong arguments in favour of allowing local authorities much greater discretion in self-financed expenditure, not least because that would bring us into line with most of our European partners. Is my hon. Friend prepared to look again at that issue, especially for councils that are already clearly demonstrating their accountability to their local electorate?

Ms Armstrong: In his recent announcement to the House, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor dealt with that issue and made it clear that, although there has been a change to the manner in which public expenditure is accounted for, local authority self-financed expenditure none the less remains an important part of overall public expenditure.

We are considering how we can encourage good practice in local government and how we can make sure that authorities, many of which are working effectively, respond financially and in other ways to the needs and aspirations of local people. That includes keeping local taxes down as much as possible while achieving good value, quality services. We shall find ways of encouraging and supporting such councils and encouraging the spread of good practice throughout local government.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): Will the Minister confirm that the vast majority of respondents to the consultation confirmed their clear view that they want an end to capping—whether sophisticated, crude or otherwise—and that replacing it with something else would not be satisfactory since it would certainly mean abandoning the promises given by Ministers when in opposition? Will she also scotch the rumours circulating in the local government press that the Government will be unable to introduce their White Paper on local government before the summer recess?

Ms Armstrong: I have not read that speculation. We intend to continue our work on the responses to the consultation so that we can present a White Paper to the House before the recess. I can confirm that many respondents wanted to get rid of crude and universal capping: it was never a commitment of anyone who is now a Minister to break the relationship between central Government and local government. Central Government will always have an interest in what local government does, and in its spending power—that is what partnership is all about. Increasing local democracy will increase the autonomy of local government, but we must do both. Central Government will continue to be interested in the way in which local government spends its money.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): Will my hon. Friend have regard to the representations made by Special Interest Groups of Metropolitan Authorities—SIGOMA—in the review to which she refers? Will she have special regard to the fact that secondary school children in the Kensington and Chelsea constituency receive £3,949 per pupil, whereas those in Wakefield receive £2,728? The difference is more than a third. Will she bear in mind the imbalance and unfairness between the sums allocated for education to Tory-controlled Chelsea and Kensington and to Labour-controlled Wakefield?

Ms Armstrong: It is my responsibility, and one that I take seriously, to listen to representations from all groups. All groups are currently making representations on behalf of the different local authorities that they represent so that they can contribute to our deliberations on achieving a fairer standard spending assessment. In that way, all people, wherever they live, will know that they are being treated fairly.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): Will the Minister agree that local accountability goes out the window if she diverts £200 million in cash from the education of deprived London youngsters to the newly created coalfields region in the north? Will she deny reports that she plans to alter the education budgets of London boroughs by disregarding ethnic origin in calculating additional educational needs? Does she accept that there is a huge ethnic minority in London, and that removing the extra funding will result in larger classes, teacher redundancies and school closures? She may think that tinkering with local government finance is the right thing to do, but she does not have the right to do what is wrong.

Ms Armstrong: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's sudden conversion to being concerned about those matters. I am also remarkably encouraged to hear him say that people must be careful about tinkering with local government finance. He might have said that to his colleagues when they were contemplating the poll tax.

I have made it clear to the House on many occasions that there is a proper process of consultation on standard spending assessments. That is taking place now, and it is not my job to pre-empt it. We shall go through the responses to our consultation seriously, and deliberate at the end of the consultation process later in the year.

Sustainable Resources

5. Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): What steps he is taking to encourage business to adopt a sustainable use of resources. [47624]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): Sustainable use of resources is the focus for many existing Government programmes and at the heart of the current consultation on sustainable business, launched on 18 June. The responses will inform future policy and programmes, and help to shape the Government's wider strategy on sustainable development.

Mr. Hanson: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Will she confirm that it is vital that business people take up the challenge offered by sustainable business and look towards making their businesses sustainable for the future? Will she outline how she intends to encourage good practice in business to ensure that we have sustainable development? What do the Government intend to do with businesses that are recalcitrant in that respect?

Angela Eagle: One of the best arguments for that challenge to be taken up by business people is that it enables businesses to produce more, more cheaply, and therefore to make higher profits if they get it right. Businesses need to understand the potential for savings, as demonstrated by the Government's energy efficiency best practice programme. For example, a 40 per cent. saving on fuel bills can be made if combined heat and power is installed. A range of other savings can be made in many, sometimes surprising, areas. British businesses need to take account of those and put them into effect.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): One of the ideas that are apparently floating around the Department is that the water that farmers use for irrigation should be rationed. Will the minister confirm that farmers already pay for the water they use for irrigation according to usage, so it would be entirely unnecessary and completely unfair to impose this further burden on agriculture?

Angela Eagle: It is for the water companies to ensure that supplies are available in their areas, and to charge accordingly. The hon. Gentleman will know that not only is the Office of Water Services undertaking a review, but the Government launched a review of charging and abstraction at the water summit after we came into power. Perhaps the matter will be clearer once the reviews have reported.

Vehicle Emissions

6. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): What measures he has taken to monitor emissions from all forms of transport since 1 May 1997. [47625]

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): Direct monitoring of emissions from road vehicles occurs at the annual roadworthiness tests and in roadside emissions testing exercises. National aggregate figures for the transport, industrial and domestic sectors are provided by the national atmospheric emissions inventory. The Department monitors levels of air pollution at 114 automatic networked sites.

Fiona Mactaggart: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that the town of Slough, which I represent, is encircled by the overcrowded M40 to the north and the M4, which operates at 105 per cent. of capacity, to the south? The M4's eastern junction with the M25 is the busiest road junction in Europe. Heathrow, with its aviation emissions, is to the east of town, and a railway that is not electrified runs through the middle of it. Slough has fantastic communications, but we do not have adequate information about how those different forms of transport add to air pollution. In the preparation for the integrated transport White Paper, could consideration be given to providing better information on how each of those forms of transport contributes to air pollution? For example, what is the effect of Heathrow on the people in the surrounding areas?

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend makes it clear why the people of Slough voted for a Labour Member at the last election. Areas such as Slough desperately need an integrated transport strategy, and that is what we shall deliver. I agree that full information about the quality of air, the quality of water and the contamination of land should be more widely available. I hope that the freedom of information Bill, which will not be published before the White Paper on integrated transport, will enable us to make available much more extensive information which should be more readily accessible to the public, including on the internet. A great deal of information is already provided on teletext and in the public media. It is broadcast hourly, but it is not broken down by district to the extent that I would like.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that emissions from modern motor car engines are minimal, and that the problems are caused either by vehicles that are badly maintained or by engines in older cars, which are often owned and run by people who are less well off? Will the Government introduce measures to encourage those people, by fiscal means if possible, to buy newer, cleaner engines for their cars? [Interruption.] And does he accept, in spite of the noise from Labour Members, that ownership of a motor car remains one of the aims of most families? Personal mobility is exceptionally important. I hope that an anti-car strategy is not emanating from the Government.

Mr. Meacher: There is certainly not an anti-car strategy emanating from the Government, as the Opposition will rapidly discover when we publish our White Paper. We are concerned that people should walk or use bicycles and public transport where appropriate. If that is not possible, cars remain extremely important, particularly in rural areas. We are trying to deal with that problem for people who do not have cars or cannot afford them.

I accept what the hon. Lady said about emission levels: the problem is indeed caused by older, badly maintained cars. We are trying to deal with the lack of maintenance by carrying out roadside emission tests and issuing summary fines of £60 at the kerbside. I take note of her comments. It would be helpful if we could find ways of encouraging people to exchange old and polluting cars for newer, more fuel-efficient cars.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): The Minister did not mention compressed natural gas, perhaps because it is pollution-free. May I warmly congratulate the Government on the £500 grant enabling people to convert from polluting fuels to compressed natural gas? May I also urge the Minister to make local authorities aware of the grants that are available? Thousands of depot-based vehicles could benefit from those grants, which could rid our streets of noisy, nasty, polluting vehicles.

Mr. Meacher: I am sorry that, in a rather long answer, I failed to mention road gas duty. As my hon. Friend says, we have frozen the duty for the second successive year, improving the market attractiveness of alternative fuels. I accept that we have not made the advantages of using such fuels sufficiently available, although I think that the major problem that we must overcome is the lack of recharging points around the country. Until there are several hundred or, preferably, several thousand, I do not think that the market will take off.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. We have not heard a brisk question or a brisk answer as yet. It has been a very poor performance so far. Let us try the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

Pedestrians

28. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): What extra provision he intends to make to encourage people to walk to local (a) schools, (b) shops and (c) places of entertainment. [47649]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): We have increased funding for local authority transport packages to £85 million this year. Most of those packages include measures to promote walking. The forthcoming White Paper on integrated transport will set out further measures to encourage walking.

Mr. Bennett: Is it not very disappointing that so many young people expect to be driven everywhere by their parents? Will my hon. Friend have a strong word with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, to ensure that his policies encourage children to attend local schools and that, in the school curriculum, emphasis is put on what young people can do to improve their environment, rather than being concerned about the Bengal tiger or the rainforests? Should they not be told that walking to school would be a good contribution to improving the environment?

Ms Jackson: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment will note what my hon. Friend has said. Equally, I am sure that my hon. Friend will know that, on 21 May, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport announced the setting up of the school travel advisory group. Its membership has not yet been finalised, but it will include representatives of my Department, the Department for Education and Employment and the Department of Health, as well as local authorities and others at local level. Its main task will be to oversee further measures to reduce car use for school journeys. The aim is to produce comprehensive guidance on best practice for local authorities by this time next year.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Does the Minister accept that, although walking is excellent exercise for those who are young, old or somewhere in between, the security of children going to school is of the utmost importance? A constituent of mine, a young lady of 13 called Claire Hart, was murdered in broad daylight. Sadly, she had been befriended by an unfortunate young man, who murdered her one day when she was on her way to school. If it is not completely secure, this business of walking can be a problem for young people.

Ms Jackson: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept my condolences following the particularly tragic incident that has afflicted his constituency. As he points out, the question of "stranger danger" also arises when parents decide whether to allow their children to walk or cycle to school rather than being escorted in cars. That is why all our thinking—both in the school travel advisory group, and when we are considering safe routes to school—is based on the premise that the safety and security of children must be overriding.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating two schools in my constituency that took part in the Walking to School week, an initiative of Birmingham city council? However, in urging children and adults to walk more, will she also look at the Crime and Disorder Bill, which puts a statutory duty on local authorities for safer communities? As the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has pointed out, safety is an extremely important consideration if we want to encourage people to walk, whether it is for entertainment or to school.

Ms Jackson: I will certainly congratulate my hon. Friend's local authority, as I would congratulate all local authorities that participated in that part of the Don't Choke Britain month, which encouraged children either to walk or cycle to school. She highlights the important role that a properly integrated transport system can play, not only in reducing and breaking down barriers of social exclusion, but in helping to reduce crime.

Traffic Congestion

29. Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): What representations he has received on congestion charging. [47651]

The Minister of Transport (Dr. Gavin Strang): Congestion charging was one of the range of options that were raised in the Government's consultation exercise on developing an integrated transport policy. A number of respondents commented on it. We continue to receive representations and correspondence on the subject from a wide range of sources.

Mr. Evans: Does the Minister appreciate that rural motorists are concerned about two new car taxes: being taxed every time they enter major towns, and being charged to park outside supermarkets and the place where they work? Does the Minister appreciate that many rural people use their car as a necessity, not as the luxury, and that they have to go into major towns and cities because that is where the services and jobs are? Do rural motorists have to club together to pay for a lobbyist who can have a word with one of the aides in Downing street, so that he can make that telephone call on their behalf, before this Government really listen to their concerns?

Dr. Strang: First, we are consulting on these policies, as the hon. Gentleman knows, and will announce our decisions in the forthcoming White Paper. Secondly, of course, the situation of people living in rural areas is different, transport wise, from that of people living in urban areas. If we were to adopt any of these policies, including some of the policies that the previous Government advocated in their Green Paper, it would be only on the basis of the fullest consultation. I remind him that this Government have done more than the previous Government to help people living in rural areas, not least because of the huge subsidy increase that we have announced for rural bus services.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although congestion metering could certainly help in some cases to reduce congestion in town centres, there is a danger that such metering will not reduce the traffic level, but simply spread the traffic throughout the day, so that there is not a peak in the morning and evening? Does he agree that that should not be the main objective of the Government's transport strategy? The main objective is to reduce the level of private transport and to make integrated public transport beneficial and available to everyone.

Dr. Strang: My hon. Friend raises a number of important points. Surely the whole House agrees that the real issue is to tackle congestion and pollution. We cannot go on the way that we are. We want to create an environment in which people can use their car, but in a way where there is no congestion. That means pursuing policies that make it easier for people to use their car less.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): Is the Minister aware that the average weekly shop weighs 60lb? Are we to expect poorer housewives, or indeed poorer househusbands, who cannot afford congestion taxes to take their shopping on and off the bus? Does he agree that a policy of extra taxes for the Chancellor of the Exchequer that is aimed at forcing poorer households off the road, in favour of fat-cat commuters in their gas-powered Jaguars, is not acceptable?

Dr. Strang: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is impressing anyone with that sort of rhetoric. Let me make it clear that of course we recognise that there are a whole range of journeys, particularly shopping and shopping with young children, where the car will be a convenient and flexible mode of transport. However, that does not mean that we do not have to address what is happening. On the basis of present trends and with unchanged policies, traffic on our roads is predicted to increase by over a third over the next 20 years. We cannot go on like that. The Government are prepared to bite the bullet and we will put forward our proposals later this month.

30. Ms Rosie Winterton (Doncaster, Central): If he will estimate the cost per year of traffic congestion. [47652]

Dr. Strang: Road congestion imposes costs on the environment, the economy and society. Estimates of the cost to the economy vary. For example, the Confederation of British Industry estimated that congestion cost the British economy some £15 billion in 1989. A more recent estimate by National Economic Research Associates put the costs to road users in 1996 at £7 billion.

Ms Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the key ways of reducing the cost of traffic congestion would be to improve bus services? In view of my right hon. Friend's previous answer, can he reassure the House that the forthcoming White Paper will address some of the problems created by the previous Government's deregulation policies which, in my constituency, mean that the local bus company, Mainline, has withdrawn a number of bus services against the wishes of local people and the South Yorkshire passenger transport authority? That is forcing people into their cars and increasing congestion and all the costs that go with that.

Dr. Strang: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that she seeks. For many people who do not live in the London area and who do not live near a railway station, the only public transport option is the bus service.

That is why we attach so much importance to supporting buses. It is why we increased the fuel duty rebate and announced a virtual doubling of the subsidy available to rural bus services. It is why the bus operators described the last Budget as the best Budget the bus industry has ever had.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that, in opposition, his party's view of reducing congestion by widening the M25 close to the proposed terminal 5 near Heathrow was that it represented £100 million-worth of motorway madness? What is his view now?

Dr. Strang: I am sure that the right hon. Lady appreciates that we will be publishing our White Paper in the next couple of weeks. Following that, we will be publishing the result of the roads review. As I am sure she understands, we are appraising all the road schemes and will be announcing our decisions in the near future.

31. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): What proportion of the trunk road network on current forecasts will be overloaded with traffic in 20 years' time. [47653]

Dr. Strang: I have today placed in the Library of the House of Commons maps showing the extent of traffic congestion on the trunk road network. Based on 1997 national road traffic forecasts, they show that, on present trends and unchanged policies, the proportion of the trunk road network which experiences regular congestion during peak periods is expected to increase from 14 per cent. in 1996 to 26 per cent. in 2016.

Mr. Dismore: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in Hendon we have some of the busiest parts of the trunk network in London, with the A1, the M1, the A41 the A5 and the north circular? Is he aware that my constituents are becoming increasingly concerned about the environmental impact of ever-growing traffic levels, which can often be made worse by schemes such as that proposed by the Highways Agency for the Five Ways corner A1-A41 interchange, which will turn grass verges into road space? Will my right hon. Friend assure me that the views of local residents will be fully taken into account before any final decisions are made about the scheme? Does my right hon. Friend welcome, as I do, the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Bill which points the way forward for tackling pollution and congestion in the years ahead?

Dr. Strang: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. I am grateful to him for giving me advance notice of this question. I know that he is greatly concerned about the number of injuries at that junction in his constituency. The Highways Agency is working on plans. My hon. Friend needs to be consulted, and I can assure him that we want to move forward and produce a scheme that meets the needs of the local community, particularly the needs of pedestrians in the area.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): The figures show how important it is that the White Paper brings about a real change of direction in transport policy. Is the Minister aware that local authorities have been given a deadline of 31 July to submit their transport plans for the coming year, yet they have not yet seen the White Paper and are unlikely to do so until very shortly before 31 July? Could they be given time to amend their plans, so that there can be a change of policy before the millennium rather than after it?

Dr. Strang: The hon. Gentleman raises a good point. I shall consider it and write to him. Local authorities already understand that the Government want a much greater emphasis on public transport and want policies that enable people to choose to use public transport rather than cars and, where appropriate, to walk or cycle. We have already announced those policies and are getting responses from local authorities. However, I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is my right hon. Friend aware that if he were to persuade the Treasury that by using congestion charging and motorway tolling directly hypothecated for transport schemes, he could give everybody in this country clean, safe and modern transport almost immediately? If he is not doing so, why not?

Dr. Strang: As always, my hon. Friend raises an important point. The White Paper will deal with the whole issue of charging, including tolling. We still have some years to go before we could put in place, with the necessary technology, a modern, advanced system of tolling that would be efficient and reliable and would not result in people being billed for journeys that they had not made.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Where hypothecation relates to local authorities, is the right hon. Gentleman aware of their despair at the Treasury's suggestion that those hypothecated sums be taken into consideration when determining revenue support grant, whether or not local authorities raise the hypothecated sums? If that is true, would not it be a clear example of the Government giving with one hand and taking away with the other?

Dr. Strang: The hon. Gentleman should not believe all the rumours that he reads about in the newspapers. Nevertheless, he raises an important point. If we were to give local authorities discretionary powers to introduce some form of charging, they would win popular support only if the bulk of the money were available for investment in local transport.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): May I draw to my right hon. Friend's attention the fact that the A650, which runs through Bingley main street in my constituency, is already one of the most congested A roads in the country? I welcome the Government's plans to reduce congestion—especially the focus on integrated public transport and other environmentally friendly measures—and ask him to consider the proposed Bingley relief road scheme as part of the roads review. What is his view of the Conservative Government's record of failing to deal with congestion and overloaded transport networks?

Dr. Strang: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the single-minded and effective way that he has campaigned for a Bingley relief road. How could we hold a roads review without giving it the deepest consideration? I assure him that we will consider it, and I will be announcing our decision shortly.

Roads Review

32. Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): When he plans to announce the results of the roads review. [47654]

The Minister of Transport (Dr. Gavin Strang): We will announce the outcome of the roads review following the publication of the integrated transport White Paper later this month.

Mrs. Lait: I am grateful to the Minister for saying that the results will be announced later this month. Can he confirm that the matter will come before the House before we rise for the summer recess, although it will be towards the end of our Session? No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will then confirm that there will be cuts in the roads programme—another broken Labour promise, despite the Government's assurance before the general election that they would provide a better network of roads in Britain.

Dr. Strang: If the hon. Lady will await publication of both the White Paper on integrated transport strategy and the report on the roads review—which will certainly be before the House rises—all her questions will be answered.

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): Will my hon. Friend, in considering the review, take on board the issue of land adjacent to major road developments, and the contribution that such land can make to the environment? In my constituency, the Rochester Way relief road is adjacent to attractive land that is next to a wildlife conservation area. However, repeated requests have been refused by his Department to make that adjacent land part of the wildlife conservation area. Will he consider the financial and environmental implications of allowing land tracts to be used in such a manner? That use may produce savings for his Department.

Dr. Strang: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that we want to take all reasonable opportunities to encourage biodiversity and to support improvement of the countryside and of general amenity. I am not aware of the position on the specific piece of land that he mentioned in his constituency, but I shall look into the matter and write to him about it.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Is the Minister aware of the very many jumbo lorries that travel each day from cities—such as London—and from Kent to my constituency, to dump domestic waste and other rubbish in landfill sites? Has he noticed the filthy verges that line the roadways because of that traffic? Does he agree that he could have a word with his friends in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and insist that towns, such as London, and parts of Kent, incinerate their own rubbish or else dump it in their own backyard?

Dr. Strang: The hon. Lady demonstrates the extent to which people's standards are—quite rightly—rising. They want a higher quality of life, and are much more critical of the type of pollution that she mentioned. Part of our policy has to be to integrate land use planning with our transport objectives. Part of achieving that objective is to reduce the need for the type of journeys that she described.

Integrated Transport

33. Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): What steps he is taking to promote local integrated public transport schemes between different operators. [47655]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): We will soon publish our White Paper on integrated transport policy, which will set out new strategies for delivering integration at the local level. Integrated public transport will be a key element in generating new transport choices for people.

Mr. Shaw: Is my hon. Friend aware that, on average, the bus speed in towns and cities is approximately 10 mph, and getting slower? She recently launched the Medway railbus service, in which the local authority brought together the train operator and bus operator to provide through-ticketing facilities for my constituents travelling to London. Does not that service set the type of excellent example that we hope will be repeated in the integrated transport policy?

Ms Jackson: My hon. Friend is entirely right. I was particularly pleased to be able to support initiatives such as the Medway railbus scheme. We welcome similar integrated-ticket initiatives, which have been introduced in Brighton, Oxford, Luton, the west midlands and the western region.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Given the interminable delays in making concrete proposals to deal with those issues, why should we take the Government seriously in their wish to address them? Surely the truth is as stated by Mr. John Mendelsohn—of a company called Lawson, Lucas, Mendelsohn—who said of the Prime Minister:

> "Tony is very anxious to be seen as green. Everything has to be couched in environmental language—even if it is slightly Orwellian".

Surely it is a case not of the green welly brigade but of the new green Orwellian storm-troopers?

Ms Jackson: As our White Paper will be the first such document for 20 years, I do not believe that it is asking the House too much to wait for a couple more weeks. As for the comments on whether the Prime Minister or the Government are green, we require no readings from the hon. Gentleman of mere gossip and allegation. The Government have made it abundantly clear that we have to formulate all our policies based on sustainable development and protection of our environment.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Will my hon. Friend join me in giving a cautious welcome to the City of London's proposals to charge a £3 levy for access to the square mile? Does she agree that it will provide a unique opportunity to try out road-pricing technologies, that it will ease congestion and provide the funding for better public transport, and therefore ensure quicker journeys for everyone while prioritising those journeys that make the most economic contribution to the community?

Ms Jackson: My hon. Friend will be aware that the idea of raising a dedicated income stream, to which my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport referred, from across the entire kingdom usually presented itself in two ways. One was congestion charging, and the other was a levy on private, non-residential parking, but always with the caveat that such moneys raised should be ring-fenced and directed to local authority transport schemes. As for what we have been reading in the newspapers about the alleged proposals by the City of London, it is my understanding that the introduction of any such scheme would require primary legislation.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My point of order concerns a written question to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury; I have given her notice of my intention to raise this matter. I asked her when she was first aware that Customs and Excise, for which she is responsible, had told her that it was launching an investigation into the affairs of Sandline and the alleged breach of the arms embargo to Sierra Leone. She recently answered the question by refusing to give the date, on the ground that an internal investigation is being conducted.

Page 302 of "Erskine May" explains that matters are sub judice only if they are before a court of law; matters that are the subject of administrative inquiry are specifically ruled out of being sub judice.

Relevant and allied to that is the fact that the Prime Minister has answered an identical question. He has given a date on which he was first made aware of the Customs and Excise inquiry into the allegations. The Prime Minister has answered the question, but a Treasury Minister refuses to do so on the spurious ground that the matter is the subject of an internal investigation. Will you confirm, Madam Speaker, that the Minister is in breach of the rules of the House by refusing to disclose the date of which she has knowledge, and that this is therefore a contempt of the House unless she supplies that information at an early date?

Madam Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is quite correct. The main business today is certainly not covered by the sub judice rule. Neither he nor the House would expect me to comment on the answers given by Ministers. Perhaps such questions could be put to members of the Government Front Bench in the course of the main business, but the most important thing is that today's debate is not covered by the sub judice rule.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your guidance on a point of ministerial accountability. There is a report in The Sun today—[Interruption.] It might not always be regarded as the most accurate record of our times, but it contains a report that suggests that a man who used to work for the Labour party—Mr. Derek Draper—was invited to and took part in a radio or television programme concerning a newspaper report, a programme in which no Minister was prepared to take part. From the studio, the man sought and obtained a briefing from the Prime Minister's policy unit. The policy unit is not the headquarters of the Labour party; it is funded from public funds. Is it right that such things should be allowed to proceed if a Minister refuses to take part?

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for me. I certainly have no intention of commenting on newspaper reports. I do not even comment on newspaper reports that relate to me.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Further to the point of order raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), Madam Speaker. My right hon. Friend sought to establish that a Treasury Minister was withholding information, against the precedents established by "Erskine May", and that the Minister in question should provide that information in reply to a parliamentary question that has been tabled. Will you instruct her to do so?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman and I and many right hon. and hon. Members will remember that some years ago, during an inquiry into other matters, information was not given during Question Time. I have already made it quite clear that answers to questions are not a matter for me. We have a full debate in the House today, in which those matters can be raised. No doubt Government Front Benchers will do their best to answer the questions of Opposition Members. I repeat that the matter is certainly not sub judice.

United Kingdom Passports

3.35 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision with respect to the form and appearance of United Kingdom passports.

The Bill would specifically require that the royal coat of arms be retained on the cover of the passports of British citizens. In 1981, an EU directive, which was implemented between 1989 and 1992, abolished the old blue hardback British passport and replaced it with the standard red EU format that retained the royal coat of arms on the front cover. Although there is a requirement that the style be similar and that passports are machine readable, there is no common EU passport agency and the issuing of passports remains the responsibility of individual countries.

The irony is that whereas the old-style passports were extremely difficult to forge, the new-style ones have proven very easy to forge. As a result, on 5 October this year a changed format will be introduced for British passports, much in line with the changes that have been implemented in Germany. The photograph, which is under the cover and under laminate, will be digitally produced and various items of information will appear on another page near the end of the passport. The data page will include digital security features with a bespoke watermark and perforations. The royal exhortation will continue for the time being, but the words "European Community" will change to "European Union".

At this juncture, the forthcoming changes do not introduce a full European Union passport or substitute the royal arms with the EU circle of stars. However, I have confirmed with the EU Commission that the treaty of Amsterdam opens the door to the introduction of EU passports in five years' time by qualified majority vote, or sooner by unanimous agreement. As the House will be aware, the EU symbol will soon be on the front of driving licences and, under the 1981 directive, the European Council can by unanimous vote replace the British coat of arms with the EU symbol. The Amsterdam treaty provides, on the proposal of the Commission and the majority vote of the Council, the ability in five years' time to introduce a common format with the EU circle of stars on the front of the passport and for a full EU passport. The Court of Justice will be responsible for cross-border issues and visas, but no Government in the EU could appeal to the court in this matter. Appeals will relate to individual cases.

We could all wake up in 2003 and find that we have been issued with EU passports with the circle of stars on the cover. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] The House should place a legal barrier in the way of that, and at least maintain the British royal coat of arms on the passports of British citizens. The EU is not a country or a state. Flags and coats of arms reflect shared national historic loyalties and identities. The cancellation of British passports without our citizens being consulted will mark the ending of such enduring loyalties.

The plans for European integration are intended to abolish separate country nationality in the EU, and to create a sense of EU loyalty, to replace the centuries-old symbols of our country and our nation. The EU has become desperate to arrogate to itself the trappings and symbols of the nation state, in a deliberate attempt to manipulate the way in which we think of ourselves. Are we British citizens? Are we subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, or are we EU citizens?

The royal exhortation in our passport, which already looks pretty pathetic as this little red job, states:

"Her Britannic Majesty's Secretary of State Requests and requires in the Name of Her Majesty all those whom it may concern to allow the bearer to pass freely".

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Some people may not mind such things passing. There is no legal barrier to that happening in five years' time. To me, it is not just the thin end of the wedge, but an issue on which it is worth drawing a line. I hope that the House will erect a constitutional barrier to prevent such a change without British citizens being consulted.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howard Flight, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Tim Loughton, Mr. Christopher Gill, Mr. Owen Paterson, Mr. William Cash, Dr. Julian Lewis, Mr. Nick Gibb, Mr. Andrew Robathan and Mrs. Angela Browning.

UNITED KINGDOM PASSPORTS

Mr. Howard Flight accordingly presented a Bill to make provision with respect to the form and appearance of United Kingdom passports: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 9 October, and to be printed [Bill 221].

Opposition Day

[16TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Select Committees (Information)

[Relevant documents: First Special Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, Session 1997–98, on Sierra Leone: Exchange of Correspondence with the Foreign Secretary, HC 760; Second Special Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, Session 1997-98, on Sierra Leone: Further Exchanges of Correspondence with the Foreign Secretary, HC 852.]

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.43 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): I beg to move,

That this House considers that it is wrong in principle for the Executive to seek unilaterally to impose prior conditions on the release of information properly sought by a Select Committee in pursuit of the responsibilities given to it by the House.

The words of the motion are, of course, those of the concluding paragraph of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee's second special report—perhaps the most important sentence of any Select Committee report in this Parliament.

Those words assert a general principle about the relationship between the House of Commons and the Executive—a relationship which is at the centre of our role as Members of Parliament. Although the motion was triggered by a specific incident, it does not refer to any particular Select Committee—or, indeed, to the Executive run by any particular party. It is a clear assertion of the rights of the House to hold the Executive to account.

My argument is, first, that the Select Committee is entitled to the support of the House in that assertion and, secondly, that in view of the change in the overall terms of trade between the House and the Executive, it is in the interest of the House to reassert itself on this issue to prevent any further erosion of its ability to hold the Executive to account.

Most Opposition days focus on disputes between Government and Opposition, but this one focuses on a dispute between Government and Parliament. The Foreign Affairs Select Committee is appointed by the House, and it operates under powers given to it by the House. I pay tribute to the work of that Select Committee, under the chairmanship of the widely respected hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). Indeed, I pay tribute to the work of other Select Committees, too.

I believe that that work has confirmed the reputation of Select Committees as one of the most effective instruments developed over the past 20 years for holding Governments to account. If the House were not to stand shoulder to shoulder with its Select Committee on this issue, that would damage the reputation and the credibility not just of this Select Committee but of all Select Committees. For that reason—

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: I want to make a bit more progress, after which I shall give way.

The motion is thus of interest to every Member who serves on a Select Committee, and to all Members who value the key role that they play in holding the Government to account.

Mr. Bennett: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why it was right for the Government regularly to give Select Committees information on a confidential basis throughout the previous Parliament, whereas it is no longer right to do so now? Is that not humbug?

Sir George Young: No, it is not humbug at all. There is no precedent for the issue that confronts the House this afternoon—no precedent whereby a Select Committee has come to the House and asked for its support in resolving a dispute with the Government.

The arguments for supporting the Select Committee are well set out in paragraph 3 of its second report.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: I shall give way in a moment, but first I should like to make more progress.

It is worth reminding the House that the Foreign Affairs Select Committee consists of seven Labour Members, including the Chairman, four Conservatives and one Liberal Democrat. The Committee has been carrying out an inquiry into Sierra Leone, in the course of which it has asked for certain documents from the Foreign Office—

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose—

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: No, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours) in a moment.

Mr. Illsley: On that very point?

Sir George Young: No, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Workington in a moment.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West) rose—

Sir George Young: The Select Committee is carrying out an investigation into Sierra Leone, in the course of which it has asked for certain documents from the Foreign Office and has asked a number of questions of witnesses.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir George Young: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Workington in a moment.

Key documents—

Mr. Ross: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Foreign Affairs Select Committee is not carrying out an investigation into Sierra Leone.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Sir George Young: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Key documents have not been handed over, and a number of questions have not been answered, on the grounds of what is called the "Legg defence"—that the parallel inquiry commissioned by the Foreign Secretary might be prejudiced by the prior release of documents and the answering of questions asked by the Select Committee. We need to be told today by the Leader of the House when Sir Thomas Legg plans to report.

The "High Noon" scenario—here I use the words of the Chairman of the Select Committee—has arisen because the Select Committee rejects the Legg defence as a matter of principle. As an aside, I add that the Foreign Secretary's assertion that prior release might prejudice Legg is an astonishing assertion in the light of his subsequent statement in his letter to the Chairman dated 30 June, in which he stated that "there was no ministerial conspiracy to breach the arms embargo. There was no connivance within Whitehall to breach the arms embargo".

Those are precisely the allegations that Sir Thomas Legg has been invited to investigate, which the Foreign Secretary himself has pre-empted.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) rose—

Sir George Young: I shall now give way to the hon. Member for Workington.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I understand that the documents can be provided in confidence to the Committee. I can recall repeated occasions throughout the previous five Parliaments when the Public Accounts Committee and the Defence Select Committee were given information on exactly the same basis. Even the Agriculture Committee was given information; the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton)—who is sitting behind the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young)—was on the Committee when it was given information on the same basis about BSE. Repeatedly, Select Committees have been subject over the years to exactly the same rules as set out in the latest communication to the Committee.

Sir George Young: There is no resolution of the dispute between the Select Committee and the Foreign Office on the issue of telegrams. One of the key issues is that of timing, and that is why the Select Committee has not resolved the issue with the Foreign Office.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: No, I want to make more progress. I will give way in a moment. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I will in a moment. I have just given way to the hon. Member for Workington.

The Select Committee goes on to make the fundamental point that "no area of Government expenditure, administration or policy can be 'ring-fenced' from parliamentary scrutiny by the establishment of a Government enquiry, however eminent are those conducting it."

That is the key point in answer to the hon. Member for Workington. That principle must be right.

I do not doubt the competence of Sir Thomas Legg. However, he is not a judge, his internal departmental inquiry has no legal or constitutional standing, it is meeting in private and we have no idea how it is being conducted and what questions are being asked of whom. It will report to the Foreign Secretary, who will then publish the report. If that principle of ring-fencing is conceded, any Government can stop any Select Committee investigating anything by the simple device of choosing their inquisitor and asking him to investigate. I have to say to the House that that is unacceptable.

Mr. Rowlands: There was indeed a dispute between the Committee and the Foreign Secretary because he was clearly placing conditions on access to information and on the question of timing. However, in his latest letter to the Committee, the Foreign Secretary makes it clear that no such condition will be placed on access to the information in confidence.

Sir George Young: The key issue is that of principle—of whether central Government can ring-fence an area of inquiry and say to a Select Committee, "Thou shalt not investigate this subject." That key issue is more important than the issue raised by the hon. Gentleman.

The Times on 1 July put the issue well:

"It is perfectly possible for the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Select Committee to shape an inquiry that complements rather than competes with the Legg investigation. The Foreign Secretary has stalled for long enough. He should start to co-operate fully with Parliament."

The case for the Select Committee has been strengthened since the publication of the report by the revelation that the territory fenced off for the inquiry could be extensive. The Press Association report of Sir John Kerr's recent appearance before the Select Committee reports him as saying:

"In order not to prejudice the inquiry, I have to fence off the area where the inquiry may roam. I do not know where it is roaming. The beast may roam wherever it wants"— precipitating, quite rightly, an intervention from the Chairman:

"Don't you believe the committee has rights?"

The reality behind all that is that the Government have made some errors of judgment. Their mishandling of the issue has meant that it has escalated from a dispute about sanctions busting into a constitutional confrontation between Parliament and the Executive. We have had abrasive—indeed, defiant—language from the Foreign Secretary, and a spectacular failure of diplomacy. If the Foreign Secretary cannot build a good working relationship with his hon. Friends on the Select Committee, what chance has he with the rest of the world? For this, I am afraid, the Government have no one else to blame. There is no conceivable argument that the spin doctors can deploy that pins the crisis on anyone but themselves.

Let me quote the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott). She said:

"When we have a Government with a majority of 179, it makes the role and rights of Select Committees absolutely crucial. It has always been understood that they have the right to call persons and papers. The Government is now saying that we can only have papers at the discretion of Ministers and that must be wrong and cuts across the intentions of the House in setting up Select Committees. This is now bigger than Sierra Leone. The Government has given the unfortunate impression that it is seeking to hide behind the Legg inquiry to avoid a wider public inquiry."

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): A moment ago, the right hon. Gentleman praised members of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. However, he may wish to issue a qualification about me because I voted against the insertion of paragraph 6 on the grounds that those persons being investigated by Sir Thomas Legg deserved to be given a fair hearing. I voted against that proposal—I have campaigned on this platform throughout—on the proviso that, as soon as the Legg report was published, the Foreign Secretary would appear before the Select Committee to be cross-examined on the report's findings and recommendations. I believe that it is far more appropriate and useful for a Select Committee to cross-examine a Minister about a report than to have a debate in this dear green place.

Sir George Young: I am not sure that I agree with the way in which the hon. Gentleman phrased the last part of his intervention. However, in making that concession, he has conceded that the Government can impose restrictions on what the Foreign Affairs Select Committee may investigate. That is not a concession which I am prepared to make.

While the Foreign Affairs Select Committee is having the most difficulty on this subject, it is not the only one. On 1 July, the Defence Select Committee published its sixth report on the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. Paragraph 13 of the report states:

"We are disappointed that Ministers felt unable to provide the DERA Corporate Plan to the Committee as requested, and we call upon Ministers, as we did in our evidence session in March, to clarify how 'advice to Ministers' ought to be construed and reconsider its application in this particular case. Access to such key documents is essential if a select committee is to have a meaningful and well-informed scrutiny role. Restrictions on such access can only undermine departmental accountability to Parliament, and should be used very sparingly."

The Defence Select Committee might be expected to be more belligerent than the Foreign Affairs Select Committee in seeking a solution.

Yesterday, when confronted with a different embarrassment, the Government's response was "give us the evidence." However, that is the call that the Select Committee has made in respect of today's debate. It would be unacceptable for a Select Committee to knock on the Government's front door, ask for information to which it is entitled and be refused, while those with close connections with the Government can allegedly get information through the back door to which they are not entitled.

The lack of respect that the Foreign Secretary has shown for the Select Committee's work has been compounded by the failure of the Leader of the House to find time to debate it. The Select Committee's request for a debate was not a normal request. It was not a case of a Select Committee making recommendations to Government, the Government responding to those recommendations and the Leader of the House being asked for time for a debate. We all understand the difficulty in finding time for debates. In this case, the Select Committee issued a special report about a deadlock that it had reached with the Government, and its conclusion was to ask the House for its views at an early date to resolve that deadlock.

Opposition Front Benchers have raised the matter at business questions no fewer than seven times: twice on 25 June, twice on 11 June, once on 4 June, and twice on 21 May. The requests were refused each time. My right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) also wrote to the Leader of the House on 21 May, making a total of eight requests for this debate. She was told in a reply of 1 June that the Leader of the House proposed to deal with the report in the usual way. The reply stated:

"As with all Select Committee reports, if a debate is considered appropriate, we will then decide whether Government time can be found for such a debate."

That decision sits uneasily with paragraph 26 of the document "Departmental Evidence and Response to Select Committees", which was last reprinted in January 1997. It says:

"The Government has given a commitment that where there is evidence of widespread general concern in the House regarding an alleged Ministerial refusal to divulge information to a Select Committee, it would seek to provide time for the House to express its view."

However, the Government turned a deaf ear to the Select Committee's request for support. The right hon. Lady did find time for a debate last night on freedom of information, and the introduction to that White Paper—

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the point about finding time for Select Committee debates when there is a problem with evidence, may I ask whether he recalls the debate that took place on 25 June 1979 when he voted against Select Committees' having the automatic right to demand time to debate such issues?

Sir George Young: We know that 1979 was the year in which the previous Government established Select Committees—a most important innovation in holding the Government to account. That innovation is under threat as a result of the actions of the Leader of the House.

The Leader of the House found time for a debate last night on freedom of information. The introduction to the White Paper, Cm 3818, began with the words:

"Unnecessary secrecy in Government leads to arrogance in governance and defective decision-making. The perception of excessive secrecy has become a corrosive influence in the decline of public confidence in Government".

Those words may come to haunt the Government.

The Opposition have made time for this debate because we believe that it is important enough to devote an entire Opposition day to it. We believe that the Select Committee deserves better treatment than it is receiving, and we also believe that in tonight's vote the Select Committee deserves support in the Lobby.

I turn briefly to the other half of my argument—that this issue encapsulates a broader one that has been simmering away for some time but has been brought to the boil since 1 May by a number of changes initiated by the new Government. Those changes have further eroded the institution of Parliament and tilted the terms of trade towards the Executive. Unless the House makes a stand, that erosion, which affects every one of us who is not in government, will continue. I refer briefly to those trends because I believe that we need to place the debate in a broader context.

I believe that we are moving towards a more presidential style of government, with a reduced role for Cabinet and for formal Cabinet sub-committees. We have seen the politicisation of the information service within government, as civil servants have been replaced by those sympathetic to the Labour party. We are threatened with an appointed second Chamber as an interim solution that may last indefinitely. We have seen more special advisers and an increasing tendency for Government decisions to appear in the press before they appear in the House. The convention on such matters is not an outdated relic. Its purpose is to ensure that changes in Government policy are subjected to critical and democratic scrutiny when they are announced.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I am trying to follow the right hon. Gentleman with great care. Is he not aware that when he talks about the abandonment of Cabinet government, some of us have the strange idea that he was a member of the Cabinet of Baroness Thatcher of somewhere or other?

Sir George Young: The hon. Lady is wrong. I was never in Baroness Thatcher's Cabinet. [Interruption.] The noble Lady and I got on very well—we got on so well that she twice appointed me to her Government.

I shall touch on one change that affects the ability of the House to hold the Executive to account. One of the most effective checks on the Government, as on previous ones, is opposition from within it. However, unparalleled steps are being taken to muzzle that independence, and that impacts directly on our debate today. The rules of the parliamentary Labour party impose a tight grip on the independence of Back Benchers. They state:

"Members shall consult the Chief Whip before tabling any Motion, Amendment or Prayer".

The standing orders continue:

"A reprimand may be given by the Chief Whip in writing, and reported . . . to the CLP of the member concerned."

The House is entitled to an assurance during today's debate that no Labour Member who supports the motion before the House will be disciplined under the PLP's standing orders. To discipline a Member for upholding the rights of the Commons against the Executive would be to undermine the very basis on which we serve in this place.

The media also have a role to play.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Before the right hon. Gentleman launches into strictures, may I point out that as one who voted against a three-line Whip on, for example, the Gulf war, I never received a reprimand? Would it not, however, be only polite and good manners to let a Chief Whip know what one was going to do? If one is to vote against a three-line Whip of one's party, is it not elementary good manners to let the Chief Whip know?

Sir George Young: The PLP rules go further than that. The hon. Gentleman should not table an amendment to a Bill going through the House without, first, touching base with the Whips. I think that that is an intrusion on the rights of Members.

The media also have a role to play in holding the Executive to account. Much of the information referred to in the motion is denied to the media as well. On 27 June, The Times showed that the media are finding their task harder, as the House finds its task harder. It said:

"Ministers shun BBC inquisitors for chats on sofa."

The Times tells us that a serious rift has opened up between the Government and the BBC over "invisible Ministers" who seem to have vanished from the airwaves. Broadcasters complain about senior Labour figures refusing to appear on serious television and radio shows with tough inquisitors such as Jeremy Paxman, John Humphrys and Nick Clarke. Set against the broader context of the Executive taking additional steps to get their way, the motion assumes greater significance.

The matter should be resolved by putting to one side the political divisions that take up so much of our time in the House, and by focusing on our common responsibilities as Members. That is why my party has announced a free vote, and we urge the Labour party to do the same, as some of its Back Benchers have requested.

To those Labour Members who have not yet decided how to vote, I say this: on 1 May last year, many voters decided that our democratic traditions might be harmed if the same party was returned for a fifth time. If the Government continue on their present path, the electorate will come to that conclusion after one term. The growing suspicion that the Government will stop at nothing to get their way would be confirmed if they used their large majority to crush the wishes of a Select Committee. Such a response would, paradoxically, be good for the Opposition and bad for the Government. But, because it would be a disaster for Parliament, I urge all hon. Members to vote for the Opposition motion.

4.5 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"reaffirms that, in accordance with the House's Resolution of 19th March 1997 and the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Second Edition, January 1997), Ministers should be as open as possible with Parliament; recalls that the House approved on 18th May 1998 the Government's commitment to an urgent outside investigation and publication of a full report of the Sierra Leone arms investigation; believes that nothing should be done to prejudice the conduct of that inquiry by premature public disclosure of parts of the evidence; and notes that the Foreign Secretary remains ready to make available to the Foreign Affairs Committee, on a confidential basis, the telegrams it has requested.".

I make it clear at the outset that there is one point on which I agree with the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young). Today's debate is about two separate issues. They are closely related, but it is right to define the two separate elements of the debate. The first, as the right hon. Gentleman said, is what principles should govern the release of papers by Government to a Select Committee. The second, as the right hon. Gentleman also said, is the specific example that is before the Foreign Affairs Committee at the moment. That is why I have tabled the amendment.

Originally, I was tempted simply to accept the Opposition's motion, despite the fact that it was based on a split report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, because it would be easy to argue that there is no difference between this Government and their predecessor on the question of what principles should govern the release of documents.

[Mrs. Ann Taylor]

However, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I thought it right to table the amendment, partly because we thought it right to reaffirm the motion that was passed in March 1997, and partly because the Opposition, during business questions last week, made it clear that the context in which they wanted the debate to take place was the Sierra Leone situation.

I want to give some background in terms of the principles that should govern the release of information by the Government to Select Committees. I start by reading the resolution that was passed in the House on 19 March 1997 without dissent, without a Division. That resolution states:

"Ministers should be as open as possible with Parliament, refusing to provide information only when disclosure would not be in the public interest, which should be decided in accordance with relevant statute and the Government's Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Second Edition, January 1997)".—[Official Report, 19 March 1997; Vol. 292, c. 1046-47.]

The motion, tabled by a Conservative Minister, was accepted unanimously by the House.

At paragraph 4.a), the code of access to Government information clearly refers to exempting information

"whose disclosure could prejudice the administration of justice (including fair trial), legal proceedings or the proceedings of any tribunal, public inquiry or other formal investigations (whether actual or likely) or whose disclosure is, has been, or is likely to be addressed in the context of such proceedings."

Paragraph 10 refers to information

"which is or will soon be published, or whose disclosure, where the material relates to a planned or potential announcement or publication, could cause harm".

The resolution in respect of the code of access to Government information drawn up by the previous Conservative Government was accepted unanimously by the House. Why? Every hon. Member knew that there was a need for limitations in some circumstances.

The Minister on whose advice the resolution was drawn up, Roger Freeman, described that day as historic, because Parliament was setting out for the first time what the relationship should be between the Executive and Parliament in terms of such information. As my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said, the previous Conservative Government denied information to Select Committees on many occasions, so this is not a new issue.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): My right hon. Friend is being too kind in her account of the history of this matter, because the resolution and the form of words were, in essence, the product of a Select Committee with which some of us had a connection. The form of words came forward because the history of the Scott inquiry was prefaced by the inability of the Trade and Industry Select Committee to be helped by the Government in its inquiry. The Committee was disabled in its investigations, which is an indictment of the previous Government. Even when the Scott inquiry reported, Conservative Members simply went into the Lobby in massed party support for defiance of that report. That is the history of the resolution and what really went on.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend is right to point out the background, and I had intended to mention the Scott inquiry. The Conservative Government also refused to answer parliamentary questions on matters that were covered by the partially public Scott inquiry, and many concerns were raised in the House and in that Select Committee at the time.

Information was refused to the House or to Select Committees not only in respect of the Scott inquiry, however. For example, the Defence Committee was refused by a Conservative Secretary of State copies of the defence costs study on naval stores and reports produced for the Ministry of Defence by outside consultants; the MOD refused the Defence Committee access to a report on the operational capability of medical services; the Conservative Government refused to allow the intelligence services to give formal evidence or informal briefings to the Foreign Affairs Committee on their work in combating proliferation of weapons of mass destruction; and a Conservative Secretary of State for Transport, the post once held by the right hon. Member for North–West Hampshire, was asked about channel tunnel rail link blight, but would not give information about internal departmental discussions.

I do not say that, on every single occasion, the Conservative Government were wrong to say that there were good reasons why information should not be given, but it is important to register the fact that all Governments have on occasion thought that there had to be a limit on the information given to Select Committees. I hardly need remind the House that, during the previous Parliament, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) resigned from the Front Bench following a Standards and Privileges Committee report on the improper pressure that was put on a Select Committee by a Whip. I hope that we will not have any lectures from the Conservative party on this matter.

On the specific case before the Foreign Affairs Committee, the right hon. Gentleman has outlined some of the chronology, and perhaps I can follow on from what he said. He mentioned the first special report, which I think was published on Thursday 22 May. That asked for the views of the House. The Committee was, of course, split in reaching that recommendation and, at business questions that day, I said that I would look at the issues. Subsequently, there was an exchange of correspondence between the Foreign Secretary and the Select Committee, and a second special Committee report was produced. I think that it was published on Thursday 25 June. At business questions that day, I undertook to discuss that report with the Foreign Secretary before making any decision on the Opposition's request for a debate.

Two other things happened at that time. The first was that the Foreign Secretary wrote to the Chairman of the Committee, following up suggestions that had come out of informal suggestions on a way forward. Secondly, on 1 July, the Opposition informed me that they had chosen this subject for debate today. Also around the same time, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee wrote to the Prime Minister following an exchange at Prime Minister's Questions the day before. That letter made it clear that "The Committee has not yet taken a collective view on the proposals set out in paragraph 3 of the Foreign Secretary's letter of 30th June."

Paragraph 3 of the Foreign Secretary's letter of 30 June said:

"You also know that I was willing to entertain your proposed compromise by which the telegrams could be made available to the Select Committee now, subject to an assurance of confidentiality until the Legg Report is published."

Later in that letter, the Foreign Secretary also offered to give evidence to the Select Committee if that was required. Subsequently, the Foreign Affairs Committee decided to invite the Foreign Secretary to give oral evidence on 14 July.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): May we make it absolutely clear, so that there can be no misunderstanding, what the suggested compromise was? It was that the documents should be made available after the Legg committee had reported. Indeed, that suggestion—[Interruption.] May I finish my remarks without interruption? I wish to make it clear that that was the position at that time. That was the compromise offered by the Chairman at that moment, but it was not accepted.

Mrs. Taylor: No. I think that the right hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. What the Foreign Secretary said was that the confidentiality of those telegrams should be respected until after the Legg report was published.

Mr. Illsley: May I explain to my right hon. Friend that the Foreign Affairs Committee was offered a compromise in respect of the telegrams as early as 21 May? Committee members were offered an opportunity to view those telegrams on the same basis as under the Pergau dam inquiry.

Mrs. Taylor: The more members of the Committee enlighten the House the better.

The current position is as follows: the Select Committee Chairman has proposed to his Committee a compromise, which the Foreign Secretary has accepted but on which the Foreign Affairs Committee has yet to reach a decision. The Foreign Secretary has offered to give evidence to the Foreign Affairs Committee again and the Committee is considering whether it will accept his offer of the date of 16 July.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I am sure that the Chairman of the Select Committee, if he catches your eye, Madam Speaker, will explain that the compromise that the right hon. Lady said he offered was quite different from the compromise referred to in the Foreign Secretary's letter. The Chairman's compromise was rejected by the Committee, whereas the compromise referred to by the Foreign Secretary and which the right hon. Lady has mentioned has yet to be put to the Committee.

Mrs. Taylor: I said that in a letter of 2 July to the Prime Minister, the Chairman of the Select Committee said that "the Committee has not yet taken a collective decision on the proposal set out in the third paragraph"

That refers to the third paragraph of the Foreign Secretary's letter, which I have just quoted.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): The right hon. Lady has referred to a number of letters. During our exchanges, reference has been made to a letter of today's date from the Foreign Secretary. Can any letters that the right hon. Lady is quoting from, or has seen, be placed in the Library before the end of the debate?

Mrs. Taylor: The letters to which I have referred have been written by the Foreign Secretary or by the Chairman of the Select Committee. The proper procedure is probably for the Chairman of the Select Committee to be responsible for any letters that he has written. The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) is very concerned that procedures should be followed, and I am sure that he would be quite stressed if we did not do so. From my point of view, there is no problem in releasing any copies of letters on this issue sent by the Foreign Secretary or any other Minister. However, the Chairman of the Select Committee should make such decisions on any letters over which he has rights.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The point that I am making to the right hon. Lady is simple. She is quoting from letters. She has obviously obtained those letters, and it would appear from what she has been saying that we have not seen all of them. I am merely asking for a simple, clear and unequivocal undertaking that anything that she has quoted from or referred to during her speech will be placed in the Library before the end of the debate.

Mrs. Taylor: I have said that I have no objection at all to every letter being placed in the Library or anywhere else. The Chairman of the Select Committee is entitled to give his view if he has a problem. I have not said anything that is particularly revealing. Most of what I have quoted is in the public domain.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The right hon. Lady has obtained the letters from somewhere. All I am asking is that we have the privilege of seeing the letters from which she is quoting.

Mrs. Taylor: I have already said that I have no objection to that—nor do my ministerial colleagues—but I do not want to trespass on the rights of the Select Committee. If the Chairman of the Select Committee were to catch your eye, Madam Speaker, he could tell us whether he wishes those letters to be made public. The hon. Member for South Staffordshire would be the first to remind me that I should not disclose those letters. I am saying that ministerial letters can be disclosed, but letters written by the Chairman of the Select Committee are not for me to disclose. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should calm down and clear this matter up.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): It may assist if I tell the House that the only letters that are not in the public domain—I believe that the letter of 30 June is—are a letter that I wrote to the Prime Minister shortly afterwards with enclosures, a letter from the Foreign Secretary to me of 6 July and the reply to that letter of 7 July. I should be happy for those to be made available to the House.

Mrs. Taylor: I am sure that that will be helpful to the House. I have not quoted from the last two letters to which my hon. Friend referred: I have quoted from the letters that are already in the public domain. Anything else is a matter for the Chairman of the Select Committee.

I was reminding the House of the current position. The Chairman of the Select Committee has proposed to the Committee a compromise that the Foreign Secretary has accepted, but on which the Committee is yet to reach a decision. The Foreign Secretary has offered to give evidence to the Select Committee again, and has suggested a date that is close to the date requested by the Committee.

Mr. Rowlands: I apologise for interrupting my right hon. Friend.

The closing words of the amendment state that

"the Foreign Secretary remains ready to make available to the Foreign Affairs Committee, on a confidential basis, the telegrams it has requested."

Will my right hon. Friend make it clear that that no longer refers, as it did originally, to the period post-Legg? That was the condition that caused the aggro and the argument between the Committee and the Foreign Secretary. If my right hon. Friend will confirm that the position has changed, I think that the point will have been made.

Mrs. Taylor: The position, clearly, is that the confidentiality of those telegrams must be respected until Legg has reported. That is what is important, and that is what we have made clear all along. Having established that that is the current position, I hardly think that it constitutes a crisis, or a clash, that cannot be resolved.

I remind the House that, following an Opposition day debate on 18 May, the House agreed a motion including the words

"That this House . . . congratulates the Government on its commitment to an urgent outside investigation and publication of a full report."

That was the Opposition day debate on Sierra Leone, during which the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee said:

"Perhaps it would be unwise"— of the Foreign Affairs Committee, that is—

"to attempt to duplicate or parallel the inquiry being conducted under the auspices of the Foreign Office, which will publish its report."—[Official Report, 18 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 621.]

Mr. Rowlands: I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend again, but I am trying to help the House. As my right hon. Friend said, no one has ever disputed the need for confidentiality before the publication of the Legg report: that has never been a subject of dispute between the Committee and the Foreign Secretary. The subject of the dispute was the fact that the Foreign Secretary was not willing to make the summary and telegrams available to the Committee, in confidence, before Legg reported. Does not the wording of the amendment make it clear that the conditional timetable that caused the row in the first place is no longer a matter of difference between us? Does it not make it clear that the Foreign Secretary will allow members of the Committee—under the arrangements that were made—to have access to the telegrams before Legg reports?

Mrs. Taylor: I have made that clear, but I must disagree with my hon. Friend. There was a dispute about whether that confidentiality should be respected on the part of some people—I do not say on the part of my hon. Friend.

Ms Abbott: As a member of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, I am not aware that there was ever any dispute about the confidentiality of the telegrams. The dispute was always about the conditions that the Foreign Secretary sought to attach to releasing the telegrams—conditions which the majority of Committee members from all parties found unacceptable.

Mrs. Taylor: Perhaps the Committee should have considered inviting the Foreign Secretary to talk directly to its members earlier. If it had, the problem would not have arisen. I think that the advice given by the Chairman of the Committee on 18 May was very wise.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Does the Leader of the House not recall the first Foreign Affairs Committee report—

Madam Speaker: Order. That is a matter of argument, not a point of order.

Mrs. Taylor: As I was saying, I think that the Committee and the House were wise to heed the advice given during that debate.

Mrs. Bottomley rose—

Mrs. Taylor: I am going to make progress now. I think it was wise of the Chairman to advise the Committee not to try to conduct a parallel inquiry, or to duplicate the work of the Legg inquiry. That is clearly what he said during the debate. It is, of course, entirely open to the Foreign Affairs Committee to follow up the matter in any way it wishes.

Mrs. Bottomley: Will the Leader of the House give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No. I recall how often the right hon. Lady gave way when she was in government. I was going to refer to a specific question that was raised by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire. That concerned the timing of the Legg inquiry. That is, of course, an independent inquiry, so it is up to Sir Thomas Legg to determine the timing, but he is well aware of the urgency of the matter, and we hope that his report will be available some time this month. However, the precise timing is up to him.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): If it is clear that members of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee can see the telegrams in question on the basis that they wish to see them, what is the purpose of this debate? It is resolved. We are wasting our time and I trust that, when my right hon. Friend has completed her speech, the Opposition will withdraw their motion. It is simply a waste of the time of the House of Commons.

Mrs. Taylor: The reason why we are having the debate is that the Opposition have to attack the style of the Government because they have no policies of their own.

Sir George Young: The reason why we are having a debate is that the Foreign Affairs Select Committee asked for one.

Mrs. Taylor: I look forward, then, to future Opposition day debates being determined by resolutions from Select Committees, and perhaps some of the other pressure that we are under to hold Select Committee debates on Wednesday mornings can be taken away because the Opposition are going to find time for them all. We are having the debate because the Tories have no policies and have not adjusted to the fact that they are in opposition.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No, I will not give way. I am moving to the conclusion of my speech. I think that we have heard enough from members of the Select Committee. I gave way to one person who was not on the Select Committee and I think that we got a clear view of what other hon. Members think about this debate.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire has a cheek in saying that this debate is about the balance of power between the Executive and Government. He was a member of a Government who allowed quangos to mushroom. The Tories packed the 40,000-plus appointments with their supporters. The concept of public accountability was completely undermined by the previous Government. The former Deputy Prime Minister told the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee:

"The paraphernalia of so-called public accountability is nothing better than a burcaucratic overhead".

In contrast, this Government have devolved power, opened quangos and started the process of local government renewal. We have published a White Paper on freedom of information, and improved accountability to Parliament.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire serves on the Modernisation Committee. His deputy used to serve on it. I do not think that this Government have acted arrogantly when they have sought to programme major Bills rather than guillotine them. We have made the proceedings of Parliament more transparent and comprehensible by revising the Order Paper and explanatory memorandums. We have taken decisions to publish Bills in draft form to allow pre-legislative scrutiny by Select Committees and extended scrutiny of European legislation to cover pillars two and three of the European Union and to allow pre-Council meetings, so that Ministers can talk to hon. Members about their objectives there.

We have given the Opposition many of the debates that they have asked for on the Floor of the House. We have taken the devolution Bills, the European convention on human rights and other Bills on the Floor of the House, which could have been split, as other hon. Members had requested, but we have been reasonable—some might say over-reasonable—in meeting the requests.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire asked me for a debate on Derbyshire local authority financing; we found time for that. He asked for a debate on lone parent regulations tonight; we found time for that. His predecessor asked for a debate on the health service; that is to be held on Thursday. They asked for a debate on NATO enlargement; that is to be held on Friday 17 July. Recently, we gave two days for the remaining stages of the Finance Bill, even though, in the event, the Opposition were not able to use those two days and we were having to use that time to best effect. Some people would say that I have been far too generous in accommodating the demands that have been made of me.

If the Government are at all arrogant, it is that we are arrogant enough to believe that we have a responsibility to deliver to the people of Britain the legislation and policies for which they voted. The Conservatives clearly find it extremely difficult to adjust to opposition. That is presumably why they sometimes break some of the conventions of the House and tell the press that they have applied for private notice questions. That never happened when we were in opposition. The Conservatives are so adrift that the shadow Chancellor has asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can receive the Government's press cuttings service on a daily basis because he is so bereft of any service of that kind.

The truth is that after 18 years of Tory centralisation, arrogance and contempt for Parliament, we now have a Government who are meeting their pledges and renewing the democratic process. The Conservative party simply cannot adjust to being in opposition.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I am afraid that there is substantial confusion between the two compromises. I must tell the Leader of the House that I hope that the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), will make it clear that the compromise put to the Committee is the one referred to in the Chairman's letter to the Prime Minister of 2 July. That letter states:

"The next day, in seeking to find a way out of the impasse, and entirely on my own initiative, I instructed the Clerk to send all Members of the Committee a possible package deal (copy enclosed) I had devised."

That is attached to the back of the Chairman's letter. Unfortunately—I am not suggesting that it was deliberate; it was entirely inadvertent—the Prime Minister at Prime Minister's Question Time last Wednesday and the Leader of the House at business questions on Thursday, claimed that the Select Committee had rejected a quite different compromise, which as I have said, has not yet been put to the Committee.

However, that is not the essence of the debate and the fundamental question before the House. That issue—I believe that there is only one—is whether the House accepts that accountability to it should be suspended during the period in which a Minister sets up a departmental inquiry; a departmental inquiry which does not raise the issue of the sub judice rule That is the key issue and, for reasons that I shall explain, it is not as yet wholly resolved.

[Sir John Stanley]

The House secures accountability through three separate channels of information. It does so on the Floor of the House with the ability of hon. Members to ask written and oral questions. It secures accountability in front of Select Committees by the power of the House to call for papers. It also secures accountability by Select Committees exercising their powers to require witnesses to answer their questions. Those are the three key channels of information that secure accountability to the House. Each of those three channels follows different rules, procedures and precedents, and it is important to separate each of them and to deal with them in turn.

It is worth reminding the House about the first channel—that of accountability through the answering of oral and written questions. It is perhaps surprising that, over the centuries through which the House has been performing its democratic function, it has never enshrined in resolutions reflected in "Erskine May" clear requirements on Ministers to answer oral or written questions put by hon. Members on the Floor of the House. I could find only one exception in "Erskine May", and that was the resolution passed by the House in 1962 at the time of the Profumo affair. The House clearly resolved that it was a grave contempt for a Minister, in answering questions, knowingly to lie to the House. Beyond that, there are no specific requirements on Ministers when answering questions to the House.

This is no party point, because I believe that the practice that has been followed by this Government is the same as that followed by previous Governments. It is easy for Ministers to decline to answer questions, to give insufficient answers to questions, or to block lines of questioning—which in turn means that the Table Office will accept no further questions on that subject.

Like many other hon. Members who tabled oral and written questions to the Foreign Secretary and other Ministers, I was frustrated to receive a reply couched in the Legg terms of reference, but I do not have any grounds for complaint because the House has not given me or any other Member a means of redress through a resolution that would place a clear requirement on Ministers to answer oral or written questions.

Against that background, the remaining two channels of information—and, therefore, accountability to the Select Committee system—are all important. First, there is the power to send for papers. This matter is clearly spelt out in the resolutions that set up the Foreign Affairs Committee and the other Select Committees. "Erskine May" makes it clear that the powers of individual Select Committees to send for papers are heavily qualified when they are internal departmental papers. Indeed, "Erskine May" refers to the Address procedure—which, ultimately, would have to be used if the House required a Minister to produce a given departmental paper.

Because this is such a grey area, the practice has been to conduct a negotiation in each and every case, and such a negotiation has been conducted by the Foreign Affairs Committee in this instance. However, I must say that although the Foreign Secretary has been perfectly within his rights, as laid down in "Erskine May", in taking up successive positions, he has been unwise to proceed in that way over the past several weeks. The reality is that the right hon. Gentleman has been steadily driven backwards to three different positions. His initial position, in responding to the Select Committee's requirement, was to refuse any access to the documents. Following the Select Committee's rejection of that, he moved to a second position, which was to offer the documents, but only after the Legg committee had reported. He has now moved to a third position; that of offering the Select Committee the documents subject to their remaining confidential. The Select Committee has still to reach a view on that offer.

This is a significant grey area. I am glad to see the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the Chairman of the Liaison Committee, in his place. The Liaison Committee would do a considerable service to all Select Committees and to the House if it examined the matter afresh. I appreciate that its final report at the end of the last Parliament referred to the powers of Select Committees to send for papers, but the issue is deserving of more detailed examination. I invite the right hon. Gentleman and his Committee to consider further whether clearer guidance might be given, through recommendations from the Liaison Committee, on the ambit of Select Committees' power to send for papers where those papers lie within Government Departments.

Mr. Illsley: The right hon. Gentleman referred to the three positions taken by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on the telegrams. Will he admit that by 2 June the Clerk to the Foreign Affairs Committee had advised all members of the Committee that the Foreign Secretary's offer went even further than the Pergau dam precedent?

Sir John Stanley: I understand that the Clerk did advise the Committee of that point, but it was for the Committee to decide whether that was acceptable—and, by a majority, it decided that it was not.

Mr. Rowlands: We are following the right hon. Gentleman's case with great interest. I have read Douglas Hurd's February 1994 letter to the Foreign Affairs Committee about the Pergau dam, in which he put two sets of papers beyond the reach of the Select Committee: any official advice to Ministers internally and any memorandum or minutes between Ministers. Those documents were not to be made available to Select Committees. I simply make that point for the completeness of the right hon. Gentleman's case and to add to his explanation of the current position.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. If the Liaison Committee carries out a further investigation into how the power to send for papers should be used by Select Committees, I am sure that it will want to look in detail at all previous precedents, including that of the Pergau dam.

The third channel of information, to which the Leader of the House did not refer in her response to my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), is the most important issue for the House and the debate. "Erskine May" is very clear about the powers of Select Committees to require witnesses to answer questions. I have already said that the channel of seeking answers to questions on the Floor of the House can be blocked by Ministers almost at will, without redress for hon. Members; the channel of sending for papers is still murky and unnavigable water; but the power of Select Committees to require witnesses to answer questions is at the heart of this debate. On page 109, "Erskine May" states:

"Witnesses . . . who have refused to answer questions . . . have been considered guilty of contempt."

On page 651, "Erskine May" states:

"However, committees, being extensions of the House, possess substantial powers to require answers to questions."

Footnote 1 is important. It states:

"These powers have been confirmed from time to time. In 1947 the House of Commons resolved 'that the refusal of a witness before a select committee to answer any question which may be put to him is a contempt of the House and an infraction of the undoubted right of this House to conduct any inquiry which may be necessary in the public interest'".

The key right of Select Committees is the right to require answers from those appearing in front of them as witnesses, whether they be Ministers, officials or anybody else. It is that right which is at the centre of this debate. It is that right which is threatened with encroachment—

Mr. Illsley: We are talking about the telegrams.

Sir John Stanley: I am referring not to Ministers' capacity to provide papers but to their answering questions as witnesses.

I was somewhat saddened to read that in his letter of 30 June, the Foreign Secretary refers to members of the Select Committee who prefer confrontation to a solution. I have to make it clear that the Foreign Affairs Committee is not engaged in a confrontation with the Foreign Secretary. The Foreign Secretary is engaged in a confrontation with the powers of the House, through the Select Committee system, to require witnesses to answer questions. That is the key issue.

In fairness to the Foreign Secretary, he has yet to appear on the matter before the Foreign Affairs Committee, although he has appeared several times at one remove through his permanent secretary, Sir John Kerr. In accordance with what is clearly stated in "Erskine May", the Committee is entitled to presume that an official who appears in front of a Select Committee is appearing on behalf of and under the instructions of the Minister in question. However, the House's powers in dealing with witnesses appearing before Select Committees will be determined when the Foreign Secretary comes before the Committee on Thursday 16 July.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the Foreign Secretary made the offer to appear before the Select Committee? Was it not at the Foreign Secretary's behest that he will appear before the Select Committee?

Sir John Stanley: I have to correct the hon. Gentleman. At its most recent meeting, the Committee decided to require Sir John Kerr to come for a further evidence session and then to send also for the Foreign Secretary. That decision was conveyed to the Foreign Secretary. I make it quite clear that I am not suggesting any unwillingness by the Foreign Secretary to appear. Nevertheless, I make the point that, at its last meeting, the Committee decided—I think unanimously—that the Foreign Secretary should appear before it.

On 16 July, when the Foreign Secretary appears before the Select Committee, it will remain to be seen whether he seeks to continue to refuse to answer questions asked of him in his capacity as a witness, on the ground that the Legg inquiry is sitting. I trust that he will not.

The one thing that can be said is that the confidentiality issue is a red herring. If the Foreign Secretary believes that the answers to the questions need to be given in private, the issue can be easily resolved. He can make that request to the Committee Chairman, who will undoubtedly give him an answer at the time.

The issue is whether the Foreign Secretary, whether in public or in a private hearing of the Foreign Affairs Committee, is or is not prepared to answer questions asked of him in his capacity as a witness before the Committee. I earnestly hope that he will. I particularly hope that the House will hold fast to what is probably the most important power of accountability it has—its unqualified right to secure answers from witnesses before Select Committees.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I adopt much of what the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) has said in this debate. He said that production of documents to Committees is a murky area, and suggested that the matter should be clarified by the Liaison Committee. I agree entirely with that suggestion.

The right hon. Member made some points on the contempt issue, which arose during the Committee's examination of Sir John Kerr, the permanent under-secretary at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. It is difficult to believe that the House would wish to pursue a senior civil service for contempt in such circumstances—basically on the grounds of principle and agent. As the right hon. Gentleman said, that problem is likely to arise, if at all, only when the Foreign Secretary appears before the Committee on 16 July.

By letter to me, of 6 July, the Foreign Secretary has already said:

"I will not be able, before the completion of the report, to disclose information on matters which may fall within Sir Thomas Legg's remit."

We may then be in a position of deciding to discuss that evidence in camera. We will have to wait until 14 or 16 July to decide the matter. In the same letter of 6 July, the Foreign Secretary agreed to come before the Committee, both pre-Legg and again after publication of the Legg report.

Ms Abbott: Has the Foreign Secretary explained to my hon. Friend why, in the first evidence-taking session, he will not be able to give evidence of matters that may be touched on by Legg? The Legg inquiry is not a judicial inquiry, and the matters covered by it are therefore not sub judice.

Mr. Anderson: There is a range of reasons why, on 16 July, the Committee may or may not decide to go into private session. The matter will be determined as a consequence of points made by the Foreign Secretary—for example, on highly sensitive personnel matters, or on other confidential matters that could cause any reasonable Committee to agree that it should consider evidence in private session. However, the Committee will have democratically to consider that matter first at our 14 July meeting.

I have on the board in my office a reproduction of a banner of the Penrhiwceiber miners lodge, in south Wales, which declares simply "Knowledge is power". Perhaps that says it all. A classic statement of the powers of the House was less succinct. It was in Redlich and Ilbert's "The Procedure of the House of Commons", which was published in 1908 and reproduced by Sir Richard Barlas in his memorandum to the first report of the Procedure Committee 1977–78 and holds:

"In the unlimited character of the claim for information, which may in principle be made at any time, there lies a fundamental parliamentary right of the highest importance; it is a right which, both constitutionally and practically is a condition precedent to all efficient parliamentary government."

Sir Richard, who was then the Clerk of the House, followed that quotation by observing:

"The powers both as exercised by the House and its Select Committees are, however, circumscribed by qualifications, apparent contradictions, and lack of opportunity to exercise the powers which undoubtedly exist."

Today's debate provides a rare parliamentary opportunity to examine the validity of certain qualifications that the Government have sought to impose on the supply of information.

I should like to offer several rather general reflections. First, our constitutional liberties were established only by struggles between government and Parliament. Those struggles reached a crisis point when the King wished to rely on the claim to divine right, which Parliament denied. I have always considered myself to be a roundhead, by both conviction and appearance. Although subsequent changes were less dramatic, they resulted—from precedent to precedent, effectively by case law—in the broadening of those liberties, as Parliament progressively extended its powers of control over the Executive.

Secondly, the tension or conflict between the Executive and legislature is both natural and inevitable, because Parliament and the Government have different objectives and perspectives. To ensure greater accountability and greater transparency, Parliament needs constantly to update the instruments that are available. With the 20th century explosion of information and expertise, Parliament itself has to become more expert and has to have greater access to information. The establishment of Select Committees in 1979 was a major institutional change to that end.

Thirdly, we may look with envy at the powers of the Committees of the United States Congress, but, as parliamentarians, we cannot realistically expect to transplant their experience to our country. The separation of powers in the US constitution and the looser concept of party mean that, in the US, the context and culture is fundamentally different. Our parties are more disciplined and our political culture more confrontational. It is not unknown for political leaders to change their perspective when moving from Government to Opposition, and vice versa. I recall the fulminations of a senior Conservative against what he termed elective dictatorship under the Labour Government of 1974–79, but that same senior Conservative was curiously silent when Baroness Thatcher abolished the Greater London Council and introduced the poll tax.

Mr. Winnick: Although I am all for Select Committees doing the work that they do—I am a member of a Select Committee myself—does my hon. Friend agree that the last thing we want is to emulate the United States? There, the Committees have all the power and authority, and the Senate itself hardly debates the issues. During the Vietnam war, it was the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, not the Senate, that debated the issue. I am not in favour of more power being taken from this Chamber.

Mr. Anderson: I hope that I made it absolutely clear that it would be wrong to seek to transplant the US experience to our own quite different culture—"advice and consent" and various constitutional powers available to the US Congress are not available to our Parliament. It is more difficult for Select Committees to have a non-partisan debate against the background of a highly charged partisan debate in the Chamber. Parliament has to make the Government accountable, yet all its Members are elected to oppose or sustain that same Government. Therein lies part of our dilemma.

Fourthly, the problems of accountability are particularly acute in the field of foreign affairs where events move speedily, and often in crisis. There is a culture of secrecy. This is often necessary because of on-going negotiations with foreign Governments, or because of the activities of the intelligence services. Traditionally in our country, the conduct of foreign relations is Executive led and, indeed, based on the Crown prerogative. Our own Foreign Affairs Committee is probably the least powerful of all the Foreign Affairs Committees of the European Union, and we look perhaps with envy at that of Denmark or, indeed, that of Austria with its Main Committee.

Fifthly, it is hardly surprising that some of the major problems of defining the murky area, to which the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling referred, have arisen in the relationship between the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. There are two main precedents. The first is to be found in the 1984–85 Session. In its inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the General Belgrano, the Foreign Affairs Committee sought various intelligence reports which were known colloquially as the "crown jewels". Eventually, the Government in that instance agreed to give the Committee access "under appropriate security conditions". The Committee visited the Ministry of Defence to read the documents but was not allowed to make notes.

The other major precedent occurred in the 1993–94 Session. In its Pergau inquiry, the Committee was refused access to certain communications between the British and Malaysian Governments, to communications between Ministers and to advice given to Ministers. As for intergovernmental documents—those between the Malaysian and UK Governments—the Committee did in fact receive non-classified summaries. To verify the accuracy of those summaries, certain members of the Committee were allowed to inspect the documents themselves. Summaries of other documents were supplied, and the Committee commented in its report:

"The information . . . requested was eventually provided under various arrangements", and it was later published as evidence.

Thus, the formal position is that the Foreign Affairs Committee cannot itself order the Foreign Secretary to produce papers. There are practical difficulties, both procedural and partisan, in exercising the powers available. It is significant that in the two key precedents—those involving the General Belgrano and the Pergau dam—the Committee was persuaded to agree a compromise with the Government, and a way was found around the difficulties.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): As I understand the current position, the Foreign Secretary has now allowed the equivalent of the arrangements that were made to examine confidential information which, in the case of the General Belgrano, involved the Ministry of Defence. I understand that he has made arrangements for the Committee to examine the telegrams that the Committee wants to see and to allow its members to make the necessary notes from them, which is in addition to what was granted in the Belgrano case. Therefore, the Committee has access to the documentation, and the Foreign Secretary has withdrawn the proviso that the information cannot be used before the Legg inquiry has reported. Is that correct?

Mr. Anderson: The dispute between the Foreign Secretary and the Committee has indeed moved on. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling set out the position. Originally, the dispute was on a fairly narrow but important constitutional point. The Foreign Secretary told the Committee that it could see the documents but only after the Legg inquiry, which he had appointed, had reported. He said that, until that time, any disclosure might in his view, and in that of Sir Thomas Legg, prejudice the inquiry. The Committee was not prepared to accept that condition.

Obviously, the Legg inquiry is likely to report very shortly, but it is conceivable that, at some future date, a Minister might appoint a similar person, or similar persons, to conduct an inquiry that might last several months or, indeed, years. It would be absurd to suggest to a parliamentary Committee that its inquiries should be stayed, pending the outcome of that inquiry. That is the narrow but important constitutional point on which the Committee has stood firm. Clearly, as is set out in the third paragraph of his letter to me of 30 June, the Foreign Secretary appears to have lifted that condition.

I want to emphasise the fact that the Committee stood firm. We decided as a Committee, dare I say, not to blink first. We have not blinked, and the position has moved on from that which prevailed at the time when the important sentence that forms the basis of the Opposition's motion was drafted and accepted by the Committee.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful that we have moved on as a Committee. We were offered a summary of the telegrams. If Committee members are given access to the telegrams before the publication of the Legg report, we will be better equipped to analyse the report itself. I remind my hon. Friend that the Committee has been divided all along on the reports. My position is clear. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary should be called to give evidence to the Select Committee following the publication of the Legg report so that we can cross-examine him and then the House should debate that report and the special report of our evidence session with the Foreign Secretary. That makes a hell of a lot better sense than simply having a debate. Every Select Committee Chairman, if he or she is honest, will agree with that.

Mr. Anderson: My hon. Friend is correct in both points. He has set out his own position clearly and emphasised that there has not been total consensus in the Select Committee.

Ms Abbott: As my hon. Friend will confirm, there has not been consensus, but there has always been a clear majority. Will he confirm that it has taken two months from 12 May, when we originally wrote to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary requesting the telegrams, for him to come forward yesterday with an unconditional offer of the sight of a summary of the telegrams? Does my hon. Friend agree that if we had not reported the matter to the House—not once but twice—it is unlikely that the Foreign Secretary would have made that concession?

Mr. Anderson: The offer was made in his letter of 30 June and it is fair to say that, both prior to that and subsequently, there have been on-going negotiations.

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I understand that it is a difficult issue, but there is a fundamental point of principle that matters to other Chairmen and members of Select Committees. The hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) has got it wrong. The fundamental issue is the access of the Select Committee to original papers. The right to interrogate the Foreign Secretary is also important, but it is not the issue in dispute. I wanted to be clear about the following point: are members of the Select Committee being given access to the telegrams, or simply to a summary of them? A summary, written by the people who may be culpable, is not the same as access to the telegrams.

Mr. Anderson: The position is summed up in the third paragraph of the letter of 6 July from the Foreign Secretary to me. It is a long letter, but the relevant paragraph reads as follows:

"In your letter you also refer to the proposed compromise by which a summary of the telegrams would be available to members of the Committee, subject to appropriate arrangements to ensure confidentiality, with two nominated members of the Committee able to visit the FCO to verify the accuracy of that summary by reference to the telegrams themselves. If the Committee accept this compromise, I will ask the responsible FCO officials to produce, as rapidly as possible, a summary."

So a summary is on offer.

Sir George Young: It is a very important letter, perhaps produced in response to today's debate. Will the hon. Gentleman make arrangements for right hon. and hon. Members who are interested to have a copy of it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Perhaps it would be helpful if I informed the House that various letters which have been referred to in the debate are available in the Library and will also be copied to the Vote Office.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I confirm that all the relevant correspondence is in the Vote Office? The Clerk to the Foreign Affairs Committee has arranged that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the House will be obliged to the Leader of the House.

Sir Peter Emery: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. How can a letter sent to the Foreign Affairs Committee and not yet considered by that Committee, about matters on which the Foreign Affairs Committee has not reached a conclusion and where the Foreign Affairs Committee has the absolute right to decide whether or not evidence presented to it is published, be revealed before the Foreign Affairs Committee has taken a decision to that effect?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That may be more in the nature of a question that might be pursued with the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee. However, a request was made during today's debate that relevant documents that were being quoted from should be made available and there has been a response to that request in order to facilitate the debate.

Mr. Anderson: I am in a no-win situation. My point throughout has been that if the Foreign Affairs Committee is making the case for accountability and transparency, it should set an example. I would be properly criticised by the House had I decided to withhold that important letter from the House. Therefore, as Chairman, I took the decision not only to make that letter available, but, last Friday, to insist that all the relevant transcripts—which would not normally have been available to the House yet—were provided for today's debate, hopefully by way of example. Had I not done so, I would properly have been subject to criticism.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): We just heard an intervention by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. That surprised me as the Government amendment clearly mentions that the telegrams are accessible. Had the right hon. Gentleman read the Order Paper, his intervention would have been unnecessary.

Mr. Illsley: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Anderson: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, who is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. Illsley: Will my hon. Friend make clear to the House that the compromise mentioned in the letter that has been circulated to Committee members today is the Chairman's own compromise and that the Foreign Secretary is responding to the compromise suggested by the Chairman of the Committee. The letter states: "In your letter"— that is the Chairman's letter—

"you also refer to the proposed compromise".

The compromise was proposed by the Chairman of the Committee and was available some 10 days ago. So the compromise was available days ago and the Foreign Affairs Committee refused to take it on.

Mr. Anderson: I would put this gloss and explanation on my hon. Friend's point: knowing that the two precedents—General Belgrano and Pergau—amounted to a compromise between the Executive and the legislature, or between the Government and the Foreign Affairs Committee, on my own initiative I sought to obtain a compromise and I asked the Select Committee for authority to go ahead with it. On Friday June 26, I instructed the Clerk to send the Committee my own proposal which was for a summary and confidential access. I suggested that the Foreign Secretary would send the summary of the telegrams to the Committee to be seen under secure conditions, but I coupled that with my own view that, not as a condition of the above, but in consequence, the Committee would agree to stay all further proceedings on or arising from the Sandline affair until after the publication of the Legg report. That was my proposed compromise.

It is fair to say that the Foreign Secretary has gone much further towards the Committee than my suggestion. He did so in the third paragraph of his letter of 30 June in that he did not put his proposal in the context of the Committee staying all further proceedings. That was confirmed in an exchange between my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) and Sir John Kerr, the permanent under-secretary, and further confirmed by the Foreign Secretary's letter of 6 July. So it is clear that the Foreign Secretary has gone rather further than the compromise that I originally suggested.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman and I realise that he is able to make only slow progress with his speech, but it is absolutely crucial that we understand this. The compromise that was referred to in the letter of 30 June was unacceptable to the Foreign Affairs Committee because it suggested that we could no longer pursue our inquiries into any matter relating to Sierra Leone. I believe that the hon. Gentleman is now telling the House that that condition is no longer applicable, and that the Foreign Secretary in his letter of 6 July is clear that no such condition applies to the arrangements for seeing the telegrams. If that is the case, it is a major step forward. The Foreign Secretary has backed down and I welcome it, but we must be clear about it.

Mr. Anderson: I agree that that is a major step forward, but my construction of paragraph 3 of the letter of 30 June is that the Foreign Secretary was not even then insisting that we do not carry matters forward until after the Legg report. Paragraph 3 states:

"You also know that I was willing to entertain your proposed compromise by which the telegrams could be made available to the Select Committee now, subject to an assurance of confidentiality until the Legg Report is published."

If there were any ambiguity in paragraph 3, that—as was said by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who is a valued member of the Committee—has been overtaken by the clarification. Any ambiguities have been removed by the Foreign Secretary's letter to me of 6 July.

It is right that Select Committees try to understand the legitimate interests of the Executive. Equally, Governments must understand the rights and privileges of the House. The Foreign Office should be as open and accountable as possible, but we must understand that there are matters, such as personnel matters or matters of prejudice to on-going negotiations, which, if explained to a Committee, a reasonable Committee would wholly accept.

I shall skate as speedily as I can over the remaining letters and the current problem as set out in our two special reports. The special report of 21 May that the Committee made to the House speaks for itself. The Committee had asked on 12 May that the Secretary of State provide copies of those telegrams. Again, the Foreign Office had been reminded by a further letter of the precedent of the "crown jewels". The Secretary of State had effectively at that time refused access, mentioning the Legg report.

The second special report of the Select Committee was dated 23 June. It included the letter of 1 June from the Secretary of State who, after meeting me, wrote that he was prepared now to follow the Pergau precedent, but only—this was the important condition, which proved offensive to the Committee—after the publication of the Legg report. After that, the Committee met and rejected the reason for delay. We gave as our reasons, first, that the documents would remain confidential with the Committee, and secondly, that it was wrong in principle that a Secretary of State should establish a Committee and then seek to shelter behind it as a means of refusing access to information.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Throughout the debate, there has been reference to Legg and the fact that potential disciplinary action should not be prejudiced. That is a dangerous precedent, because the same argument could be advanced in the case of any Select Committee. I shall postulate a hypothetical example to my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) and to the President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons. If Mr. Derek Draper's boss decided to hold an internal inquiry that could lead to disciplinary proceedings, would the Standards and Privileges Select Committee decline to investigate the matter until Mr. Derek Draper's boss had completed his investigations? I do not like discrimination in favour of Government. If we accept the argument that Legg can put everything on ice, it could be advanced by every employer in the country.

Mr. Anderson: I would say that the discrimination is in favour not of Government, but of individuals and the natural justice that allows an individual not to be pilloried without the opportunity to reply. The matter should not be imposed unilaterally by any Minister, but should be put to a Committee. If there were a sensitive personnel matter, a reasonable Committee would, I hope, agree.

In an attempt to make progress, I shall not quote paragraphs 5 and 6 of the second report, but it is true that one sentence has been drawn from paragraph 6 by the motion and not put in the original context. It is not a general request. In the context of paragraphs 5 and 6, the condition of waiting until Legg was the Committee's main concern.

Mr. David Davis: I apologise for intervening again. I understand the difficulty that the hon. Gentleman is facing, and I sympathise. May I extend the point made by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay)? We have in the House clear guidelines on sub judice matters, which apply to Select Committees, to protect the rights of individuals. They are limited to well-defined items from the criminal courts, courts martial, civil courts and tribunals set up under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921. Even so, the Speaker has the right to waive that sub judice protection. We are discussing an extension of that, on the say-so of any Government Minister, without limit. That is the danger to which we must face up.

Mr. Anderson: Not on the say-so of any Government Minister, and not without limits. If, in the circumstances of a particular case, a Committee could be persuaded that to go public might prejudice a particular individual in subsequent disciplinary proceedings, in my judgment a reasonable Committee might then conclude that it should respond positively. Those are the conditions that I would place on the matter.

I shall try to make progress. The key fact is that an offer was made on 30 June. I quoted the element in paragraph 3 of the Secretary of State's report. That same day, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) put the following question to Sir John Kerr:

"Am I right in interpreting paragraph 3 correctly, that the Foreign Secretary is willing to make the telegraphs available to the Committee right now subject only to an assurance of confidentiality until the Legg Report is published? Is that his position?"

Sir John Kerr replied:

"That is my understanding, yes."

I congratulate my hon. Friend on putting his finger on the key question.

The Committee has not yet reached a view on the further steps and on the welcome move made by the Foreign Secretary. When the Committee further considers the matter on Bastille day, 14 July, it will be my recommendation to the Committee that we accept the position now put to us by the Foreign Secretary.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for displaying his characteristic courtesy. With an appalling lack of modesty, may I remind him of the following question that I asked Sir John Kerr? I refer to paragraph 478 of the document, on page 38. I asked:

"Is the Foreign Secretary aware of the paramount importance of confidentiality attached by the House to unreported evidence and to the heavy penalties the House imposes on those who, if you like, transgress the rule of the House?"

Sir John Kerr answered, as my hon. Friend may recall:

"I cannot answer for him but I would have thought the chances are yes, indeed."

Mr. Anderson: I thank my hon. Friend. Perhaps the Foreign Secretary had not fully appreciated two matters—first, that the Committee can move into private session, and secondly, that if my right hon. Friend feared that a member or members of the Committee would leak any confidential information and cause prejudice, strong weapons are available to the House. There is the precedent, which my hon. Friend cited, of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) in about 1978, who was brought before the House because of such a leak. In my judgment, those two matters are important.

[Mr. Anderson]

The Secretary of State's new offer gives the Committee the substance of what it has requested from the start, and as I have said, I shall certainly recommend on 14 July that the Committee accept it. An offer was made on 6 July to meet the Committee on 16 July, before the publication of the Legg report, and again on 28 July, after publication, with a promise that if the Committee accepted the compromise in the Foreign Secretary's letter of 30 June, he would instruct his officials to prepare a summary as rapidly as possible.

I replied today, first accepting both offers of meetings, on 16 July and on 28 July—ad referendum, after discussion by the Committee, because we try to run a democratic Committee—and secondly, expressing the hope that if the Committee accepts the offer on 14 July, the relevant documents can be made available speedily.

In conclusion, I must speak about the motion, and my difficulties with it. First, the motion is expressed in absolute terms, when some qualification of the principle is clearly necessary. Paragraph 6 of the second special report, from which it has been lifted, must be read in the context of the preceding paragraph, paragraph 5.

Secondly, the motion has been overtaken by events. There are always dangers in proceeding from the particular to the general. The words that the motion takes from our second special report were originally used in the context of the idea that a Government should not set up its own inquiry and thereafter shelter behind that inquiry to prevent a Select Committee from having access to relevant documents.

The Committee has never sought to establish the principle that it has an unqualified right of access to all documents. That would be against precedent and reason—the precedents both of the Belgrano and of Pergau. It would also be against the principle that there must be circumstances in which Government and Parliament will agree that, for good reasons, documents will be withheld and may remain confidential.

In my judgment there is now within the grasp of the Foreign Affairs Committee the establishment of the principle that we sought to establish. We were determined not to blink first—a phrase that I have borrowed from my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay). I shall therefore recommend to the Committee that we accept the offer. Unfortunately, the Foreign Secretary chose not to make that offer immediately. Perhaps he had not fully appreciated the points about confidentiality, or about the weapons available to the House if Members breach that confidentiality.

That said, it is clear that the Foreign Secretary has moved, and that the Committee has not yet reached a collective view, so the motion has been overtaken by events. It is in any case too absolute in its claims.

Mr. Wells: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, especially as he is summing up; he has exercised what his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) described as his characteristic courtesy. There is one outstanding point that I hope that he will address—a point raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley). Is the Foreign Secretary prepared to come before the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, and if the Committee agrees to go into confidential mode, is he prepared, under confidence, to answer the Committee's questions relating to the inquiry that it is undertaking into the circumstances surrounding the supply of arms to Sierra Leone?

Mr. Anderson: That is an important question; we are dealing with a moving situation. I hope that when we reach the discussion with the Foreign Secretary on 16 July, my right hon. Friend will, indeed, speak fully and openly. If he says that there are some matters that are confidential, it will then be necessary for the Committee to decide, with the Foreign Secretary, whether it is appropriate to go into private session. However, we have not yet reached that position.

I hope that the House will now agree that if the Committee accepts the offer on the table, it will successfully have stood its ground, and this whole affair will be seen as an important precedent establishing the principle that we set out as important in our second special report—a principle that we have now established for the House.

5.34 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): This is a debate which, for a number of reasons, should not be happening. The first of those reasons is the 11th-hour climbdown by the Foreign Secretary. Had that happened a little earlier, I am sure that it would have satisfied the Foreign Affairs Committee, on which I serve, on the narrow point of the telegrams.

Secondly, it is regrettable that the debate is taking place in official Opposition time, because that suggests a political polarity about the issue which, on the evidence of our discussions in the Committee, should not be there.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we have repeatedly asked the Leader of the House to provide time? We accept that the present procedure is a regrettable alternative, but I do not think that we would have reached this stage had we not tabled the motion; certainly there would have been no debate.

Mr. Heath: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Of course he is right; the matter would not have come to the House. None the less, I still think that it is regrettable that it has done so in a context that means that it will be seen as a polarised issue, rather than, as it should be, as a matter for the consideration of all hon. Members in all parts of the House.

Mr. David Davis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: Yes, but for the last time in my introduction. I must get on to the substance of my speech.

Mr. Davis: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon for intervening so soon, but is he aware that I agree with him that it is unfortunate that we have had to hold the debate in Opposition time, because of the colour that it casts on the debate? However, the Government have not only failed to respond to those eight requests; they have ignored their own guidelines in the Osmotherley rules, under which the Government have given a commitment in the past that where there is evidence of widespread general concern in the House regarding alleged ministerial refusal to divulge information, they would seek to provide time for the House to debate that matter.

The last reason why we should not be having this debate is that the Government should not be in the position in which, as a result of their actions over recent weeks, they find themselves. The old cliché, "When you are in hole, stop digging," is appropriate, because the hole is entirely of the Foreign Secretary's making. Moreover, the depth of the hole is disproportionate to anything that may or may not be found at the bottom of it.

I do not understand why the Foreign Office and the Foreign Secretary have allowed the affair to progress in such a manner, to a point at which a major matter of principle is involved, although we started with a Select Committee simply doing its job in a straightforward way. That is strange, coming from the Foreign Secretary of all people. I have considerable respect for him, and I am disappointed in the line that he has chosen to take.

It is a misfortune that many hon. Members have focused so tightly on the issue of the telegrams, because there is a much wider issue—the fact that we have been given a blank refusal to answer a series of wider questions that we have sought to put to the permanent secretary and others. That is especially so, as the arguments adduced by the permanent secretary on behalf of the Foreign Secretary seem so inadequate.

As other hon. Members have said, the issue is not essentially about Sierra Leone but about the rights of a Committee of the House, and about the duty of the legislature to scrutinise the Executive. It is crucial that we do not give any future Minister the "get out of gaol free" card that says that simply setting up an internal inquiry is a sufficient reason for avoiding answering questions properly put by a Select Committee.

I must say, although in doing so I may lose the support of some hon. Members in this corner of the House, that I find it ironic that the motion should have been tabled by the Conservative party, with its record on arms to Iraq and the Scott report. It is not surprising that no quotation from the Scott report has been given so far in the debate; perhaps I can correct that imbalance. On page 503, paragraph D4.58 of volume 1 of the Scott report says:

"If, and to the extent that, the account given by a Minister to Parliament, whether in answering PQs, or in a debate, or to a Select Committee, withholds information on the matter under review, it is not a full account, and the obligation to account for what has happened, or for what is being done, has, prima facie, not been discharged. Without the provision of full information it is not possible for Parliament, or for that matter the public, to hold the executive fully to account. It follows, in my opinion, that the withholding of information by an accountable Minister should never be based on reasons of convenience or for the avoidance of political embarrassment and should always require special and strong justification."

Those are vital words in terms of this debate. We must ask what is the "special and strong justification" given by the Foreign Secretary in this case.

Mr. Ernie Ross: As a fellow member of the Select Committee, may I ask whether the hon. Gentleman thinks that this game could have been circumvented if the Committee had decided to carry out an investigation into whether arms were supplied to anyone in Sierra Leone, and if we had decided to send for the Secretary of State as the responsible Cabinet Minister? We could have confronted all this head on at the time. Would not that have been the best way forward?

Mr. Heath: That is an interesting suggestion. Had we done so on those terms, we would have been exactly duplicating the Legg inquiry—which the Committee has been at pains not to do.

That was the first objection from the Secretary of State—that the Committee was duplicating the work of the Legg inquiry. That is clearly not so. If the Committee had wanted to investigate the precise area that the Legg inquiry was put in place to look into, it would have summoned Tim Spicer of Sandline; it would have summoned Mr. Penfold, the high commissioner in Sierra Leone; it would have summoned John Flynn, the special adviser; it would have summoned Colonel Andrew Gale; and it would have summoned Rupert Bowen, the slightly shadowy figure who may or may not have something to do with MI6 activity in the area. Those are the people to whom we would have wished to talk if we were looking precisely at the issue of arms sales by Sandline or others in Sierra Leone.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I wish to add something to the list of people whom my hon. Friend suggested. I should like the Government to provide to the Defence Committee the cables and signals between HMS Cornwall and the Ministry of Defence during February. I should like the Government to state whether there were any direct communications from the Foreign Office to the high commissioner via HMS Cornwall while she was in the area during February. Some interesting answers may come from the signals sent to and from that ship.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend raises an important point—which we may wish to look at when we revisit the Legg inquiry following the publication of its report—concerning HMS Cornwall, as well as its predecessor, HMS Monmouth.

Mr. Illsley: The hon. Gentleman said that we did not want to duplicate the Legg inquiry and that had we done so, we would have called Mr. Spicer and the list of other characters. The Committee decided specifically against calling the persons to whom he has just referred. If we do not want to duplicate the Legg inquiry, why is there so much fuss about seeing the telegrams?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman makes exactly the point that I am trying to make. I have been critical in the Committee of the adventitious nature of the inquiry on which we seem to have embarked. We do not seem to have a clear focus, but sufficient problems have been raised by the evidence that we have received to be of proper concern to the Committee. We have heard self-contradictory and wholly inadequate evidence—as would be confirmed even by those who gave that evidence—on the part of Ministers and the permanent secretary. Some of the inadequacies have had to be corrected later.

There is at least prima facie evidence of two policies being pursued in Sierra Leone, one being the official Government policy, and the other—apparently without any knowledge of Ministers, whom I absolve of any responsibility—on the ground in Sierra Leone. That is worrying. There is prima facie evidence of inadequate communications within the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. There is prima facie evidence of a lack of focus in the arms sales controls that are in place.

Those are proper issues for the Select Committee to look into, which have nothing to do with the Legg inquiry. The second objection by the Foreign Secretary—that this is not the Committee's business and that it should be looking at other things—simply cannot be pursued. What I have just said is sufficient to debunk that suggestion.

Mr. Wells: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has given way a great deal. I know how difficult it is to keep the theme of one's speech going with constant interruptions. However, he made a statement just then that I would like clarified. Did he say that two policies could be pursued by the Foreign Office—one that the Minister knows about and for which the House could hold him responsible, and another pursued by officials which, if the Minister does not know about it, would be perfectly okay?

Mr. Heath: I am certainly not saying that it would be perfectly okay if officers of the Government—at whatever level—were to pursue a policy that was not known or supported by Ministers of the Crown. That would be quite improper. Nor am I suggesting that that has taken place. I am saying that there is evidence which might suggest that. If that is the case, it is the proper province of the Select Committee.

The third objection by the Secretary of State is that the Committee would somehow pre-empt the Legg inquiry by conducting any line of inquiry, putting any questions or coming to any conclusions. I find that hard to reconcile with the Foreign Secretary's letter to the Chairman of the Committee, dated 30 June, in which he says quite flatly:

> "There was no ministerial conspiracy to breach the arms embargo. There was no connivance within Whitehall to breach the arms embargo."

That would appear, at first sight, to rule out any grounds for an inquiry at all—unless it is read that "Whitehall" is important, in which case it may be that the Secretary of State feels that there are people within the Government service not based in Whitehall who may have connived. If interpreted in that way, that statement suggests to me a pre-emption of the Legg inquiry. That is dangerous ground for the Secretary of State, but I assure the House that I do not believe that any member of the Select Committee would wish to pre-empt the inquiry in that way.

The fourth objection has been dealt with by other hon. Members—that somehow it was improper to look into those areas because they were effectively sub judice. Legg, as has been pointed out, is not a judicial inquiry—it is an internal inquiry, carried out by someone with legal training, but who is, essentially, a civil servant. Although I have every confidence in his credentials for doing the job that he has been asked to do, he is nevertheless a mandarin looking into the activities of mandarins for mandarins. That is different from a Select Committee of the House looking at the same issue.

Even if one accepts the Secretary of State's assertion that the Legg inquiry has a legitimacy and that the Select Committee should not at this stage look into it, the fifth objection comes into play—that all the questions that we wish to put coincidentally happen to fall within the ambit of the Legg inquiry. In a glorious passage during his evidence to the Committee, the permanent secretary advanced the doctrine of the expanding reservation. He illustrated graphically how it could embrace almost any question that we chose to ask if he felt that Sir Thomas Legg might ask a question in the same general area. That cannot be a justification for not answering questions posed in a Select Committee meeting.

The inquiry's terms of reference are clear and clearly limited. The Foreign Secretary referred to them in that same letter when he mentioned the handling within the FCO of relations with Sandline. They are precisely the areas that the Committee does not wish to examine at this stage because we recognise that, if we were to do so, we would duplicate the work of the Legg inquiry. There is no justification for stating simply that one will not answer questions about matters that are within the proper province of the Committee.

The sixth objection—which I find rather insulting to the Foreign Affairs Committee, and to which the Chairman has already referred—is that we cannot be trusted to maintain confidentiality or to understand issues of national interest when disclosing information in telegrams. We are not Downing street lackeys or graduates of the Mandelson school for public relations men: we know where our responsibilities as Committee members lie. If we are entrusted with information that is confidential, we shall maintain that confidentiality in the national interest. We understand also that it is not appropriate to allow the verbatim release of telegrams that may have security connotations. That would be a gift to those who are not friendly to this country. We understand those things, and that is why we were prepared to find ways of not revealing confidences while continuing to do our work.

The Foreign Secretary has constructed a rampart against proper inquiry on the part of the Select Committee. A simple investigation of detail has been elevated into a matter of proper parliamentary principle. Civil servants and Ministers have performed lamentably, and I suspect that they have done lasting damage to their reputations. We have witnessed the refusal to answer questions, and obduracy in the face of reasonable questioning, which has served only to stiffen the Committee's resolve.

We have also had the off-stage noises. We have heard—the claims have not been substantiated—about the attempted bullying of Committee members. There has been quite extraordinary reportage in the past few days about the supposed motivation of Labour Members on the Committee. Such character assassination is wholly unacceptable. It suggests motivation that is different from their proper role as Committee members, and I have seen them perform that role with great dedication in the past year.

The Prime Minister's misleading statement to the House last week—it has been touched on this afternoon—regarding the position of the telegrams and our rejection of that position is compounded by the Government amendment on the Order Paper. No offer was made in the terms described without a conditionality attached that the Committee could not accept. In any case, the Committee did not accept or reject the offer because it was not put to the Committee.

We have witnessed some hon. Members attempting to politicise the issue and we have had the infelicitous use of archaic procedure in an attempt to stifle questioning in the Committee. The Leader of the House has apparently refused to bring not one, but two, special reports of the Committee before the House for discussion. This is an inglorious episode for a Government who take pride—or perhaps I should say refuge—in the rhetoric of open government. I believe that the Foreign Secretary's actions have been ill considered and, at times, intemperate. They are wholly out of true with his reputation for intelligence, principle and candour. He has piled the Ossa of obstruction on the Pelion of contempt for the Committee. Is it any surprise that the Foreign Secretary's actions have stimulated more questions and the issue has not been allowed to subside?

I believe that the Liberal Democrats are not alone in being extremely disappointed with the Government's behaviour on this issue. I suspect that some Labour Members share our disappointment and are embarrassed by the position in which the Government find themselves. There has been an attempt today at de-escalation and to accommodate the Committee on the subject of the telegrams. That is wholly welcome and I shall agree to that proposal in the Committee.

At the end of the day, we shall look back on this episode and see that Ministers have not been greatly at fault—if they have been at fault at all. I think that we shall find deficiencies in the workings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that we should examine. Most of all, we shall find that, through their actions in respect of their relationships with the Committee, Ministers have managed to escalate a small matter into a serious matter for the whole House. I hope that, when we come to vote, the parliamentary majority will not be used to stifle the proper views of the House regarding the rights of Committees.

I have great difficulty when hon. Members start talking about the high court of Parliament; I always check the spoons when that happens because it is normally a case of pomposity overriding common sense. Nevertheless, there are times when we must stress the paramount importance of the House and its Committees in holding the Executive to account. This is one such occasion. Before I conclude, I shall give way.

Mr. David Davis: The hon. Gentleman is as kind as ever. He has almost answered my question in drawing conclusions from the experience of his Select Committee. Is not the most important conclusion that no future Select Committee should be faced with a ministerial inquiry—let us be clear about it—that is apparently designed to fend off questioning from that Committee?

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I do not accept that the inquiry was established in order to fend off questioning from the Foreign Affairs Committee. I accept that the Foreign Secretary established the inquiry in good faith. However, it has been used to stifle debate—that is the key point. I return to my earlier point: no Minister should have a "get out of gaol free" card that says that, if there is something awkward down the track, an inquiry will be established, no questions will be asked, no Select Committee will be allowed to investigate and the House will be none the wiser about deficiencies in a Department or on the part of Ministers. That is unacceptable, and I invite the House to agree with that view when hon. Members vote this evening.

5.56 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I share the regret expressed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that it was decided to debate this subject on an Opposition day, which has overtones of parliamentary controversy based upon party. That is a great pity. I agree with the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), who opened the debate, that Select Committees are more important now as a result of the Government's majority. Select Committees are able to investigate matters that the House of Commons, which is overloaded on one side, cannot, and can hold the Government to account.

Apart from the six years that I spent at the Treasury, I have been a member or Chairman of a Select Committee for almost all of my parliamentary life. Even during my six years at the Treasury, I was an ex officio member of the Public Accounts Committee. The task of Select Committees has changed fundamentally: we do not realise the changes that have occurred over the years. Select Committees have grown in importance even since 1979 when the new form of Select Committees was introduced.

The task of Select Committees is not to copy or to pre-empt the sort of discussions and debates that take place in the House—there are plenty of opportunities to do that in the Chamber. Select Committees provide the opportunity to produce a report based upon proper investigation and repeat questioning of witnesses, which is not possible in the House. Everyone soon learns the tricks of being able to avoid even the most brilliant question, but one cannot do that when the question is asked again and again. That occurs frequently in Select Committees, and Ministers are called to give evidence again and again.

Those permanent secretaries who appear before the Public Accounts Committee know that, if Committee members have second thoughts about the issue several months hence, they will be brought back before the Committee for questioning. That kind of scrutiny is not possible anywhere else in our political system. There has been an extension of that over a period.

Where Select Committees are unanimous, they have enormous power. When a Committee is divided, it does not receive the same attention that it will receive when there is unanimity. I speak with some experience because, when I was the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, I had 550-odd reports, and every one was unanimous. That was not bogus or botched unanimity but genuine unanimity. As a result of that, we had enormous power. A Select Committee can have that power if it goes back to the matter again. Changes will take place that will even increase the power of a Select Committee because so much is dependent on Select Committees in this Parliament.

Good relations between the members of Select Committees are crucial. It saddens me greatly to see a Committee that is divided. It is important to establish trust between members of a Committee. I was a member of the Expenditure Committee that examined money supply back in 1979, when the then Government became addicted to money supply. I had a great deal of respect for Tim Eggar and I achieved a great deal of agreement with him. We did a deal. We agreed that there were certain nonsenses in monetarism and we produced a report that showed that there were deficiencies in monetarism. That went wholly against the then Government. However, there was respect among members of the Committee for one another.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) has taken this process much further. He has produced a sensible way of establishing seminars where Members discuss things among themselves. That creates confidence among people. We shall not deal with the big political issues. Of course, we cannot do that and we do not want to. We want to avoid them. However, in the limited areas in which Select Committees can operate, they should operate on a basis of trust. That trust was obviously not evident in the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. That was a great shame. It was a pity. If there had been the trust that I have described, it would not have been necessary to come to the House. Instead, the Select Committee would have come to the Liaison Committee. I had means of doing things and I was going to do them if we had not had a report. That would have been the right approach if there had been unanimity. Do not think that success will be achieved by weight of numbers in a vote. Success is achieved by agreements, and let us make those as strong as we might. That is the way to do it.

Developments have continued. I pay tribute again to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham, who introduced confirmatory hearings. I do not know how far that will go, but developments are taking place. Developments are possible in this Parliament partly because of its nature, and I approve of that wholly.

There were other ways of dealing with the matters that are before us. I shall tell a story about myself and the Al Yamamah contract, one of the most secret matters that ever came before the Public Accounts Committee. What did I do with it? The Committee had to investigate it, but I could see that there was a possibility of leaks. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) as well as to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that I have been a member of the Liaison Committee ever since it was set up back in 1983. There were leaks again, again and again, and I knew where most of them came from—from members of Committees. Let us not fool ourselves about that.

If we are to deal with highly secretive matters, we cannot entrust a Select Committee to deal with them. So how is it to be done? There are means of proceeding, and I adopted them in dealing with the Al Yamamah contract. I approached the then senior Conservative member of the PAC, Sir Michael Shaw—Lord Shaw as he now is—and we went into the matters surrounding the contract. I decided that we would meet in my Room. The two of us operated as a PAC. If there were matters that showed that somebody had made big commissions—there were one or two important people in the public news who were supposed to have made great fortunes out of the contract—and if I had found them, they would have gone straight back to the PAC, and we would have produced a report upon those matters. However, we did not do that. We found that there was no evidence of anything like that.

The National Audit Office does not have the power to follow public money wherever it goes. That is a power which I have argued for, and we are making some progress in that respect. However, we did not have such powers at the time of the Al Yamamah contract. Although we could have our suspicions, there was no proof of anything. I was able to produce a report that showed that there were certain things that had to remain strictly confidential, strictly secret. We acted in that way. I informed the PAC of what I had done, and its members had sufficient confidence in the two of us, myself and the then Sir Michael Shaw, to accept that. There were matters involving jobs, and there could have been great problems for the country.

There is a problem with sensitive matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East rightly referred to the Pergau dam. On that occasion, the permanent secretary came along with a note of dissent. Every permanent secretary has the right to produce such a note stating that he did not agree with the expenditure of certain moneys, in effect saying, "Please do not blame me when I come before the Public Accounts Committee." That is what the permanent secretary said, and we found out that he had written his note of dissent to the then Minister for Overseas Development, Lynda Chalker, Lady Chalker as she is now. She pointed out that she was overridden by the Foreign Secretary, Douglas Hurd. He pointed out that he was overridden by the Prime Minister.

At that point, the matter became too involved with foreign affairs for the Public Accounts Committee and so we passed it on to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. Incidentally, and most importantly, all notes of dissent now come automatically to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. That did not happen at the time I am talking about. That happened only if there was an inquiry and it was discovered that there was something wrong. It was only then that the note of dissent had any significance. Now it has significance at all times. The present Chairman of the PAC has probably by now had his initiation into notes of dissent.

Mr. David Davis: One or two.

Mr. Sheldon: In fact, they are not all that bad, which rather pleased me. However, that is another matter.

Other matters involved the Department of Trade and Industry—the export licensing matter—and arms to Iraq. These were matters of confidentiality. There is something similar in the matter that is before us. We could have a solution similar to that which was arrived at with the Al Yamamah contract, and there could not be anything much more secretive than that issue.

The Liaison Committee had its meeting, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East pointed out the problems and sought the assistance of my Committee. That was a sensible thing to do. We want greater political weight to show the Government, quite rightly, that those are important matters. We agreed that I should see my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and that there was the possibility of the Speaker becoming involved. If that failed, we agreed that possibly there would be a debate in the Chamber. As I have said, those are important matters. What I have set out is what I did. That was the solution I was going to put forward in dealing with the matter. We cannot rely on all those matters coming to a Select Committee.

I am not making any criticism of any member of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. I do not think that the present membership of that Select Committee is unique among all the Select Committees that I have known during my period of involvement. I should be very happy if it were. I cannot prove the matter either way. On the basis of experience, however, I would say that the course that has been taken is not the way to proceed. I was going to put my solution forward, but it was pre-empted by the debate, which I am rather sad about.

I had hoped for a solution similar to the one to which I have referred. The aim of a Select Committee is to maintain confidentiality where it is necessary, and I believe that I found one way to ensure that confidentiality. I look forward to its being used, perhaps, in similar circumstances whenever such a matter may arise in future. If a Government refused to co-operate—I would be surprised—the proper avenue is through the Liaison Committee, getting the support of the Chairman. That will enable us to go further into the issue.

Mr. Mackinlay: Given my right hon. Friend's experience and in view of what he has said, in future, putting aside the specific matter that is before us, would it not be a good idea if the Legg type of appointment were the property of the Select Committee, just as the parliamentary ombudsman reports to a Select Committee? Somebody like Sir Thomas Legg could do the initial groundwork for a report to a Select Committee, rather than there being an appointment made of a person answerable to the Executive branch of Government.

Mr. Sheldon: I should not like to make a comment on that particular case.

I finish with a quotation from volume 1 of the Liaison Committee's first report of 18 February 1997. Sir Terence Higgins, now Lord Higgins, produced the report, and paragraph 8 on the powers to summon persons, papers and records, said:

"When the Departmental Select Committee was established . . . it was acknowledged that committees' general powers to send for persons, papers and records did not extend to ordering the attendance of Ministers nor to the production of specific Government papers."

It refers to certain undertakings and finishes by saying

"These undertakings have been amplified in the intervening period."

They have continued to be amplified and they will continue to be amplified. The important aspect of this debate is to show that there is much progress yet to be made, and I look forward to seeing it.

6.10 pm

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me. I have come from Copenhagen and the parliamentary assembly of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe and I must return immediately I sit down. Therefore, I apologise to the two Front-Bench spokesmen for the fact that I shall not be here when they reply.

First, I want to clear up one matter which I raised with the Leader of the House, and on which she suggested that I was not accurate. It has been referred to, but, in my own defence, I must make it absolutely clear. I said that the aspect of the agreement that might be a compromise, that was not accepted by the Foreign Affairs Committee, was set out in the note summarising the Chairman's position as put to the Foreign Secretary. It states:

"For its part"—

the Committee's part—

"not as a condition of the above but in consequence, the Committee would agree to stay all further proceedings on or arising from the Sandline affair until after the publication of the Legg Report."

It was that which was not accepted by the Select Committee. It is important that that should be made absolutely clear.

The Foreign Secretary, in his letter of 30 June, said:

"You also know that I was willing to entertain your proposed compromise".

That was the compromise of the Chairman of the Select Committee, which the Select Committee had rejected. That needs to be made absolutely clear at the start.

I follow the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), for whom I have great respect. He is obviously correct to say that Select Committees have the greatest authority when they are unanimous. There is no doubt about that. For 14 years, as Chairman of the Procedure Committee, I was able to make every one of our reports unanimous and they had some effect—not as much I should like, but some effect indeed.

The difficulty in the Foreign Affairs Committee is something with which the right hon. Gentleman never had to deal as the Chairman of various Committees, and that is the Foreign Secretary's complete arrogance in dealing with the Committee's requests. The Committee wanted papers. The Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary had said quite openly that they had nothing to hide. According to the Prime Minister, it was all hoo-hah. We then asked for the telegrams from Sierra Leone and the notes and minutes of the five members of the Foreign Office who had met Sandline's officials during the period. If those had been produced and there was nothing to hide, the whole matter would have finished. It would have stopped. The Government would have been proved correct. When they were not produced, when those requests were not met, is it surprising that immediately people asked, "Why, what is there to hide? Why won't you produce the documents?"

Mr. Kilfoyle: Given the comment made earlier by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) when he said, "The Foreign Secretary was perfectly within his rights in the position that he has taken", is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting now that the basis of his support for the Opposition's motion is a value judgment based on what he describes as the Foreign Secretary's arrogance?

Sir Peter Emery: Of course that is not right. Let me use an example that I did not intend to use. The Foreign Secretary wrote to the Committee on 30 June. The Committee had not had that letter before the spin doctors outside the Committee were telling the world what was in it. I remind the Minister that that was incorrect because it was entirely contrary to the proceedings set out in

[Sir Peter Emery]

"Departmental Evidence and Response to Select Committees", the second document of the "Ministerial Code" which is signed by the Prime Minister himself, in which it says:

"Once information has been supplied to a Committee it becomes 'evidence' and, subject to any agreement with the Committee on the non-publication of protectively marked information . . . it is entirely up to the Committee whether or not to publish it and report it".

It may be well said that a letter is not evidence. Paragraph 107(b) states:

"A Memorandum by a Department to the Committee, or a letter from a Minister to the Chairman may be a more readily applicable form of response . . . Unlike a Command Paper, such responses are, formally, further evidence to the Committee and are therefore subject to the usual conventions on submitted evidence".

Therefore, there was arrogance from the Foreign Secretary and the Foreign Office in the way in which they treated the Committee in the publication of that letter before the Committee had even had it. That is pretty arrogant in anybody's book, and I think it necessary to point it out.

The Committee is concerned not simply with an inquiry about Sandline, but with the operation of the Foreign Office—its responsibility to Ministers and the responsibility of Ministers to its civil servants. Who knew what and when with regard to arms to Sierra Leone? If Ministers knew, why did they not say that they knew, and, if they did not, why not?

I have pursued a line of questioning about the reference of Sandline to the Customs and Excise Committee set up to investigate the export of arms in breach of British regulations. I asked how many times the United Nations arms embargo and British law had been broken. When I asked the Foreign Secretary that in a debate, he said it was about 200. That was misleading. It was entirely incorrect. When, three weeks later, we nailed the response, there had been only three, one of which was Sandline.

Do we really believe that, with an ethical foreign policy, the breach of the United Nations' regulation and British law on the export of arms is so unimportant not to be referred to Ministers? I have been a parliamentary private secretary in the Foreign Office. I have great regard for the working of the Foreign Office, but I find it nearly unbelievable that something of that nature, which was brought about on 18 February, is supposedly not seen by the Foreign Secretary until the end of April or the beginning of May. I said in questioning that I found it unbelievable that that had not been referred to Ministers. It was an Exocet in a Red Box. It was likely to cause parliamentary questions to be asked—indeed, it was likely to cause an inquiry—and here we are debating it. Is the Foreign Office really so inefficient that those matters were not referred to Ministers? If that is the case, something has to be done about it; if it is not, there are great worries. Parliament has a right to investigate the matter and carry it further to make certain that we can put our finger on where the problems are.

Everyone is suggesting that we have the correct solution because we have forced the Foreign Secretary finally to give way on our request to see documents—under security prospects, as we have always agreed—but he has given way only so far. In his letter of 6 July, which is now in the public domain, but which I did not have until I came into the Chamber this afternoon, he says:

"I will not be able, before the completion of the report, to disclose information on matters which may fall within Sir Thomas Legg's remit."

The Foreign Secretary is still saying, "The blazes with Parliament; my report and my investigation should take precedence over the work of the Select Committee." I believe that that is wrong, and the House should condemn it. No Secretary of State should have the right to appoint a committee so that he can say to any Select Committee, "I am not going to answer your questions on that matter until the committee has reported." That is what is being said.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) shakes his head, but the Foreign Secretary has said that he "will not be able, before the completion of the report, to disclose information on matters which may fall within Sir Thomas Legg's remit."

That is plain enough, and the permanent secretary, with great embarrassment, has had to shelter behind the fact that he could not answer ordinary questions needing only a truthful answer because he had been instructed by Ministers not so to do. I shall give way, very briefly, to the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde.

Dr. Godman: I promise that I shall be brief; the right hon. Gentleman sounds like my old sergeant major.

I am willing to wait for Legg, on the understanding that we cross-examine my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on the text of the report and its findings. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Foreign Secretary agreed in his letter to appear before the Select Committee on Tuesday 28 July. He says:

"At that point, assuming that Sir Thomas Legg's report has been published, I will be in a position to respond in full to questions from the Committee."

As a member of that Committee, I shall hold him to that promise.

Sir Peter Emery: The hon. Gentleman's point is fair and definite. He has always held the view that it was quite all right for the Select Committee to wait until after the Legg inquiry to cross-examine. My point, which has also been made by several members of the Committee, is that I do not believe that the setting up of an inquiry such as Legg's should be allowed to stop a Select Committee putting questions to the permanent secretary, who sheltered behind the Legg inquiry, or to Ministers and the Foreign Secretary, who has said in his letter that he "will not be able, before the completion of the report, to disclose information on matters" which might concern Legg.

Legg is only a civil servant. What right has that committee to be thought greater than a Select Committee of the House? I put that to the permanent secretary at the Foreign Office, asking, "Do you consider that the Legg inquiry or your answers should take precedence over a Select Committee of the House?" For once, he gave a truthful answer—"No, I don't,"—and then he hid behind Legg for the remainder of his answers. That is what we are complaining about, and that is what we find wrong.

The way in which the Foreign Secretary has approached this matter has been arrogant, and we have not seen that from other Ministers; I think that he should resign. His behaviour has been quite incorrect, and the idea that he will be able to talk fairly about an ethical foreign policy when he has been so damned unethical with the Foreign Affairs Committee makes me laugh. He should go, and his resignation should be with the Prime Minister before the end of the debate.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): I am a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee; I have listened to some interesting contributions to the debate, and I am sure that there will be many more.

Dr. Godman: Not many.

Mr. Ross: They will be very interesting.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) said that the Foreign Affairs Committee was conducting an inquiry into Sierra Leone. Some of us had great difficulty following him from that point: the fact is that we are not—and never have been—conducting such an investigation. As far as I am concerned, that is the main problem, although I shall come to other problems in a moment.

It must be made clear, so that no one is in any doubt, that there is no record, in any minutes, of the Foreign Affairs Committee deciding to inquire into the actions surrounding what has happened in respect of Sierra Leone.

Ms Abbott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, because he is anxious to make progress, but is not it pedantic to say that we are not conducting an inquiry into Sierra Leone? On more than one occasion, the Committee has questioned civil servants about Ministers in respect of events concerning Sierra Leone—as it is quite entitled to do as part of its general remit. Is not my hon. Friend's insistence that we are not officially conducting an inquiry rather pedantic?

Mr. Ross: I shall come to the reason why I believe that we were not confronted with a decision to conduct an inquiry. As my hon. Friend knows, I think that we have been involved in a game; she has been at most of the meetings where we have discussed the matter, and I have put that position forward. That game is being played in the Chamber tonight, which is why what I have said is important, not pedantic. Either we are carrying out an inquiry or we are not, and we are not.

We are trying to investigate a human rights report and the moral foreign policy that the Government have said that they intend to implement, but we cannot get on with that because we are being sidelined on issues that may or may not relate to the Sierra Leone problem.

We are not carrying out an inquiry because members of the Committee cannot agree what to do; as my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said, that is the problem. Some members of the Committee want to conduct an inquiry into the whole issue of Sierra Leone; some support a parallel inquiry and believe that that would be the best way to proceed, although it may not be possible to proceed; and others believe that the best way forward is to wait until Legg reports and then have an inquiry with the Foreign Secretary answering, when we have the advantage of having the report in our hands.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) has already posed the question, but why are we not investigating the actions of Her Majesty's Government and their agents in the coup in Sierra Leone, subsequent actions in the area and at the United Nations, and the Government's determination to restore through democratic means the rightful, elected Government of President Kabbah?

The other suggestion that has been dragged across the debate, and which has been put to me by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), is that we are not seeking to replicate the Legg inquiry. I accept that that has probably been his position throughout. However, every Committee member knows that, even on the narrow line of questioning that some hon. Members allege they wish to pursue, some would deliberately stray into the domain of the Legg report. They would intentionally cause conflict to gain party political points rather than to gain knowledge. That is what is happening in the Select Committee.

Mr. Wells: I do not quite follow the hon. Gentleman. If the Committee is not conducting an inquiry into Sierra Leone, why did it ask to see the confidential telegrams between the high commissioner and the Foreign Office? Was the Committee's decision to ask for those documents unanimous or was there a divided vote?

Mr. Ross: In almost all its discussions on Sierra Leone, the Committee has been divided. There has not been one issue on which we have been united. There has sometimes been a minority of one, but never absolute unanimity.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Before my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) intervened, the hon. Gentleman referred obliquely to the hon. Members for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) as though they were Conservative party stooges. He may disagree with their judgment, but to accuse them of that is, to put it mildly, a travesty of the truth.

Mr. Ross: That is the hon. Gentleman's interpretation. I shall explain why I think my hon. Friends have taken the wrong position—I put it no higher than that—when we have discussed the matter. It is on the record that I have disagreed with them, but I have never suggested what the hon. Gentleman said. I do not intend to repeat his words because I do not agree with them.

I wish to explain why we are in this position. The reason that I shall give applies to at least one of my hon. Friends—I cannot speak for both of them. Some members of the Foreign Affairs Committee are playing party politics. I do not object to that, but I recognise it when I am confronted by it. The presence of the Opposition spokesperson on foreign affairs at our Committee proceedings tells me that there is a party political position on this issue. The publication of that person's evidence on the same day as the Select Committee was holding its press conference tells me that party politics are being played on this issue. The fact that the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) announced at the same press conference that he had booked Committee Room 6 to hold his own press conference tells me, as a politician, that party politics are being played. The right hon. Member may disagree with me, but that is how it appears to me.

Sir John Stanley: I booked another Committee Room in anticipation of other Committee members wishing to stop me responding to questions from the press. My anticipation was proved wholly correct.

Mr. Ross: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for confirming what I said. Party politics are being played one way or another, and we are all trying to cover that up with great concern for the work of Select Committees. We are playing party politics.

I do not object to playing party politics—I spent 18 years in opposition and understand why the Conservative party is doing that—but I do object to being asked to believe that we were not engaged in a political game. Under no circumstances am I prepared to accept that.

When I objected to a line of questioning that the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling wanted to pursue, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire accused me in the House—admittedly he had the good grace to tell me that he intended to raise the matter—of invoking a procedure that had not been used since 1937–38. That was considered a great offence against both Select Committees and the House. When I tried to raise a point of order earlier today, the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), who unfortunately has now left the Chamber, referred to the matter again from a sedentary position.

I want to make it clear to the House that the procedure was not last used 60 years ago. A note by the Clerk of the House says:

"Following events in the Committee last week, there has been a certain amount of comment in the House and in the media to the effect that the procedure of objecting to a question has not been used since Session 1937–38.

The reference in Erskine May is indeed to that case. However, the procedure has been invoked on at least one occasion since then. That was on 25 July 1989 in the Select Committee on Members' Interests, when Sir William Shelton"— who I believe was a member of the Government at that time—

"objected to a question put by Mr D N Campbell-Savours. On that occasion, the question concerned was subsequently withdrawn."

Thus, I was not using outdated, 60-year-old procedure but simply following on from a Conservative Member. I take it that now that I have advised the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire of the evidence supplied by the Clerk, he and other hon. Members will withdraw the accusation that I was seeking to introduce obscure procedures into the business of the House.

I hope that when the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling raises the issue with the Procedure Committee, as he claimed he would, he will refer to the incident when his then right hon. Friend used the procedure against my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Mr. Illsley: For the information of the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley), the issue of objecting during Select Committee proceedings was the first item on the agenda of the Procedure Committee's meeting this evening.

Mr. Ross: I wonder whether the Procedure Committee was told of the correction.

Sir John Stanley: I can inform the hon. Gentleman that when the Chairman of the Procedure Committee responded to my reference to the objection procedure, he made it clear to the Committee that one further precedent had been found in 1989. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have already advised the Foreign Affairs Committee that my accusation that the procedure had not been used for 60 years was made after I had checked not once but twice with the House authorities. I apologised to the hon. Gentleman for the fact that, when I made that public, I was not aware of the 1989 precedent. I am happy to repeat that apology to him.

Mr. Ross: Obviously, I am prepared to accept that apology and I am glad that the Procedure Committee has been made aware of that tonight.

Why have we got ourselves into this position? One has only to read the special reports produced by the Select Committee to see that, despite the fact that we are not carrying out an inquiry but simply requesting information here and there—so there is no real coherence—my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has gradually moved towards assisting the Committee. However, because of the political game going on in the Committee, which is preventing us from getting on with our work, my right hon. Friend's assistance has been rejected. In some cases, it has been rejected almost out of hand.

When the Chairman proposed a compromise, even before we reached the Committee most of the Committee members had said that they would not be prepared to accept the Chairman's compromise. That has been the Chairman's problem: when he has looked for compromises, a particular part of the Committee has not been prepared to make them.

Dr. Godman: May I correct my hon. Friend? He said that members of the Select Committee objected to the compromise proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). I sent the Chairman several amendments, one of which was that three members of the Committee should go to the Foreign Office to examine the telegrams to verify the accuracy of the summary. It was Conservative Members and our two hon. Friends who objected. I did not object to the compromise: I sought to amend it.

Mr. Ross: I absolve my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) completely. His position has been absolutely clear: he wants the Committee to be able to start an inquiry into the actions surrounding the coup in Sierra Leone and the restoration of the democratically elected Government. He has been constrained by the political game that is going on inside the Committee.

I want to put on the record the fact that the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has made gradual efforts to accommodate the Committee, but they have been rejected on every occasion. I only hope that when the Committee meets on 14 July, the offer that he made in his letter of 6 July will be accepted.

Why have we got ourselves into this position? In the private sittings of the Committee, I have described it as the obsessional loop syndrome. Some hon. Members on the Committee—including some of my hon. Friends—are in this obsessional loop. This obsession is the result of 18 years of Conservative Governments, who have set out to—I shall not use the term "corrupt" political life—

Dr. Godman: They diminished it.

Mr. Ross: They have certainly diminished political life, and have come as near as possible to corrupting it. People have begun to lose faith in politicians. We have only to look at the actions of Conservative Members: the Pergau dam incident, the Scott inquiry into arms for Iraq, the activities of the former MP for Tatton, the inquiries that I carried out as a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee into the actions of members of the Conservative Government, the Jonathan Aitken affair and the Ian Greer incident. Those events have diminished political life, and have led to people losing faith in Governments. When Governments seek to tell the truth, they are faced with the obsessional view that they must be trying to hide something. A number of members of the Committee have got themselves into this obsessional loop and no longer believe that Governments can be honest and upfront.

I object to the fact that the Committee has not been allowed to get on with the work that it should be getting on with: there are several outstanding reports that we want to get on to, but cannot. We have just visited three areas of the world as part of our human rights inquiry. We have not even managed to discuss those visits. That is an item on our agenda, but we cannot get to it because of the activities of some hon. Members in this obsessional loop. They think that the Government are hiding information or are taking action that, in fact, they are not taking.

An entry clearance inquiry was conducted more than a year ago, but it has still not reported to the House. It involved concerns expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House about relatives of their constituents who are trying to get visas in Islamabad and Delhi. That report has not been published, because we cannot get round to discussing it. We have an outstanding report on Hong Kong which cannot be published, because we cannot get round to discussing it. We have a human rights report which we hope to put before the House. It is the responsibility of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs to give our colleagues a view of the report on human rights published by the Foreign Secretary, but we have not done that either because of this obsessional loop.

Mr. Illsley: Is it not ironic that the one issue on which we shall not produce a report is Sierra Leone?

Mr. Ross: Absolutely. That is because we are not carrying out an inquiry. We are in a Catch-22 situation of the worst kind.

We have a public expenditure report pending. We have examined the departmental report obliquely, and we do not know whether we will be able to raise serious concerns about Foreign Office funding. We do not know whether we shall issue a report, and we cannot get round to discussing the matter because of this obsessional loop.

We have just visited three different areas of the world as part of our human rights inquiry. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde, and I were in Kuwait on the morning following the announcement by the special ambassador Richard Holbrooke about the two-month rolling programme. The Iraqi regime has been of serious concern to the House. Provided that they comply with the United Nations inquiry, the sanctions may be eased or lifted. We met the committee dealing with the prisoners of war and those missing in Kuwait.

When we came back, I suggested at our first meeting that we should raise with the Foreign Secretary the concerns that we had picked up on our trip. No sooner had I finished speaking than the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling pooh-poohed the idea. He dismissed the issue as not very important. He suggested that hon. Members should go on their own and speak to the Foreign Secretary informally. Three members of the Select Committee had visited Kuwait, had received evidence from the committee that represents prisoners and had information useful to the Foreign Secretary and to the Foreign Office, yet we could do nothing about it because of our Committee's obsession with the possibility that there may be something hidden in these telegrams.

Dr. Godman: The Committee could be in a powerful position in this deeply disquieting affair—which is how I have described it several times—if we were to conduct a comprehensive inquiry into the Sierra Leone issue following the publication of the Legg report.

Mr. Ross: I could not agree more. We are supposed to be a Committee that matters and is taken seriously. We are not being taken seriously because we have got ourselves into this obsessional loop. This party political game is being played out for who knows what reason. We are not doing the job for which the House gave us responsibility. We are supposed to monitor the activities of the Foreign Office, but we are not doing that as we should. The sooner this debate is over and the sooner we get back to doing the job we were given, the better it will be for the House and for the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A serious matter has been brought to my attention regarding Select Committees. I am a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation. Last Wednesday, a report was given by the Committee to the House on the manner in which the preliminary draft budget of the European Union should be debated. It had previously been thought that it would be appropriate for it to go to European Standing Committee B. I am informed that that Standing Committee will sit tomorrow, irrespective of the Select Committee's advice that this matter is so important that it should be debated on the Floor of the House.

The issue is directly relevant to the matter we are discussing now, because it is about the importance that should be given to Select Committees. The Modernisation Committee has virtually agreed that if the Select Committee on European Legislation recommends that a matter should be debated on the Floor of the House, that is what should happen. I should be grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if you would be good enough to refer this matter to Madam Speaker, and to ensure that it is treated in the appropriate fashion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): That is not a matter for the Chair, and not a matter which I should necessarily refer to Madam Speaker. No doubt Front-Bench Members have heard the points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

6.49 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): I am sure the House is relieved to know that the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) is not in an obsessional loop, and has no political agenda on the Select Committee.

I speak with great modesty. Unlike the Chairman of the Liaison Committee and virtually every other member of our Committee—apart from the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath)—I have almost no experience of Select Committee life, having been a Minister for 10 years. For our purposes today, therefore, I am very much a poacher turned gamekeeper. However, I strongly endorse the view that the role of the Select Committee is as important now as it ever was.

Many of us have been appalled by the way in which the rules of engagement have been shifted by this new Labour Government, who have adopted an extraordinary approach to diminishing the role of Parliament. The Prime Minister announced that he would no longer arrive for Prime Minister's Question Time more than once a week, and that there would be no proper debate. Government information officers have been dismissed on an unprecedented scale. The Prime Minister's chief information officer apparently thinks it legitimate for him, as a civil servant, to attack the Opposition—something which, when many of us were in government, would have been considered shocking, and would not have been countenanced for a moment.

All that makes it all the more important, when there is an opportunity to scrutinise the actions of Government, for the Select Committee to hold strongly to its principles, rights and duties.

Today, there is a further debate on cash for access. That is becoming understandable to colleagues who find that delegations are refused, that there is no real attempt to answer questions seriously in the House, and that—without there being a blush—the number of planted questions has reached a level that could never have been anticipated. As for the many other ways in which Ministers believed that they were accountable to Parliament—although, of course, Governments always try to give a good gloss on what they are doing, and to make life easier for themselves—the rules have changed beyond recognition.

I believe that, although Whips' bleepers can penetrate even Committee Rooms, it is in Select Committees that progress and accountability are increasingly being demonstrated when the Whips are offside and not exercising their thumbscrews. The Agriculture Committee, the Public Administration Committee and the Standards and Privileges Committee are all beginning to make inroads, and to hold an over-mighty Government—they had a spectacular election success—to account.

I was concerned when the Leader of the House—whose job is to protect the rights of the House, and to protect Back Benchers—would not take an intervention from me. I took that badly. The right hon. Lady subsequently accepted interventions from the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and, indeed, from my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young); but she did not take an intervention from me. When I spoke from the Government Front Bench, my colleagues used to criticise me at length for accepting so many interventions, especially from Opposition Members.

Mr. Wells: Particularly from Whips.

Mrs. Bottomley: Indeed. I took the view that it was right to respond to as many interventions as was reasonably possible, but the Leader of the House simply would not take my intervention.

What I wanted to do was remind the Leader of the House of the Foreign Affairs Committee's outrage at the fact that it was so difficult to find time to meet the Foreign Secretary in our first session in order to prepare our report on Europe. That ties in with what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). The House authorities bounced through the parliamentary debate on the matter, so that it was not possible for our report to be considered properly. We raised the issue with the right hon. Lady on several occasions, but I am afraid that today she did not add glory to her position, or deal with my concern about her willingness to be open and frank with the House and to protect our interests.

The whole point about the Government's amendment is that they imply that the situation has not changed. The Leader of the House said that she had not seen the letter that the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee says that he has made available more widely, and which he gave permission to be raised in the debate.

Every time the Committee considers this question, it becomes curiouser and curiouser. It is right for the Committee to wish to examine not just the expenditure, but the policy and administration of the Foreign Office. When a Foreign Secretary proclaims an ethical foreign policy and heralds it in a self-advertising way, and evidence then emerges that begins to suggest that a United Nations arms embargo in Sierra Leone was breached, any self-respecting Select Committee will begin to ask questions about the gap between rhetoric and reality. That is our duty to the House.

As for administration, we have had a catalogue of discussions about what was in the box, what was not in the box, who had read what briefing, whether the briefing was there and whether the briefing was not there. Let me offer the Government some advice which—although this may seem presumptuous—they may accept, because it comes from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). He said:

"Doing your box is something that you have to do, because no one else can do it for you . . . If you send it back unmarked every document that you fail to sign or at least tick will relentlessly turn up again."

We have heard suggestions that Foreign Office Ministers do not now mark papers as having been read. It is difficult. The right hon. Gentleman continued:

"You will make mistakes, some of them serious. But it is better to make your own mistakes than someone else's . . . do your work and do it systematically."

Every debate that we have had on the Sierra Leone saga has suggested the most extraordinary state of affairs, in which it is impossible to know which Minister, which civil servant and which official has or has not done whatever. I have no doubt that, if our job is to scrutinise the Foreign Office's expenditure, administration and policy, we are complying with our duties. I have made clear my belief that this is a time when our duties are more serious than ever before. We have heard repeatedly from commentators. Peter Hennessy spoke of a Napoleonic style of government; Hugo Young, in today's Guardian, spoke of a Government who have doubled expenditure on special advisers compared with when we were in government. Our job as a Select Committee is to hold Departments to account. Government must answer to Parliament, and Select Committees seem to be the means by which that can be achieved.

Like others, I am sorry that Opposition time has had to be used for today's vital debate; but, undoubtedly, it is the debate which has produced a concession from the Foreign Secretary that suggests that we can now begin to make progress. We were obliged to take the opportunity, as all Select Committees will be the stronger for it. I hope that, at last, this Government, with their mighty majority, will begin to realise that their accountability is not through spin doctors and media manipulation—rather like that of a soviet Government of the past—but directly to Parliament. That is what matters, and the debate will help the process.

Mr. Donald Anderson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It might assist the House, following the speech of the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), if I say that, following the undertakings that were given earlier to the House by the Leader of the House and by me, the bundle of relevant letters is available to hon. Members in the Vote Office.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard what the hon. Gentleman has said.

6.59 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): This is not so much a debate as a conversation. Few hon. Members are present. I regret that because this debate—this evening's conversation—raises several important issues and allows us to canvass what should be done in relation to the Foreign Affairs Committee and its current discussions with the Foreign Secretary on Sierra Leone and in relation to Select Committees generally and how circumstances comparable with these can be avoided during the life of this Parliament. I realise that this is a general debate, but it is a pity that a representative from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, or the parliamentary private secretaries, are not present.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I am sure that my hon. Friend would want to acknowledge the fact that the parliamentary private secretary to the Foreign Secretary has sat through most of the debate, as has the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), who came before the Select Committee.

Mr. Mackinlay: I acknowledge that. I am just saying that someone from the team should have been present throughout the debate. I do not want to labour that point, but it is not an unreasonable one to make.

Frankly, the vote tonight is one of the rubrics of Parliament. It is the arguments that matter. If one can win the argument, that is important and I am not too exercised by tonight's vote. Therefore, the Chief Whip will be relieved to know, I shall dutifully follow him into the Division Lobby.

While I mention the Chief Whip, there is another important point to make that I hope he will think is positive. A lot of mythology has grown around Whips generally and around this issue in particular. Many weeks ago, the Government Chief Whip, on his own initiative—I appreciated what he said to me—told me, "I assure you that, under my stewardship, we will not fall into the same chasm as the Conservatives did in respect of the Willetts matter."

I wanted to put this on the record. The Whips Office has certainly never approached me about this matter; I think that that should be clearly understood. On occasions, I have had differences with my colleagues in the Whips Office and it would be unhealthy if that were ever to stop. None the less, in this respect, I want to put the record straight.

I do not want to delay the House too much, but there was a lot of speculation at the weekend in two Sunday newspapers that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) and I had been put on the Committee so that there would be overzealous scrutiny of the Foreign Secretary—as distinct from the selection of members of the Treasury Committee, who were alleged to be favourably disposed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Again, I am certain that that spin was wholly unattributable to and unauthorised by anyone in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, but it needs to be stated that it was complete and utter rubbish. In fact, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, who is replying for the Government this evening, can testify to that.

Incidentally, I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary is a long time at the Dispatch Box—not just this evening, but throughout this Parliament. He certainly deserved that appointment. When there was a vacancy for the Labour party leadership, he twice tried to persuade me to nominate my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). I declined. He will remember that one of the reasons I declined was that I was trying to persuade my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) to agree to be nominated.

I had three conversations with my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston, urging him to stand for the Labour party leadership. I wish he had taken my advice on that occasion, just as I wish he would take my advice on some of the matters before the House tonight. I tell that story because it is a matter of fact that I admire the Foreign Secretary. I wish him well. He has done much in his period in office—for example, in relation to the human rights initiative. He is unjustifiably criticised for not being quick enough on some policies he has initiated. Much has been done and that should be pointed out. However, we can be the Foreign Secretary's good friend, but we must be Parliament's first. That is what some of us who have a strong view about the role of Select Committees have put at the forefront of our approach to the Sierra Leone issue.

I have always felt that bipartisanship in Select Committees is important. It is right, in one sense, to say the Committee has been split on this issue, but one can also positively say that it has been bipartisan because members from the Government side have been prepared to take a view that is not ideal or comfortable for the Government. We have said that, on the way in which we look at the facts and circumstances, we should vote with members of other political parties.

I say to all hon. Members that it would be sad if party division were rigidly applied in Select Committees. Indeed, we would be starting on the slippery slope to eroding the efficacy not just of the Foreign Affairs Committee, but of other Select Committees. Bipartisanship is important. It is a matter of consistency for me. In my maiden speech, given on the first day Parliament sat after the 1992 general election, I referred to the importance of Select Committees. I criticised the then Government and Opposition for being tardy in setting up Select Committees after that election. Not just the existence of Select Committees, but the need for them increasingly to improve their status and effectiveness, regardless of who is in office, is paramount to me.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend has been making the point about bipartisanship in the Select Committee. Because of the way in which the press reported our last divisions, I should like to make it clear, as I am sure my hon. Friend will, that the vote on the second report was not a vote on an Opposition report or amendment; it was on our Chairman's report. Therefore, we were voting for the Chairman's report.

Mr. Mackinlay: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that valid point. The Chairman's stewardship of this matter has been principled. The circumstances have been difficult. Indeed, he has shown leadership in the preparation of the report and endeavoured to reach what has been referred to as a compromise. His efforts should be applauded. On this particular matter, the Select Committee was voting on the Chairman's draft.

I regret that we are debating this issue on an Opposition motion, but that is not a criticism of the Opposition; this matter needed to be brought before the House. I suspect that history will not be repeated. I think that some people will have got the message that, if such circumstances ever arise again—I hope that they will not; I think that they should be avoided—the business managers should recognise that Government time needs to be made available for these matters to be explored and rehearsed.

In her speech today, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House rehearsed many of the wrongs perpetrated by the Conservatives when they were in office in relation to scrutiny and disclosure of information, for example. She also mentioned inconsistencies in their prosecution of the Government earlier in the afternoon. Everything that she listed was valid, but we must remember, quite simply, that two wrongs do not make a right.

I am proud to support my Government in the House of Commons. They rightly made great play up to and during the general election of promoting openness, reforming the constitution and making Parliament more relevant. I hope that, in the immediate aftermath of this debate and generally, they will consider whether they should be bolder in making themselves more available to scrutiny than any Government before, rather than limiting scrutiny. In my view, one of the great legacies that the Government could hand down is a machinery that makes them open to scrutiny and accountable as never before. That would be a tremendous achievement and something of which they could be proud. I hope that that will be reflected upon.

When we consider how we got into this difficulty, I have to say that the Government's approach has been somewhat deficient. I must just acknowledge that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) is now on the Treasury Bench and I am grateful to him for being here because, in fairness to him, I inevitably want to refer to some of the circumstances by which this matter has escalated.

The Minister of State was originally due to appear before the Select Committee on a matter separate from Sierra Leone on Tuesday 5 May, after a bank holiday. In the weekend papers, matters relating to what is now known as the Sierra Leone issue had emerged. The Minister was asked whether he would be prepared to respond to questions arising from the weekend press reports and he generously agreed to do so. However, things got off to a bad start. It appears to me that the Minister of State had not been adequately briefed, partly because it was after a weekend and a bank holiday. I believe that he referred to that. There were some things that he needed to clarify subsequently, but they were not clarified until Friday. I do not want to labour that point in the House now except to say that that is indicative of how things are a little slow.

I am sure you will remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that on Wednesday 6 May there was a private notice question from the shadow Foreign Secretary which required the Foreign Secretary to come to the Dispatch Box. It would have been much better if my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had decided to appear at the Dispatch Box on the Tuesday afternoon. In that way, we would have had a controlled—perhaps that is the wrong term—a well-thought-out and prepared statement clarifying the position. It would have meant that the Minister of State could legitimately have declined to answer questions at the Foreign Affairs Committee meeting on Tuesday morning.

I venture to suggest that it would have been fair to the Minister of State if the Foreign Secretary had taken the initiative and said, "An important issue has appeared in the papers. There is controversy and I will speak to the House on Tuesday afternoon." That would have been better than waiting for the granting of a private notice question on the Wednesday.

Mr. David Heath: I have been critical of the Minister of State's evidence, but, in an attempt to be fair to him, I and other members of the Select Committee would have found it proper for him to have declined to give evidence on Sierra Leone at that first session. He could have come back at another time soon after in order to give precise evidence. It was clear that he had not been briefed sufficiently to do the job that the Committee asked him to do on that occasion.

Mr. Mackinlay: I am looking my hon. Friend the Minister of State straight in the eye. He has had many achievements and is held in high regard both politically and personally by Labour Members and, I hope, elsewhere. I rehearse these arguments simply to show how the Government got off to a bad start. Subsequently, trying to get sight of the documents and trying to obtain recognition of the fact that the Select Committee has a right and a duty to probe has been like extracting teeth from a whale. I use the word probe deliberately because the valid point was made earlier that there is no formal Select Committee inquiry.

When an issue that causes some concern and controversy is placed in the public domain, the immediate duty of a Select Committee should be to scratch the surface of that issue. That is what we were doing on the Tuesday morning when the Minister of State appeared before us and subsequently. The fact that the Foreign Secretary was not readily disposed to make information available is part of the reason for the creation of the bad spirit in which we have had to try to deal with this matter. [Interruption.] Is the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) shuffling on his bottom or does he wish to intervene?

Mr. David Davis: Since the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have the greatest admiration, has invited me to intervene, I shall do so. I simply want to give him another example. I see that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) is in the Chamber. There have been occasions in the Public Accounts Committee when matters have come to the surface which were not apparent when the Committee met. A recent example is that of the Office of the National Lottery. When it first appeared before the Committee, it looked as though there was no great issue to answer, but, during the Committee's inquiries, something came up, had to be pursued. That is quintessentially the nature of Select Committee inquiries. They do not have to be fettered by guidelines, job descriptions or any of the other paraphernalia of control that we are too used to today.

Mr. Mackinlay: Having pointed out, with the benefit of hindsight, what I believe to have been the wrong approach by the Government, I should now do a mea culpa, mea maxima culpa. I can say, again with hindsight, that we on the Foreign Affairs Committee should have approached things differently. We should have resolved much more quickly at least to have had a formal initial inquiry and we should have announced it pretty damn quick. We should have tackled the constitutional issues with the Foreign Secretary much earlier. Had we done so, history may have been different. With hindsight, I can say that we should probably have approached things differently. I am sure that if it ever happened again, we would do so. That is history.

There is one issue to which I want to return and on which I intervened earlier; the business of the setting up of the Legg inquiry. We are told that it is independent. It is independent, but it is internal. It is not set up under the tribunal inquiries legislation. We would be setting a dangerous precedent if Parliament accepted that a Minister can set up an internal inquiry and use it to dissuade a parliamentary Committee from doing the probing to which I referred earlier. I believe that it discriminates in favour of the Government.

I invite the House to consider an example. If the conduct or stewardship of the employees of an outside public or private corporation was the subject of some public concern and the Select Committee decided, as it often does, to inquire into their conduct, Parliament would not accept as sufficient ground to persuade a parliamentary Committee from doing the necessary probing the fact that the chairman of the corporation had set up an internal inquiry.

When I intervened earlier, some people said, from a sedentary position, "Trade union principle." I need no lessons in trade union principles because, before coming to the House, I had for many years been a trade union official. The Foreign Affairs Committee, like all Select Committees, is sensitive to people's rights. As has been pointed out, there is an opportunity to consider matters in camera. No Select Committee would wilfully allow its inquiry to jeopardise people's employment rights or rights of appeal, but Parliament is supreme and it is essential that the setting up of an internal inquiry by the Government should not obstruct Parliament in doing its duty.

Mr. David Davis: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention not just to the parallel that he has chosen—the private sector—but to the previous inquiry in the Foreign Office. Much has been made today of the Scott inquiry. It was not set up under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921, although in every other way—except for the sub judice requirement—it mimicked it. A senior judge was in charge and its general set-up was similar. Many more people were involved whose disciplinary rights could have been transgressed. The then Foreign Secretary—rightly from his point of view—did not hold back in answering parliamentary questions and in commenting in the press. Therefore, there is a precedent in the Foreign Office of an inquiry taking place, but the rights of Parliament not being withheld.

Mr. Mackinlay: Absolutely. If it is good for the private sector, it must be good for the Government. There should not be discrimination in favour of Ministers or Government Departments.

Mr. Illsley: My hon. Friend may not have been in the Chamber earlier when a former member of the Trade and Industry Committee complained about documents that were part of the Scott inquiry being kept from that Committee and about how the previous Government refused to release information.

Mr. Mackinlay: I did not raise the matter of the Scott inquiry, but I did state my view that although my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House trotted out all the wrongs perpetrated by the Conservative Government—we can add my hon. Friend's point to the list—two wrongs do not make a right. I expect a higher standard from a Labour Government. That is my point, and I intend to sustain it.

One issue that has not been raised was my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's comment to the effect, "What's all the fuss about? The good guys won." If my right hon. Friend chooses to say that in the circumstances of the time, it increases our duty at least to scratch the surface in these matters with some expedition. I did not make the comment; my right hon. Friend did. Again, it is a matter of restraints being put on the Select Committee while the Executive can have its way.

Looking to the future, it would be better if, rather than Governments setting up inquiries and appointing people such as Legg, Parliament had at its disposal someone to carry out the initial scrutiny. That already happens in the general area of administration by way of the ombudsman. In addition, the Public Accounts Committee has the Comptroller and Auditor General, who can probe and examine on his own initiative. He can suggest matters for the PAC to examine, or the political members of the Committee might ask him to investigate certain matters. He might come back to the Committee with the judgment that there is nothing to worry about or that the matter does not justify an examination by the full Committee.

Other Select Committees need such people on their staffs—and they might well be people like Mr. Legg who would be under the instruction of and answerable to a Select Committee. I am not opposed to someone making an initial investigation. It could be conducted with some privacy, which would diminish the opportunities for malicious and malevolent complaints to be made against people. That might protect those who might subsequently have to answer disciplinary action. However, that investigation should be on the initiative of the Select Committee, not the Government, who are themselves subject to the scrutiny. I hope that that point will be taken on board by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House when she and others come to reflect on these issues and determine how they can be avoided.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I hope that we can conduct this debate on the common basis that we all want the supremacy of Parliament and the privileges of Select Committees to be upheld. We want to be sure that the Executive is, at all times and through us, brought to account to the electorate. Like many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), it is our privilege to be Members of Parliament. We have to uphold the highest standards and make Parliament more effective. We have to uphold its prestige and gain the respect of the electorate.

I regard this matter as a House of Commons affair and I am amazed at the partisanship that has been revealed within the Foreign Affairs Committee. As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said, Select Committees are at their most potent and effective when their members are working together as a team on a bipartisan basis. Of course, politics is never absent in a political arena such as the House of Commons or a Select Committee, but the effective way to call the Government to account is for the Select Committee system to be allowed to develop and to increase—rather than to reduce—its powers.

What galvanised me to take part in the debate and to support the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, the Chairman of the Liaison Committee, was the report, presented by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, that it was the Government's contention that, first, his Committee could not investigate a matter of concern when the Foreign Secretary had established an internal inquiry and, secondly, that his Committee must await the report of that internal inquiry before the Foreign Secretary would answer questions and allow the Committee to see relevant papers.

If the House allowed that ruling to stand, we would forfeit, on behalf of the electorate, the capacity to hold the Executive to account in any meaningful way. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) listed the ways in which we could do that. We are aware of the ineffectiveness of asking questions and how that process has been undermined as a method of holding the Government to account. Select Committees are crucial to the perpetuation of the view that the House has supremacy. In fact, we may as well give up responsibility to the presenters of the "Today" programme who, over the past few years, have claimed that it is their responsibility to hold the Government to account—unelected as they are and unappointed as they are under the BBC's mandate. However, they claim that we are not doing our job. If we had allowed the Foreign Secretary's ruling to stand, we would have forfeited our rights.

In effect, our fox has been shot because the Foreign Secretary has now said that he will allow the Select Committee to look at the telegrams in summary and for that summary to be effectively scrutinised by one or two members of the Committee—presumably selected by the Committee, not by the Foreign Secretary—to verify that it is in all ways honest and truthful. That is how the matter should have been conducted initially. It is also how the previous Foreign Affairs Committee looked into the Pergau dam matter.

There was no division between Labour and Conservative Members who served on the previous Foreign Affairs Committee. The previous Committee wanted to hold the Government to account on the Pergau dam, and so it did. Government Members have made much of Pergau as a reprehensible incident in the previous Government's conduct of affairs. The previous Committee was absolutely right to hold the previous Government to account, and I support its actions. I hope that the current Select Committee will do the same with the current Government.

I should like to deal with a point that has been made by the hon. Member for Swansea, East. There are occasions on which Select Committees have to ensure that they maintain confidentiality between the Committee and the Executive. There are several obvious issues to consider in maintaining confidentiality, the first of which is reporting by high commissioners or civil servants to Ministers.

If we require all such correspondence—whether in the form of faxes, telegrams or letters—to be reported and recorded in the House, any self-respecting Minister or high commissioner will, because of fears that the correspondence will be published in full, for full public consideration, restrict the type of honesty that is necessary for efficient conduct of Government business. They will not include in their telegrams very important confidential—possibly personally libellous—information that they would otherwise report and which is necessary for a judgment to be made by Ministers.

It is right that Select Committees should use the mechanisms that we developed in dealing with the Pergau dam matter. The International Development Committee has already agreed with the Secretary of State for International Development to use those mechanisms when dealing with a case involving commercially sensitive information and the Trade and Industry Committee has used them.

The International Development Committee has asked the Commonwealth Development Corporation to tell us exactly why it has proposed investing in projects in competition with private sector investors. The Secretary of State has offered to let the Committee see all the information—including a summary of commercially sensitive information that we will be able to check. I think that that is the right way to go about such matters.

We require confidentiality in cases involving reporting from civil servants and high commissioners to Ministers, commercially sensitive information and serious security issues. We would not wish Select Committees to betray secrets that would in any way endanger the safety of the United Kingdom. In those three important examples, we must compromise Select Committees' rights to see absolutely every document.

We must conserve also the immediacy and relevance of Select Committee work, much of which is lost because time is not on a Committee's side. We therefore object to the Government establishing an inquiry and saying that it will be able to report in two and a half months—although, in the case of guns to Iraq, for example, it took an inquiry two years to report. Select Committees should be able immediately to call Ministers, to call for papers and to report to the House so that the House will be able immediately and relevantly to debate issues of very great concern to the country.

One of the problems with the Sierra Leone case is that we have not had such immediacy. Although I hesitate to criticise the Foreign Affairs Committee, the hon. Member for Thurrock said that the Committee perhaps should have immediately entered into discussions with Ministers. However, perhaps the Committee would have been hindered in doing so by the Foreign Secretary himself—thereby providing another reason for me to speak in this debate and to object very strongly to such action, in defence of the House's capacity to hold the Government to account and to inform the nation of the Government's actions on their behalf.

Today's debate has enabled the possibility of the Government giving way on the matter. I am not certain that we would have received quite such an emollient letter from the Foreign Secretary without the pressure that has been brought to bear on both him and the Government. I believe that, in the end, the Government have acted honourably and properly and that the Select Committee system will consequently be enhanced, which I very much welcome. The result has been achieved by work by hon. Members on both sides of the House, in defence of the very important privileges that we possess and the duties that our electors expect us to discharge.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate—first, because I am a member of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee; and, secondly, because I am a member of the Procedure Committee, as I have been for a number of years. I am somewhat unique in the House because—despite two or three periods as an Opposition spokesperson or in the Whips office—I have been a Select Committee member since being elected to this place. I am therefore somewhat struck by the naivety of some hon. Members when they speak about Select Committees—specifically about confidentiality and bipartisanship.

I give the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) an example of confidentiality and bipartisanship from 1990, when a leak from the Energy Select Committee occurred before the Committee had even received copies of its report. The leak involved a situation in which one Secretary of State wanted to have a little dig at another Secretary of State, including in the Chairman's draft report the word "dilettante" to describe the latter Secretary of State. The description was leaked to the weekend press, which was up in arms about the leak. The Committee therefore met for the first time to deliberate on the report against a background of press derision about a Select Committee describing a Secretary of State as a "dilettante". However, the Select Committee had not even seen the report.

The upshot was that the Committee decided to delete any reference to the word "dilettante". To this day, I have not been able to trace the origins of that word in the report. However, the fact is that Select Committees leak like sieves and very rarely act in a bipartisan manner.

Mr. David Heath: I am not as green as the hon. Gentleman is perhaps portraying me. Of course Select Committees leak, and—dare I say it—it may have happened even within the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. However, I do not believe that there are examples of Select Committees leaking matters that are clearly identified as matters of national security or national interest. I do not believe that the Intelligence and Security Committee, for example, has ever been found guilty of leaking confidential information provided to it. I believe that we should have confidence in the Foreign Affairs Select Committee to take the same responsible attitude on important matters of state.

Mr. Illsley: I am sure that both the House and the Foreign Secretary have that confidence in the Committee. In my view, the Foreign Secretary has acted in good faith by offering the Select Committee a summary of the telegrams, which could be verified by Committee members. The offer has been available to the Committee for a considerable time.

The Sierra Leone issue has been pushed and extended by Opposition Front Benchers. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), in moving the motion, had to be prompted by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) to mention the Committee's "inquiry into Sierra Leone". The Committee is not conducting an inquiry into Sierra Leone. It has no terms of reference dealing with Sandline or with Sierra Leone or anything connected with it.

At a previous meeting, Committee members agreed not to call various named individuals and not to undertake an inquiry, on the basis that it would duplicate the Legg inquiry and simply be trying to call the same witnesses, who would say, "I refuse to give evidence to the Committee on the basis that I will incriminate myself"— rather as the Maxwell brothers said to the Social Security Select Committee. Although the Maxwell brothers spoke to the Committee, they said absolutely nothing. The House almost decided that they were in contempt.

That is what would have happened had we tried to hold an inquiry, but, for some reason, we decided to call for the telegrams. It has to be pointed out that we are not undertaking an inquiry into Sierra Leone. The whole issue of Sandline and arms to Sierra Leone has prevented the Committee from producing one serious, substantive report.

I am surprised that this debate is taking place on an Opposition day and that, in drafting their motion, the Opposition have taken paragraph 6 of the second special report by the Foreign Affairs Committee. It is there for all to see:

"it is wrong in principle for the Executive to seek unilaterally to impose prior conditions" and so on. However, the previous paragraph of the same report states:

"The Committee welcomes the Secretary of State's willingness to make available summaries of the telegrams and to allow nominated members . . . to verify them. It also welcomes the Secretary of State's willingness, as set out in his letter to the Chairman . . . to consider specific requests to extend the offer".

I am surprised that the Opposition have decided to use paragraphs from our report as the basis for their motion. I think that it is an abuse of the House's procedures to take a report by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, or a report by any Select Committee, and debate it—

Sir Patrick Cormack rose—

Mr. Illsley: I withdraw the phrase "abuse of the House's procedures"; I shall simply say that it is unusual for the Opposition to take as the subject of an Opposition day debate a report by a Select Committee. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the former Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, pointed out, perhaps there should have been other ways for the report to be debated—through the Liaison Committee, and so on.

I want to talk about confidentiality and the supposed powers of Select Committees to call for documents. If we look into the powers of a Select Committee to call for papers and documents, we find that there are none. The Standing Orders state that a Select Committee can send for papers and documents, but the power to call for papers rests with the House. The reason is that the House cannot delegate to a Committee more powers than it has itself, and the House is restricted in the powers that it has to call for documents. I shall deal with that in a moment.

There are members of the Committee, which is now split down the middle, who are quite happy with what the Secretary of State has offered. We have never accepted his offer to look at the summaries of the telegrams. We have been involved in this for weeks, but not one of us has said that we should get the Committee to agree to do that so that we can find out whether there is anything to warrant our prolonged consideration of the Sandline issue in parallel with the Legg inquiry.

As we now know, the Foreign Secretary has agreed to come to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee on two occasions—16 and 28 July. He has agreed to give evidence, because we decided at the last Committee meeting to invite him—perhaps if we had decided to hold an inquiry into Sierra Leone, or if we had decided that it was now appropriate to examine the telegrams, we would not be in this situation. I believe that a great deal of the time of the House and the Select Committee has been wasted.

I said that Select Committees have no power to call for documents. The reason for that is that when Select Committees were established in 1979, the then Government did not give them any power to call for documents. The present Select Committee structure is based on the 1978 report of the Select Committee on Procedure. It is one of the better reports that the House has received because it dealt not only with Select Committees, but with many other issues which the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons is even now only just getting around to considering.

As I said, the power to call for a document rests with the House of Commons, and it rests in an address by a Member. As, since 1902 and the Balfour reforms, the agenda is now in the power of the Government, there is no opportunity for a Member to move an address for the return of a document, so, basically, that power does not exist. As long ago as 1859, "Erskine May" set out some of the conditions relating to what could and could not be called for. One condition was that a paper or document was not confidential, and another was that calling for it would not be against public policy. Even then, there were restrictions on what information the Government could make available.

When the Clerk of the Committee gave evidence to the Select Committee on Procedure in 1978, he spoke about the limitations on the House's power to send for a paper from a public Department. Before the Committee reported, he said:

"when sought from government departments",

the document should not be

"of a public and official character, and should not be private or confidential."

He went on to say:

"It is ministerial refusals to produce documents which have provided the greatest problems for Select Committees in the conduct of their inquiries . . . There have been other occasions on which committees may have wished to have more information in the form of papers and records from Ministers, but in such cases a compromise has been reached."

They are the words of the Clerk of the Committee in 1978 before the Select Committee got around to dealing with the issue.

The Select Committee then set out its views on the release of papers. Its idea was that a refusal by the Government to release papers should be followed by a special report to the House. When the House had had the report for six days, public business should be interrupted and the matter debated. That was the Select Committee's recommendation, although it was eventually thrown out. When the Committee made that recommendation, it clearly stated:

"We envisage that the procedure set out above would be invoked rarely, if at all. It would stand as an ultimate weapon . . . We would expect that Committees would continue in certain circumstances to accept the arguments of departments and their Ministers that the provision of some information requested was undesirable and to respect the requests of some departments for some evidence to be given on a confidential basis."

The Select Committee thereby admitted in 1978 that there was an argument for confidentiality.

In 1979, the Conservative Government acted on that report and brought into being the present Select Committee structure. I think that it was my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne who said earlier this evening that the powers of Select Committees should be strengthened when the Government have a sizeable majority in the House, and he referred to the present Government's majority. However, the present Select Committee structure, perfect or imperfect, was set up when the Government of the day had a majority of around 150. That argument pertained in 1979, but was perhaps not taken on board.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): That is not quite right. Select Committees were set up when the Government's majority was 44. As the hon. Gentleman will recall, at a later election it went up to 143, with 1 million fewer votes being cast for the Conservatives.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that correction, but the Government nevertheless had a substantial majority in the Parliament in which Select Committees were established. In the debate on Select Committees at the time, the then Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, now Lord St. John of Fawsley, said:

"The Government will make available to Select Committees as much information as possible, including confidential information for which, of course, protection may have to be sought by means of the sidelining procedure."—[Official Report, 25 June 1979; Vol. 969, c. 45.]

So even then there was some measure of confidentiality in respect of calls or requests for papers by Select Committees, and the Standing Orders were drawn up on that basis.

The Leader of the House referred to the code of practice that is mentioned in the Government amendment. Paragraph 4 of that code refers to the disclosure of documents in relation to inquiries or proceedings. However, paragraph 1, under the heading "Reasons for Confidentiality" sets out the exemptions to the disclosure of information, including:

"Information whose disclosure would harm the conduct of international relations or affairs."

and

"Information received in confidence from foreign governments"

and so on. Some of the information that the Foreign Affairs Committee has asked for has to be considered on that basis.

Initially, the Foreign Secretary said that the telegrams that we had requested contained confidential information, some of which might have referred to issues other than the one in which we were interested. It might have related to other Governments or individuals involved in Sierra Leone at the time.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I am sure that my hon. Friend would wish to remind the House that the concern expressed by the Foreign Secretary related not just to what was contained in those telegrams, but to the fact that it would be the first time ever that any Foreign Secretary had allowed anyone to look at telegrams and that when it became common knowledge outside the House that such telegrams were being viewed by Select Committees, the content of those telegrams would suffer and they would become less helpful.

Dr. Godman: More bland.

Mr. Ross: Not only would they become more bland, but they would probably lose their usefulness.

Mr. Illsley: My hon. Friend makes a very good point that was also made by the Foreign Secretary and considered by the Committee—that the content of future telegrams might suffer if the senders thought that they would be made public and brought before Committees on a regular basis.

I pay tribute to the Clerk of the Foreign Affairs Committee as he has advised us very well on procedure. He has given us excellent briefing on the procedures available to the Select Committee. His advice on the issue has been very good. Let me quote from two documents prepared by the Clerk, where he states:

"The Foreign Secretary describes this proposal"— to make a summary of the telegrams available to the Select Committee—

"as following the Pergau precedent, but in one sense it goes further. In the Pergau case, it was certain agreements between the United Kingdom and Malaysia that were subject to verification by Members. In the present case, it is telegrams between Posts and London, a rather broader category of document. If the Committee accepts the Foreign Secretary's offer, this could represent a useful extension of the Pergau precedent."

Not only did we refuse to look at the telegrams, but we turned down the chance of producing a precedent for future Select Committees and we missed a trick.

Ms Abbott: My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), said a few moments ago that had we been allowed sight of the telegrams in any formal fashion it would have been the first time that an outsider had sight of Foreign Office telegrams. However, in the Select Committee, he told us that he himself, in his capacity as chairman of the Labour party Back-Bench committee on foreign affairs had had sight of such telegrams in particular circumstances. I remember thinking at the time that it was odd that there should be circumstances in which he should have sight of telegrams, but it could not possibly be appropriate for members of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee to see telegrams in any formal fashion.

Mr. Illsley: I listened with interest to what my hon. Friend said.

I was referring to the advice received from the Clerk. Further advice stated:

"The practical difficulties in exercising the formal powers to require Secretaries of State to produce documents have led Committees instead to seek to negotiate a compromise with Ministers."

So throughout the history of Select Committees, the issue of confidentiality has arisen and has usually led to compromise.

I agree that perhaps Select Committees do not have sufficient powers to call for documentation. Perhaps the Opposition would have done better framing today's debate around the powers of Select Committees and whether or not they should be increased. I know that the Procedure Committee is considering Select Committees in the face of devolution; most Select Committee Chairmen will have received letters from the Procedure Committee on that issue. By turning down the precedent that we were offered, perhaps we missed the chance to extend the powers of Select Committees.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) that the Opposition have used the Foreign Affairs Committee as a way of prolonging interest in the Legg inquiry and keeping the issue on the agenda in view of the fact that the Legg inquiry is now proceeding. It is interesting that on the day when we were to take evidence from Sir John Kerr, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe released his evidence to the Legg inquiry. I recall hearing him on the radio that morning talking about the 464 questions and the 63 pages of evidence that he had produced for the Legg inquiry. It is also interesting that members of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe are now using the same language in their press releases. They both referred to the Secretary of State's actions as putting a blowtorch under the Select Committee structure.

The Foreign Affairs Committee has no inquiry on Sierra Leone, no terms of reference in respect of such an inquiry and no formal proceedings on Sierra Leone, so many of the issues that we are debating today are outside the remit of the Select Committee. We are not undertaking an inquiry and perhaps we should have addressed that some time ago. The Government set up the Legg inquiry to deal with the matter and, as far as I am concerned, we have been made offers that go further than those made by the previous Government in similar circumstances and we have not taken up those offers. I remain of the view that the Select Committee is being led politically. It is being used as a way of airing the issue, outside the Legg inquiry. The sooner the Legg inquiry reports and the Foreign Affairs Committee makes a decision on the matter, the better off we will all be.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley). I have been a member of a Select Committee ever since I came to the House—first the Employment Committee and then the Energy Committee, when I served with the hon. Gentleman. I, too, remember the incident of leaks and the so-called dilettante Minister. The hon. Gentleman will also recall that on that Select Committee there was what I can describe only as a Government stooge whose job was to ensure that the views of the Secretary of State of the day were forcefully presented. That did not improve the debate within the Select Committee, but none the less consensus eventually prevailed and the results of our deliberations were all the better for it.

The work conducted by right hon. and hon. Members on Select Committees is some of the most constructive and satisfying that we can do in this place. All Select Committees have difficulty in getting information out of Government Departments. There is nothing new in that. To some extent, all Select Committees leak the information that they receive. That is one of the problems of getting information out of Departments in the first place. If Select Committees did not leak, they would find it much easier to get the information that they required in order to do their job properly.

I well understand the current concern about the failure of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to release to the Select Committee information relating to the Sierra Leone arms investigation, so I support the motion tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends, which is about the principle that we are debating today—the role of Select Committees and how they can get information from the Government. I congratulate the Foreign Affairs Committee on the wording in its report, which has been used in the motion tabled by the official Opposition, notwithstanding the remarks of the Chairman of the Committee about those words being taken somewhat out of context.

Rather than dealing with the specifics of the Sierra Leone affair, I shall limit my remarks to the way in which our Select Committees are working or, in some cases, are not working satisfactorily.

Ministers can run their Departments only if they have money. The only way in which they can get money is by coming to Parliament and asking us to vote for it. Once we have voted them that money, it is our job, as the elected representatives of the people who pay the taxes to produce the money, to hold Ministers accountable for the way in which they have spent that money.

It amazes me that it was not until 1979 that Parliament had the sense to establish the broader departmental Select Committee system that we now have. I endorse what hon. Members have said about the importance of being able to cross-question Ministers and civil servants. The mandarins in Whitehall are powerful. They do not like appearing before Select Committees. Some Ministers are good at it and some are not so good, but I have found that, on the whole, civil servants are reluctant to appear, and when they do, they sometimes do not perform as well as Ministers. It is also an important part of a Select Committee's work to be able to cross-question not only civil servants, but those outside Whitehall who have an interest in the matters that the Select Committee is investigating and for which the Department of State is responsible.

A number of hon. Members have referred to the importance of unanimity. Some responsibility for assisting Select Committees eventually to reach unanimity lies with the Committee of Selection, which no one has yet mentioned. The Committee of Selection has the task of deciding who serves on Select Committees. I deplore the efforts of the Whips of any party to twist the arms of members of the Committee to try to get people on a Select Committee who effectively become placemen for the party concerned.

It is the job of the Committee of Selection to find men and women of judgment. Part of the difficulty about their being given access to classified and confidential information is the way in which members of a Select Committee will use that information. Having been privy to it, it is up to members to use their judgment in the national interest and to decide whether they should disclose the information. If the members of the Select Committee display such judgment, the system will work well. However, it is up to the Committee of Selection in the first place to try to ensure that the right sort of people go on the Select Committees.

If the Committees are to do their job properly, they need information. Often they already have the knowledge. It is one of the features of the Select Committees on which I have served that, because of the continuity of membership of the Committee from one Parliament to another, members of a Select Committee often know more about the subject than the Ministers who come before them in the dock. That can have unfortunate consequences.

I well remember the occasion on which I was pinned up against the bookshelves of the Aye Lobby during a Division by a Minister of State who was very much larger than I was, when I was Chairman of the Defence Committee—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name him."]—I would not dream of doing such a thing; I am far too courteous—in order to persuade me that there was a certain matter that the Defence Committee should not investigate. That merely reinforced my impression that the Defence Committee certainly should investigate the matter. I may say that when the Minister came to give evidence before the Committee, he performed extremely well.

I pay tribute to the staff of Select Committees. It amazes me how much our staff manage to achieve when compared with congressional committees on Capitol Hill. On the Defence Committee we have only four Clerks, but we employ the valuable services of someone seconded from the National Audit Office, which was mentioned earlier. Every Select Committee could benefit from having a member of the NAO on its staff.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the hon. Gentleman consider that the House would benefit from having the equivalent of the general accounting office in Washington, where a unit is available to give detailed information of the kind to which he referred, and which, for us, would normally come from the National Audit Office? The general accounting office provides information on the problems of the day and advice to members as they are considering particular aspects of policy.

Mr. Colvin: That is a valuable contribution, which right hon. and hon. Members on the Front Benches will take on board. Select Committees tend to be reactive. The more proactive they become, the better. The hon. Lady's suggestion would be one way of assisting Select Committees to be proactive, provided of course that the rules of the House permitted it.

It is difficult to get information out of Ministers and Departments. Much of the information that the Defence and the Foreign Affairs Committees require to do their job properly impinges on national security and is therefore highly sensitive.

Our Defence Committee sees some extremely highly classified material. In fact, information on the level of classification that we are allowed to see is itself classified information, so I cannot tell the House what it is. All I can say is that when we are privy to it, we usually sit in a room in the Ministry of Defence and our notes are put through the shredding machine when we leave. In our office, less highly classified material is locked in the safe, and we frequently go into private session when we are considering the sort of information that may well have come before the Foreign Affairs Committee in relation to Sierra Leone.

That reinforces my point about hon. Members' judgment. The House of Commons Defence Committee has never leaked. There was an occasion on which part of a report got out a little early, but that was purely accidental. On the whole, we are an extremely secure Committee and we have invariably succeeded in reaching a consensus on our reports. With many new members on the Committee, all the evidence is that we shall continue to reach a consensus, which is to the benefit of the work that we do and the defence of the realm.

To put the matter of classified material into context, I should say that the Committee receives details of about 50 highly classified documents in a parliamentary Session, so we see a great deal of important information.

Two problems that Select Committees face have been briefly touched on in the debate. The first involves commercially sensitive information, and the second is the matter of advice to Ministers, as it is called. Both issues concern alternatives put forward to Ministers. On Select Committees, it is our job to react to decisions that Ministers have made. Civil servants put forward alternatives to Ministers. I have seen advice to Ministers, and sometimes it is amazing how many different alternatives are put—"Well, Minister, on the one hand you can say this, but on the other hand you have to say something else"—memories of "Yes, Minister" come to mind. Many alternatives are always put forward, both as general advice and on procurement decisions, when Ministers have to decide whether to accept this or that bid for a contract.

A good case can be made for Select Committees becoming more involved in the proactive work of giving their advice to Ministers when alternatives are being considered. In the United States of America, the Appropriation Committee often does that, and it has real power. I know that the Americans' constitutional set-up is completely different from ours, but many Select Committees are now beginning to think that some of the financial decisions made by Ministers would be better if the Select Committee had some knowledge of what the alternatives were—perhaps in the form of the final shortlist before the ministerial decision is made.

Forty per cent. of this country's defence budget relates to procurement decisions, and, with our knowledge, better decisions might be made if the Defence Committee were given, in private, the sort of information on which its members could make a judgment before the Minister had to make his. The Liaison Committee was discussing that at the end of the previous Parliament—it is on the record of our Committee's proceedings—and as has already been said, the Procedure Committee is doing the same thing at the moment.

The most recent example of advice to Ministers being misused rather than used arose during the inquiries that the Defence Committee was conducting into the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. As part of the strategic defence review, about which we shall all know much more tomorrow, the Ministry of Defence examined options for the future of DERA to meet requirements for defence industrial diversification.

The options were contained in DERA's 1998 corporate plan, and the Defence Committee asked for a copy to assist us with our inquiry, which was published only last week. Ministers refused to provide a copy, and instead sent us a memorandum, arguing that the corporate plan was classified as advice to Ministers, and should not therefore be disclosed to Parliament.

[Mr. Colvin]

I hope that when the Minister responds, he will clarify how advice to Ministers ought to be construed. Access to such key documents is essential if Select Committees are to have a meaningful and well-informed scrutiny role. Restrictions on such access undermine proper accountability to Parliament.

The continuing business of getting information out of Departments of State is a bit of a dogfight. In the Defence Committee, we feel that the system that we have adopted is working tolerably well—but that system relies entirely on mutual trust between the Committee and Ministers. In the case of the arms to Sierra Leone affair, that trust has broken down, which has put the whole business and process of parliamentary accountability in jeopardy.

8.12 pm

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Contrary to what some hon. Members have said, this is a very important debate—a debate, ultimately, about the rights and powers of Select Committees. There are several reasons why it is important.

First, it is vital that the debate—both on the Floor of the House and in the media and elsewhere outside the House—about the role of the legislature versus the Executive has taken place early in this Parliament. This may be quite a long Administration, and it is important to shed some light on such matters at the outset.

The debate is also important for the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), the Chairman of the Select Committee, has set a gold standard for Select Committee Chairmen. From now on, no Chairman can afford to be less bold and resolute than he has been, in what everyone agrees were difficult circumstances. Another reason why the debate is important is that, for reasons on which I shall expound later, in this Administration we are faced with certain difficulties concerning proper parliamentary scrutiny on the Floor of the House.

Finally, the debate is important because, thanks to the offer that the Foreign Secretary has made today, never again can any Minister use an internal inquiry as a means of stopping legitimate parliamentary inquiry. The Foreign Affairs Select Committee has drawn an important line in the sand.

There has been a lot of misinformation in the debate, so, for the avoidance of doubt, let me explain that the offer by the Foreign Secretary that we are hearing about today—an offer of unconditional access to a summary of the telegrams—is the first such offer that has been made. It is not an offer which has been available for weeks and weeks.

Mr. David Heath indicated assent.

Sir John Stanley indicated assent.

Ms Abbott: Other members of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee are nodding. Only today have we had sight of a letter from the Foreign Secretary conceding unconditional access to the summary. It is important to have that fact on the record, because some colleagues may inadvertently have misled the House on the subject.

Again for the avoidance of doubt, let me remind the House of the sequence of events. On 12 May, nearly two months ago, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee wrote to the Foreign Secretary asking for the telegrams. On the same day, I raised the matter on the Floor of the House. At that time, the Foreign Secretary rejected our proposal. Indeed, he went further and wrote back to my hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee confirming his rejection.

On 21 May, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee published its first special report. If, as some Members have suggested this evening, the Foreign Secretary was so anxious to meet us half way and offer a deal, I wonder why he did not take the opportunity of our first special report on 21 May to come forward with unconditional access to the telegrams. He did not. On publication of our first special report, the Foreign Secretary was still saying that there would be no access to the telegrams.

On 1 June, the Foreign Secretary wrote again to the Select Committee. He had moved incrementally, but he still said that he would offer only a summary, and even that was not on offer until after the Legg inquiry had concluded. Let me say a word about that inquiry: again, today is the first time that we have heard about the possibility that it might report before the House rises for the summer recess.

All along, we have pursued the negotiations with the Foreign Secretary with the fear in some of our minds that the Legg inquiry would, as is sometimes the way with such civil service inquiries, report, conveniently, right at the end of the Session. That would give no time for any further inquiries by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. In effect, all parliamentary scrutiny of the matter would have been closed down until October when the House returned, by which time Ministers presumably imagined that everyone would have forgotten about it, and its subject matter would have been overtaken by events.

People should be clear that the point at issue was whether the Government would allow proper parliamentary scrutiny of the Sierra Leone affair now, or—as would have been the effect of the deals that the Foreign Secretary was offering a month ago—parliamentary scrutiny would be closed down until October.

On 1 June, the Foreign Secretary was saying that we could have a summary—an offer which was prised out of him—but not until after Legg had reported. On 15 June, he wrote again offering the same summary after the Legg inquiry had reported. We could get no sign whatever from him about whether we could hope to see the Legg report before the end of the Session.

On 23 June, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee published its second report. If the Foreign Secretary, as some Members have suggested, was so keen to meet the concerns of the Select Committee, he could have offered a deal at that point. Yet he waited until the day of this debate to write to the Select Committee offering unconditional access to the summary of the telegrams, which is what we have been asking for all along.

I put it to the House—and to any fair-minded person listening to the debate, or reading it subsequently—that I cannot accept that, if we had not reported to the House not once, but twice, the Foreign Secretary, would have come forward with the compromise he has offered today. That is one of the reasons why this is an important debate. The Foreign Secretary has only conceded the principle of unconditional access under duress. That is why it was right and proper for the Select Committee to report to the House.

As I said, this is an important debate because it concerns the rights and responsibilities of Select Committees. As we approach the millennium, the role of Select Committees has never been more important. In practice, and for all types of reasons—most of which originated long before the Government took office on 1 May—the possibility of serious scrutiny on the Floor of the House has diminished and is diminishing.

Many decisions in relation to legislation have passed from this House to Brussels. I do not criticise that—I am pro-European. I am not arguing against it in principle—I am saying that that is the reality. Even in the short time that I have been in this House—only 10 years—I have seen more and more decisions ebbing away from the House of Commons to supranational organisations such as the legislature in Brussels.

Mr. Colvin: The hon. Lady has missed two other forms of devolution of the powers of this House—one to the assemblies of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales and to the regional agencies in England, and the other to a reformed upper House, which will require powers over fiscal and financial matters that it does not enjoy at the moment. More and more powers will be drained from this place, yet we continue to increase our numbers. Perhaps the time has come to consider whether we need fewer Members of Parliament, rather than more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Lady will not follow that red herring.

Ms Abbott: The hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) makes a fascinating point, but I am well advised by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall not follow him down that interesting path.

My central point is that this is an important debate because of the increasing difficulty of having proper scrutiny on the Floor of the House. I have talked about powers draining away to Brussels. There is also a process—for which I, as a Member, have had a ringside seat—whereby decisions which were once taken by Parliament are now, in effect, taken in the Cabinet, and decisions that were once taken in the Cabinet are now, in effect, taken by an inner circle around the Prime Minister of the day. We saw that under Margaret Thatcher when she was Prime Minister, and none of my hon. Friends would argue that that tendency has lessened under this Administration.

The size of the majority has been referred to. The honest truth is that, if the Government were to propose the massacre of the first born, they would still have no difficulty in getting it through the House of Commons, such is the size of the majority. There is also a possible tendency in some parts of the Government to pay more attention to focus groups and marketing men than to Parliament, or even to the Labour party itself.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I have listened to my hon. Friend and I am trying to make sense of what she is saying. On the one hand, she is saying that the Select Committee has forced the Foreign Secretary to do what he has done. On the other hand, she is trying to say that the Government's majority is such that they can just ignore the wishes of the House. Both cannot be right. With that majority, the Foreign Secretary could simply keep on ignoring the House.

Ms Abbott: The Foreign Secretary has had to make us an offer because the beauty of the Select Committee system is that it is the only area of activity in this House at this time where the writ of the Whips Office does not run. Once one is on a Select Committee, one is on it for the Parliament—and no doubt, even as I speak, some members of the Whips Office are gnashing their teeth at that evident truth.

The rights and powers of Select Committees have never been more important because of the problems of parliamentary scrutiny on the Floor of the House. The choreography on the Floor of the House that we saw under the previous Government and under Mrs. Thatcher is increasing; I am not suggesting that it all started on 1 May. Increasing numbers of hon. Members are standing up to ask questions that, clearly, they have not drafted. I often feel sorry for those people. They are often reading questions that are not merely sycophantic, but poorly drafted and not in order. I often ask my colleagues, "Why do you draft those questions for those people?" That choreography has increased, and is increasing.

There is an increasing emphasis on those on the Government Benches "being helpful"—that, we are constantly told, is the prize virtue of a Government Back Bencher. That—not representing one's constituents or holding the Government to account—is what we are increasingly judged by. On that criterion, I self-evidently fail.

When we have a debate among Government Back Benchers about the role of Parliament in scrutinising the Government, colleagues often say that questions and the business of the House of Commons do not matter. What matters is a having a quiet word with Ministers—we could call it "the doctrine of the quiet word". I am happy to have quiet words with Ministers; I often do so in relation to my constituency. However, the "quiet word" on its own does not work, and it has proven to be ineffective. Literally hundreds of colleagues had quiet words with the Labour party leadership on the cuts in lone-parent benefit. All were completely ignored.

If we set to one side the procedures of the House and rely, as Back Benchers, solely on the "quiet word", what happens to transparency and accountability? We can have transparency and accountability only if Members are prepared to use the formal processes of the House of Commons. That is what they are for.

Another reason why it is becoming increasingly hard to have proper scrutiny in the House is the tendency—which we saw under Margaret Thatcher, and which we still see under this Government—to launch policy not on the Floor of the House, but at press conferences. One of the most striking examples of that was the announcement of the handover to the Bank of England of the power to set interest rates. The single most important announcement relating to economic policy made in this Parliament—whatever we think of it—was made at a press conference. That was done, I believe, because the Minister did not want to be scrutinised not only by the Opposition, but by Labour Back Benchers. Without diverting to that issue, handing over interest rates to the Bank of England has never been Labour party policy. It was never debated at conference or by the national executive.

[Ms Abbott]

I have detained the House a little on the argument, which is important. For all types of reasons—most of which had their genesis long before we came to power on 1 May—proper, considered and sustained scrutiny of the activities of the Government is no longer possible on the Floor of the House. That is why the powers and the rights of Select Committees are so important.

No one on the Select Committee ever assumed that we had unqualified access to persons and papers, but there has always been a presumption that Select Committees should have reasonable access to persons and papers. After all, that was the only way in which they could carry out their duties. Those powers, as the Foreign Affairs Select Committee has found to its cost in the past two months, have never been put on a statutory basis. The reason for that was that it was always assumed that the Government would respect those rights of Select Committees.

The problem that we have had in the past two months is that it was not clear to us, certainly at the beginning of the tussle, that the Foreign Secretary accepted that we had a right in principle—while acknowledging practical concerns—to have access to those papers. That is why I am glad to see the concession today, whereby he is giving us—at long last—unconditional access to a summary of the telegrams.

Some misinformation has been flying around today. No member of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee has sought at any point to duplicate the Legg inquiry. As I said in the House when it was announced, the Legg inquiry has quite narrow terms of reference. As the Select Committee charged with oversight of the Foreign Office, we felt that we were quite entitled to inquire into wide areas concerning the internal workings of the Foreign Office and good government that could run parallel to Legg. I agree with some of my colleagues that it might have been better to announce an inquiry into Sierra Leone early in the process. However, I am surprised to see some of my colleagues proposing that idea. I am sure that some of those who are saying, "If only we had announced the inquiry" would never have voted for it at the time.

The Select Committee is not seeking to duplicate the Legg inquiry, which I stress is not a judicial inquiry. Even until today, hon. Members and Ministers have referred to that inquiry as though it made some matters sub judice. It is an internal inquiry. Until we received the Foreign Secretary's communication today, there was no clarity whatever as to when the Legg inquiry would report. The suspicion had to be that the inquiry was being used, possibly inadvertently, to kick the issue into the long grass.

In the Foreign Secretary's penultimate letter to us, in which he said that we could not see the telegrams until the Legg inquiry had concluded, he stated:

> "The Select Committee is not entitled to persist in pursuing a parallel inquiry by summoning officials who are bound by the collective policy of the Government."

We are entitled to pursue a parallel inquiry—the Foreign Secretary is quite wrong on that point. One of the avenues of exploration for the Foreign Affairs Select Committee in relation to Sierra Leone is whether there were two policies regarding that country: one policy that was expressed by Ministers and pursued in good faith, and another that was pursued possibly by some officials in Whitehall and some in Sierra Leone. The only way of unravelling the truth is by taking evidence from officials.

As hon. Members have said, officials are very powerful. The limited amount of questioning that we have thus far been allowed to do of the permanent secretary has revealed that some Ministers received briefings about the Customs and Excise inquiry while others did not. We have revealed that a military attaché was sent into exile with President Kabbah—for what reason, we know not. There is a reason for questioning officials separately from Ministers. The Foreign Secretary is ill advised to suggest that the Committee had no purpose in seeking to question officials separately.

In conclusion, I congratulate the staff of the Committee. As hon. Members have said, Select Committees must work with very slender staffing resources. We owe much to the hard work, commitment and dedication of our staff. That was my experience on the Treasury Select Committee, on which I served for eight years, and now on the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. I am glad that the matter was reported twice to the House. I am glad that the majority of Committee members were prepared to stand fast by a principle. If we had not stood fast by that principle, we would not have received today's concession from the Foreign Secretary. Some hon. Members may jeer and ask what it is all about, but I believe that we have established an important principle regarding the functioning of Select Committees for the duration of this Administration.

8.32 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): As ever, I shall be brief. It is a pleasure to follow the distinguished and surgical speech of the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), to whom I am almost a constituency neighbour. I shall echo her comments later in my speech. I take personal comfort from her reassurance about the massacre of the first born, not least because I am first born.

I first declare an interest in the debate as a member of the Liaison Committee, although I was absent, for the first time, from its last sitting when it treated on the subject of tonight's debate. On that occasion, I was attending the final day of the Competition Bill in Committee—which was not a competing pleasure, but a competing duty. I salute the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody)—she has just left the Chamber—who is a fellow member of the Liaison Committee. She has sat through the whole debate and intervened periodically.

I should also declare an interest as being highly indirectly related to Sir John Kerr. What I am about to say will sound like an extract from the table of affinity in the "Book of Common Prayer". Lady Kerr's sister is my brother's wife. From the opposite end of the telescope, Sir John would say that I am his sister-in-law's brother-in-law.

As the debate is obviously ranging fairly widely on the subject of Select Committees, I shall—with your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker—take brief preliminary advantage and add an immediately topical footnote regarding an appearance that I once made before a Select Committee, since every Select Committee Chairman worth his or her salt always gives an examinee the opportunity to do so. It relates to being characteristically roasted by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) in a sitting of the then Select Committee on National Heritage on the subject of the delays in the building of the British Library.

I did not know then—but have discovered since—the paragraph devoted to the initiation of that project in the memoirs of Joel Barnett, now Lord Barnett, Chief Secretary to the Treasury in the last Labour Government. I quote from memory, but he said, in effect, that the Treasury rules on which his Government set up the project were such that, if any economic difficulties occurred subsequently, it would be a miracle if the British Library were finished before the end of the century. When I found that paragraph, I felt a little better about the rather long gestation period of the Library—a building and a facility which, upon completion, I greatly admire.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said that he regretted that this debate was being held in Opposition time. We all regret that. I say, in a kindly way, to the Liberal Democrats that they often wish that circumstances were other than they are, but they ignore the fact that the best is often the enemy of the good. In our party, we must sometimes settle for the good because the Government deny us the best.

Moments in the debate reminded me of the narrative of that great historian the Rev. Sir Owen Chadwick entitled, "Mackenzie's Grave", which described a 19th century expedition to central Africa. I should make it clear that I realise that Sierra Leone is not in central Africa. I once asked Owen Chadwick whether he had had any need to travel to central Africa to research his book. He replied that he had not as he had had available to him in Cambridge the concurrent expedition diaries of the eight strong, and often colourful, personalities who had constituted the main dramatis personae of the expedition. Each diary recounted each day and the interactions between those personalities.

I caught some of the flavour of those interactions in the multiple exchanges in this debate between the different hon. Members who serve on the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. As, unlike Owen Chadwick, I did not have access to the diaries, there were moments today when I was also reminded of the riddles of one's youth where one is told that Mr. White, Mr. Brown, Mr. Green and Mr. Black live in houses that are, but not necessarily respectively, white, brown, green and black and then, on the basis of further information, one must work out who lives in which.

Like the diaries of "Mackenzie's Grave", today is also the stuff of history. Someone referred in the debate to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate. When NATO was forged in the post-war years, the Chairman of that Committee was the Republican Senator Vandenberg, who obviously belonged to the opposite party from Dean Acheson, the then Secretary of State. Senator Vandenberg made his first visit to Europe in that capacity. He came down the companion way of the aircraft at Le Bourget—which is where planes landed in Paris at that time—and the assembled French press asked him to say something in French. It was a language of which he was imperfectly the master, but there came into his head a single sentence from his school days—in deference to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the House I shall render it in English—"There have been no great men since Mirabeau". The entire French press spent the next three days trying to work out the significance of that remark as uttered by the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mirabeau has a significance for tonight's debate as he was the first man in the history of Europe to use the word "civilisation"—although, unlike Senator Vandenberg, he said it in French. The great struggle of Parliament with the king and then with the Executive obviously goes back much further than Mirabeau's creation of the word "civilisation". However, within 10 years of his using it, we saw the Wilkes affair, which convulsed my constituency in more ways than one. Tonight is just another moment in our remarkable parliamentary evolution. It is not remotely on the same scale as Wilkes, but is still significant as a thread in the tapestry.

Even during my time in the House, we saw the heroic figure of Miss Mary Frampton, then secretary to the Serjeant at Arms, crossing my constituency to summon the late Sir Charles Villiers to the House to give evidence to one of the few Select Committees that then existed, when he had earlier declined to come—an episode about which Sir Richard Barlas may have been writing in the quotation given earlier in the debate. This debate itself will be a quarry for future historians.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley)—I hope that I have pronounced his constituency correctly; fortunately, it will end up by being spelt properly—described the three separate stands that the Foreign Secretary has taken towards the Select Committee. I shall not rehearse them again, but off two of those stands he has been driven by the Select Committee and by the force of events.

Some years back, I stood on the field of the battle of the Imjin river in Korea on its 40th anniversary, in the presence of Sir Anthony Farrar Hockley, at that stage the adjutant of the Gloucesters, now the gallant Gloucesters, who described most vividly how the battle had gone. What was very clear that day was just how much the three days that the Gloucesters, the Royal Ulster Rifles and the Royal Northumberland Fusiliers, and a fourth Belgian battalion had held the ridge against 30,000 Chinese had mattered to the future course of the war. However, it is a little less clear to me why the Foreign Secretary has spent the best part of not three days but three months defending the Government's position on Sierra Leone, with such intended unyielding tenacity, though he has been obliged to retreat. It may be because of the old jest that the Foreign Office understands every legislature in the world except this one.

The Leader of the House said that the Opposition had initiated the debate because we found opposition difficult. I am one of the fewer than one in five on the Official Opposition Benches who has been in opposition before. I personally have found one slips back into opposition mode as if into a glove. Today's debate has belied the observation of the Leader of the House.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who has returned to the Chamber, said at 4.30 pm, more than four hours ago, that it was not clear why we were having the debate at all, given the incipient and imminent agreement between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Select Committee. The implication was that the rest of the debate would be nugatory. However, when the hon. Gentleman intervened, the game was not yet over. As I see most things in life through a filter of cricket, it was rather like the final day of the Old Trafford test yesterday, when patently the game swung backwards and forwards and it was not over until the last ball was bowled. It is since the hon. Gentleman's intervention that the scale of the Foreign Secretary's retreat has become apparent. On the Select Committee of which I am a member we have noticed how those we are investigating set up internal inquiries to take a look at the issues that we are pursuing, although not, obviously, on the same scale as the Legg inquiry.

In the same way, the flurry of correspondence which has potentially led to a happy detente between the Foreign Secretary and the Select Committee may have been in part prompted, as the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington implied, by the subject of the debate, given that eight approaches had previously been made to the Government to conduct such a debate in Government time. As to why it had to be an Opposition day and not one offered by the Government, I am reminded, not least by the Foreign Secretary, in his letter of 6 July offering 28 July as a date for his rendezvous with the Select Committee, of the lines by the late Sir John Betjeman in his poem about Miss Joan Hunter Dunn:

"Her father's euonymous beckons us in

To the six o'clock news and the lime juice and gin."

Six o'clock is when many cricket matches end. I am left wondering whether, like yesterday evening in Manchester, the Foreign Office has not been batting out time, though for the six o'clock news in Betjeman's poem one read the summer recess, as the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington said. In that respect, the Foreign Secretary would be holding his ground. He has never in the past been a man for Tuscany in August. In opposition, he was always happiest in August facing a television camera on the green sward further down Millbank, and it is certainly a pleasanter refuge for questions than the House.

The importance of today has been what the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), said at the end of his speech, when he commented that today's debate has been an important precedent. It will find a tiny place in parliamentary history, and it has been conducted in terms and tones, and occasional flurries, wholly worthy of that history. One of the tests that it passes today is that at a quarter to 9 it is still going strong, and the Whips on either side of the House have not had to scour and trawl the Corridors of the House to provide speakers.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): As we await the final of the world cup competition, it would appear tonight that the Opposition have scored an own goal. If I might borrow a phrase from the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), the fox has been shot. The debate must be somewhat embarrassing for the Opposition. If the Opposition are not embarrassed, they should be. I am sure that they are embarrassed.

As Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation, I welcome the opportunity to have a discussion on Select Committees. I have no problems in supporting the Government amendment. I say to right hon. and hon. Members who serve on the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs that I congratulate them on getting a debate on the Floor of the House. In my function as a Committee Chairman in this place, I know how difficult it is for a Select Committee to get such a debate.

Transparency and scrutiny must be the watchwords of the House. We know that. We saw the abuse of power by the centralised control freaks in the previous Government. It is not my intention to score party political points, but it is difficult to sit in the Chamber for the hours that we have this evening listening to Her Majesty's Opposition and to forget that for at least the 11 years of my term in the House, 10 were in opposition when the Conservatives were in government. It is a bit rich to hear some of the protestations that come from Conservative Members.

I return to the need for transparency and scrutiny. The truth is that the Government are improving the procedures. The report of the Modernisation Committee, which has recently been published, will give more powers and influence to my Select Committee, which we welcome. Having said that, I will always advise Governments that Select Committees should not be seen as threats to Ministers or to political careers, as can sometimes happen. My Select Committee, the Select Committee on European Legislation, is well known to Government Departments. Sadly, scrutinising 1,200 documents a year is not a sexy pastime. It is not even sexy enough for the Lobby journalists, who keep telling us how to do our job. I am sure that The Guardian scribbler, who wrote such an article that appeared today, will have been sitting in the Press Gallery for hours listening to this very good debate.

In the Select Committee on European Legislation, we have a difficult, complex but rewarding task to scrutinise European legislation. I mention in passing the excellent speech made by the Chairman of the Liaison Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). He addressed not the issue of Sierra Leone but the need to have transparency and scrutiny and what Select Committees are all about, how they have power, and how they should use that power for the benefit of the House.

I have been Chairman of a Select Committee during a Conservative Government and since the new Labour Government took over. That is more than six years. I can count on the fingers of one hand the number of Divisions that we have had in the Select Committee in coming to decisions on the many hundreds of recommendations that we make. We take our strength from our unanimity. We take our power and it is to be hoped that we use it for the benefit of the House. It is a power that we use for the House, and in so doing we do not play the partisan games that politicians sometimes indulge in.

We should always remember that Select Committees perform the duties that charge them with the responsibility of defending democracy. In defending that democracy, we defend the democratic process. Public service is an honourable profession. But because of the misconduct and, yes, dishonesty and lack of probity of a small number in public life our honourable profession is, on occasions, made a laughing stock.

In addressing this important subject, I want to put down a marker. Mention has already been made about devolution in the United Kingdom. It is important that where that devolution is taking place—in Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and London—people learn from our mistakes and do not fall into the same traps that we have fallen into on many occasions here. It is vital that we consider all areas of public service in defending our democracy.

My years in local government prepared me for this place. In the late 1970s and 1980s, the centralised powers in the hands of a few cliques in local government did great damage to our democratic process. After 18 years of Conservative Government, the centralisation of power resulted in central and local government being taken away from the people whom it is meant to serve.

We hear many ideas about better management, more democracy, constitutional reform and the giving of power to communities and people. Without transparency, democratic accountability and real debate, our claim to be the mother of Parliaments is shallow and transparently so. Local government has its problems. Mayors and proportional representation will not solve those problems. If the management of the political and administrative process is not addressed, democracy is seriously threatened.

When we speak about reforming our democracy and devolving power, why not look at local government and talk about having not inspectors who call in without notice, but a scrutiny process whereby back-bench councillors in scrutiny committees scrutinise their executive and management systems? I hope that we shall address that when we consider the reform of our democratic processes.

I conclude by calling for a higher priority to be given to the need for a right of information Bill. Do not let the enemies of democracy hide behind the curtains of secrecy, deceit and self-interest. We are here to protect the democratic process that we are here to use to serve our people. We need to do that, and our watchwords must be scrutiny and transparency.

8.53 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): I begin by apologising to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the House and, in particular, to the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman), who is looking particularly agitated, for not being here at the beginning of the debate. As I explained in a letter to Madam Speaker yesterday, my absence was due to a long-standing speaking engagement at the royal show, explaining the role of Select Committees to the Tenant Farmers Association. I hope that I was carrying at least some of the interesting messages of this debate to a wider audience served by my Select Committee, the Agriculture Committee.

The point has already been made by many hon. Members, and I am sure that it will be made by many more before the end of the debate, that Select Committees are becoming increasingly important in the scrutiny of the Executive. That is why today's debate is so important. I listened with great care to what the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) said about that.

I am glad that the Government and the House are determined to give increased powers to Select Committees. My Select Committee will shortly play a part in scrutinising the draft Bill to establish a Food Standards Agency. I am glad about that. I am glad that the Procedure Committee, to which I recently gave evidence, is considering Select Committees' increased ability to look at Departments' estimates. That is a good thing, too. I am also glad that the Modernisation Committee has been considering the role of Select Committees in European legislation. I have reservations about resources, but that is clearly another example of the way in which Select Committees can contribute to the good working of this place. However, I have a continuing concern that those various issues are putting an increased demand on Select Committees.

Select Committees must respond to the demands properly and with responsibility. I am not always clear that Select Committees have discharged their functions responsibly. They can sometimes forget that their prime purpose is to scrutinise the Executive, not miscreants from a wider world. That is our job, and that is what the Foreign Affairs Committee is seeking to do so well at present.

I recognise that the Government are right to draw attention to the problems sometimes caused by parallel inquiries. I was a special adviser at the Department of Trade and Industry when the Trade and Industry Committee decided to consider the sale of Rover at precisely the moment when the Government were trying to sell it. It is difficult to have a commercial negotiation when a Select Committee is seeking to expose one's negotiating tactics in televised evidence sessions.

I particularly agree with what the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) said about Select Committees working best when they work on the basis of consensus. That is clearly the case. As a man who wears the party hat with pride, I have sometimes failed the test of impartiality in the Chair. I shall strive to do better in future because what the hon. Gentleman says is right.

The point has also been made that it is important to co-operate with the Department that is being shadowed. Wherever possible, a relationship of trust should exist between the Committee and the Department. It is right that I should put it on the record that just such a relationship of trust exists between the Agriculture Committee and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, for which I am grateful.

I do not want to explore the rights and wrongs of the particular case that has resulted in today's debate. The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington did that with great skill and her usual charm. Instead, I want briefly to consider the three issues of principle that the episode raises—the examination of officials bound by policy, a prejudice to the existing inquiry and the establishment of Government inquiries that Select Committees may wish to shadow.

I shall deal first with the question of officials. In a letter to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Foreign Secretary says Select Committees

"are not entitled to . . . persist in pursuing a parallel enquiry by summoning officials who are bound by the collective policy of the Government."

I have some sympathy with the second half of that statement. Select Committees must be careful to make the distinction between policy and procedure and when they have an official before them not to push him on policy issues. However, the first part of the statement is wrong: Select Committees do have the power to pursue parallel inquiries, a matter to which I shall return.

The second issue of principle is parallel inquiries and the damage that might be done to a Government-established inquiry by a Select Committee inquiry.

[Mr. Peter Luff]

The Foreign Secretary and the Foreign Affairs Committee simply disagree about that, and the House would be right to back the views of the Committee, not those of the Foreign Secretary and the Government. In his letter of 30 June to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Foreign Secretary asserts:

"It is the collective view of the Government that a parallel enquiry drawing on the same papers that are currently before the Legg investigation would be prejudicial to the rapid production of a balanced and considered report."

I have to ask why. I cannot understand the logic in that statement and think that there is no such threat of prejudice. If two organisations want to conduct an inquiry, so be it—the House should always have a right to conduct an inquiry.

That leads to the most important point in my deliberately brief speech—the establishment of inquiries by Governments.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I know that the hon. Gentleman is trying to be brief and I shall not delay him for long, but, because he was not present when the debate started, he may not understand that the problem is that we are not pursuing an inquiry.

Mr. Luff: I understand that point, but I want to raise the point of principle—these issues could have serious implications. In his letter to the Foreign Secretary dated 11 June, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee stated:

"The Committee rejects the principle, implicit in your current position, that the establishment of a Government enquiry in a particular area precludes the supply to a Select Committee of factual material which may also fall within the scope of that enquiry. No area of Government expenditure, administration or policy can be 'ring-fenced' from parliamentary scrutiny by the establishment of a Government enquiry, however eminent are those conducting it."

That is the most important question that hon. Members face this evening.

The House must remain sovereign and its Select Committees must remain sovereign to determine their own agenda—no matter what may be happening in the Executive or in the wider world—and subject only to the rules of sub judice.

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman was unable to be present earlier and he has given his apology, but he may be unaware that many examples were given, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), of a number of Select Committees being involved in constant disputes with Departments during the previous Parliament, when the hon. Gentleman's party was in power. Departments would not supply information that Select Committees wanted and, although some of those disputes occurred when the hon. Gentleman was a Member of Parliament, I cannot remember his protesting about them in the House.

Mr. Luff: No party has a monopoly of virtue on this issue and I do not want to trade party points on it. I understand what the hon. Gentleman says—I have some sympathy for it—but we have to establish the point of principle that the Legg inquiry must not be used as a precedent to prevent Select Committee from looking into certain subjects. There is a risk that that will happen.

Select Committees must be free to determine their own agenda and should not be told by the Government that they are not free to pursue inquiries because the Government have conducted or are conducting inquiries. That could be the implication of the issues that we are discussing and my Committee has been faced with that dilemma.

The Government have established an inquiry into bovine spongiform encephalopathy, which has won a freedom of information award, of which Sir Nicholas Phillips is rightly very proud, for use of the internet. I regularly follow the BSE inquiry on the internet: it is a fine inquiry, but it should be with £10 million or so to spend. My Committee has a budget for staff and other ancillary costs of about a third of a million pounds a year—to do all our work. We could not possibly match the BSE inquiry, so we did not even have a decision to take: such a well-resourced inquiry would always outshine anything that we could produce.

That brings me back to the resourcing of Select Committees, which is important. If the Government had put the BSE inquiry out to competitive tender, my Select Committee might have bid for it and perhaps carried it out at lower cost than the Phillips inquiry. Like every other Select Committee member who has spoken in the debate, I am intensely proud of the staff who serve us. That unites hon. Members: we are well served by the Clerks and their assistants and we should thank them publicly for the work they do.

The debate has highlighted three important matters. First, we agree as a House that Select Committees should have increased powers. That would be a good thing which would build on the reform established by the previous Government. I am glad that this Government are taking that process forward. Secondly, we also agree that we need to increase resources if we are to do our job well and effectively, although that is a problem. Thirdly, the simple message that the House must send out in the vote this evening is that Select Committees should be free to set their own agendas; they should not have them determined by the Executive.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) for the handsome apology that he offered for his unavoidable absence at the beginning of the debate. He mentioned me during his apology. I have no complaint whatever about being the last Back Bencher to be called to speak; you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be able to confirm that I have spoken frequently in the House this year, mainly about Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) was, to a large extent, correct when he intervened on the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire to say that we are not conducting an inquiry. I differ slightly from my hon. Friend on this issue. The Committee, which is deeply divided not only on votes on the Chairman's draft report but on other matters, has drifted into an ad hoc examination of what I have described as a deeply disquieting affair.

Not long ago, Sir John Kerr appeared before the Select Committee to discuss expenditure. I asked him about the cost of the new embassy in Moscow and said that, at £81.35 million, it was costing more than our new Scottish Parliament. He replied that, as a Glaswegian, he knew that security risks in Edinburgh are not as high as they are in Moscow. I wanted to ask why some of that money was not spent on employing more representatives down by way of the Caspian sea, but we drifted into another examination into Sierra Leone.

The Committee is deeply divided. The hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin), who is no longer in the Chamber, talked about consensus and unanimity, both of which are utterly absent from the Select Committee. I speak as a member of the Committee. I have demanded formal votes on a number of issues during the Committee's proceedings. I make no complaint about that.

In case anyone thinks that I am a stooge of the Whips Office, perhaps I may explain. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) is not in the Chamber at the moment, but I nominated him to chair the Committee, much to the anger of the then Deputy Chief Whip, Don Dixon, who, like me, is a former shipwright. He gave me a shipwright's interview after that particular Committee meeting. Thus my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale owes his position to me and others who supported me when I nominated him.

My colleagues on the Committee know where I stand on the Legg report: we drifted into that absurd inquiry. I have always demanded that a comprehensive, thorough inquiry should start when the Legg report is published. The Foreign Secretary should appear before the Committee to be cross-examined on its findings and recommendations. When that happens—hopefully in about three weeks' time—we may find that we can reveal inadequacies in the Legg inquiry. My hon. Friends and others on the Committee may then be willing to listen to my advocacy of a comprehensive investigation once the Legg committee has reported.

I am pleased that there has been some support for my view that it is much better—for hon. Members and the public—for a Minister to be cross-examined by intelligent members of a Select Committee than for a debate to be initiated in the Chamber. I heard a Committee Chairman—a former Minister—say that it is the easiest thing in the world to brush people off when one is at the Dispatch Box. It is impossible for a Back Bencher to cross-examine a Minister in a debate because if it is a popular debate the Speaker will impose a 10-minute limit on speeches. In a Select Committee hearing, however, there is no way a Minister or an official can dodge the column. He or she is there to be cross-examined, and that is what I want to happen later this month. I want the Foreign Secretary, perhaps accompanied by Sir John Kerr, to give evidence once we have copies of the Legg report before us.

I established some time ago that the Legg inquiry is utterly different from a judicial inquiry. In a question that I put to Sir John Kerr on 9 June, which appears on page 9 of the minutes of evidence, I said that he would surely agree with me that

> "With regard to the status of the Legg enquiry I take on board what you have said and the seriousness with which you made those observations but the Legg enquiry, is it not, is utterly different . . . from, say, the enquiry into Bloody Sunday which is being conducted by Lord Saville".

That inquiry begins its public proceedings in Derry on 20 July if the families do not walk away from it because of the sparseness of legal representation that Saville has proposed for them—but that is another story. Lord Saville is accompanied by two international jurists from New Zealand and Canada. That inquiry is utterly different from Legg, as I said on 9 June.

I told Sir John Kerr that, in the interests of natural justice, I did not want to be a party to an ad hoc inquiry that damaged the interests of officials who faced a judicial tribunal or some form of disciplinary action.

I agree with what has been said about the need to maintain the independence of Select Committees. The comment made by the hon. Member for Romsey—that Select Committees should offer advice to Ministers on alternatives—was strange. Select Committees must remain independent of the Executive. I cannot see how the role of critic and adviser can be mixed.

In general terms, I agree with much of what has been said about the role of Select Committees vis-a-vis the Executive. I shall not be a Member of the Scottish Parliament—the wife may be and perhaps someone's son will be—but I want Back-Bench Committees in that Parliament to have the power to cross-examine the First Minister. I want the same to happen in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Ms Abbott: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend will have to be patient for a moment, because I am in full spate—speaking as a trout fisherman.

We have heard some Holy Willie speeches about the goodness and rightness of some members of the Committee. We also heard a remarkably fine speech—hon. Members will forgive me for focusing on one speech—by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). He warned us about the danger facing Committees—particularly the Foreign Affairs Committee—of falling into disrepute. I am glad that he has regained his place. I listened to him carefully. He is right about sustained leaking—not that that is happening in the Foreign Affairs Committee. The divisions in that Committee could bring it into disrepute. The classic example of that was the Scottish Affairs Committee between 1982 and 1987. Despite the remarkable efforts of Mr. David Lambie, the then Chairman, there were leaks from that Committee all the time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West will remember the Scott Lithgow inquiry, which examined a shipyard in my constituency that faced collapse with the loss of 5,500 jobs. There were 99 Divisions on the Chairman's draft report, which was not very long. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne laughs. I said, "Let's go for the century and get into the Guinness book of parliamentary records." That report, which could have been substantial, was ridiculed when it was published.

As a member of the Committee—not that I was a leaker, you understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I moved a motion for a minority report because I was so disgusted by the way in which members of the Government were behaving. I seem to recall that one was the late Nicholas Fairbairn—I should now be murmuring, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum". He and others, including Mr. Forsyth, set out to wreck what could have been a good report.

Ms Abbott: I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend's speech. I think that he may be in danger of giving the House a mistaken impression. Earlier, he suggested that there was some opposition on the Foreign Affairs Committee to the notion that it should take evidence from the Foreign Secretary after the publication of the Legg report.

I do not think that anyone ever opposed the taking of evidence from the Foreign Secretary after publication of the report; in fact, it goes without saying that the Committee would take evidence on a major report of that kind. The point at issue was whether we should close down the inquiry until Legg had reported—given that, at that point, we did not know whether the inquiry would finish in the summer or the autumn.

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend clearly was not listening diligently enough. I referred earlier to my questions to Sir John Kerr. I said that the Committee could be trusted with the telegrams. In fact, I was complimented by the Chairman of the Committee on getting to the heart of the matter.

I think that the famous, or infamous, telegrams should be scrutinised by members of the Committee. I disagree with the Chairman, who suggested that two Committee members should go to the Foreign Office so that the accuracy of the summary of the telegrams could be assessed; I believe that three should go there. I suggested that to the Chairman when I sought to amend his memorandum. I think that two Labour members and one Opposition member should go to the Foreign Office to check the accuracy of the summary. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) was not present when I said that.

Let me tell the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that no one has attempted to bully me. Let us get that straight: no one in the House could bully me. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—an old friend—on the rare occasions when I vote against the Government, I always inform the Chief Whip first. We are two courteous fellows, my hon. Friend and me.

I think that the most important speech was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. What I want to avoid is the possibility of the Committee's falling into disrepute. I do not want what happened to the Scottish Affairs Committee to happen to us. After the publication of the Scott Lithgow report, that Select Committee took on some of the appurtenances of a Standing Committee: it was Labour versus Conservatives. Occasionally a few Liberals attended, but we know what certain parties—the Scottish National party and others—are like in terms of poor attendance. In any event, the discussion became very adversarial.

The Gartcosh report is another example. Mr. Forsyth—later Sir Michael—said at one meeting at which we were debating a draft report, "I will go for 24 hours on this." Journalists said to us, "This is mad: this is not what a Select Committee should be doing." We should at all costs avoid such a fate.

I must finish my speech before I upset the Front Benchers, but let me say one more thing. I reminded Sir John Kerr and the Foreign Secretary that, as can be seen in subsection (j) of paragraph 28 of the ministerial code,

"Every effort should be made to avoid leaving significant announcements to the last day before a Recess."

I said that I wanted the Legg report to be published long before the recess so that we could have the Foreign Secretary in front of us to be cross-examined on the report's findings. My view is that we should have a statement from the Dispatch Box—presumably on the day the report is published—followed by a meeting of the Select Committee at which the Foreign Secretary is cross-examined, followed by a full day's debate. Members could then have, in preparation for that debate, the Legg report and the Foreign Affairs Committee's special report on the evidence session with the Foreign Secretary. That is the way I should like things to proceed. I suspect that they will not proceed in that way.

I deeply regret the divisions in the Select Committee. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne is right: a majority and a minority report were not worth much. It is much better to aim for unanimity and consensus and I hope that, in future, the Select Committee can aim for unanimity and even a modicum of harmony among its members. That is a long shot at the moment, but this is an important Select Committee. It is no more important than others perhaps, but it is in danger of being ignored by the House and the outside world, and that would be a matter for profound regret.

By all means let us examine the telegrams. I should like to be one of those who go along to the Foreign Office to assess the accuracy of what has been given to all members of the Select Committee. I suspect that other good and honourable members will be chosen, but that offer is there. I voted against that paragraph in the report when it was put forward as an amendment; it became paragraph 6. I will vote against the motion because we have now obtained concessions from the Foreign Secretary.

It might have been better if we had decided as a Select Committee to carry out a thorough investigation of this deeply disquieting affair, but I believe the opportunity is still with us. The Foreign Secretary—I am delighted to see him coming in for my final words—has, I believe, offered to come in front of us; I think that one date is 28 July. I hope that, before that date, Sir Thomas Legg will publish his report so that we can cross-examine the Foreign Secretary on its findings. From there, the Committee—who knows?—might reach a unanimous decision to go ahead with a comprehensive investigation into this affair.

9.22 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I think that we all agree with the closing words of the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) expressing the hope that the Select Committee will be able to come to some unanimous conclusions, but we must begin by considering why this debate has been held. It has been a very good debate. It has been extremely useful and it has achieved something, but it has been held because of two sentences in two reports by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee.

In their first special report, the Select Committee's members had as their final comment the simple words:

"The views of the House are sought."

In their second special report, they ended their sixth paragraph with these clear, emphatic words:

"The views of the House are sought at an early date."

The Leader of the House well knows that, for some weeks now, we have been requesting a debate, so that the House's views could indeed be ascertained. I regret that she did not feel able to find the time. It was only because she did not feel able to do so that we, for the House as a whole, decided to devote this Opposition day to this subject. Although there are some hon. Members who have regretted that, I do not think that there are many because, coming through all the speeches, although there have been differences of emphasis and degree, have been two strong points. First, there is a desire on both sides of the House to see the Select Committee system work. Secondly, there is a recognition that the debate has achieved something.

We can feel justified in choosing this subject by the exchange of letters we have seen today—I am glad to see the Foreign Secretary on the Front Bench. We are all grateful to the Foreign Secretary for what he said in the letter of 6 July and everyone in the House is grateful to the Chairman of the Select Committee for agreeing that the documents should be made available to every Member of the House.

Since the Foreign Secretary is present, I can tell him that there is one point in the 6 July letter which causes me some concern. The letter states:

> "I will not be able, before the completion of the report, to disclose information on matters that may fall within Sir Thomas Legg's remit."

I hope that that does not negate the rest of the letter. I take the letter to be a genuine attempt by the Foreign Secretary to move towards the Select Committee. I hope that that is the case and I trust that there will be smoother progress henceforth.

We have heard some remarkable speeches in the debate, but none so remarkable as that made by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott). It was an absolutely masterly and courageous speech. She spoke without fear or favour and she spoke as a Member of the House of Commons. As I listened to her I could not help but remember some of my experiences some years ago when I found myself frozen out on certain Select Committees. I was not nominated to chair a Committee that I had hoped to chair, and so on. I hope that that fate will not befall her. She is an outstanding parliamentarian and she reminded us that we are all, first and foremost, Members of Parliament.

The trouble today is that so many come here with the ambition to serve in government and they tend to forget that the prime role of Parliament is to hold the Executive to account and to scrutinise, not only their legislation, but their actions. That is the reason behind the creation of the departmental Select Committees. From the start, they have laboured under severe limitations. They have never had the power to ensure that their reports are debated on the Floor of the House. As my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) reminded us in his excellent speech, the power of the Committee of Selection has occasionally militated against the expressed desire of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) that Committees should be unanimous. Obviously, it is only by selecting men and women of proven judgment and independence of mind that one can have a Select Committee that will really perform its function.

In spite of all the imperfections, the Select Committee system, as established in 1979, has a remarkable record. However, it cannot work if blocks are placed upon discussions or investigations by the withholding of material that is vital to a Committee's inquiries. That has come through in every speech that we have heard.

We are not, and have not been, discussing when or even whether or by whom arms were supplied to a small west African country. I do not suppose there is a single hon. Member who does not believe that the collapse of the military regime was, in the words of "1066 and all that", A Good Thing. What is most emphatically a bad thing is the refusal of Ministers to allow Select Committees proper access to information that they need to conduct their investigations and to prepare proper reports for the House. We have to remind ourselves that they are Select Committees of the House and that they are answerable, not to the Executive, but to the House. If I can paraphrase the words of Burke in his famous address to the electors of Bristol, Select Committees owe the House their industry and their judgment. They should never be cowed by any Executive.

The survival of our parliamentary democracy depends on a certain amount of tension. The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, was extremely honest about that. Those of us who have served on Select Committees while our parties have been in government know that there is some tension between one's loyalty to the House and the Select Committee and one's natural loyalty to party. That came out particularly well in the speech of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay). No one could say that he is anything other than a very notable parliamentarian. He made his support—indeed, his affection—for the Foreign Secretary very plain; he is a great supporter of the Foreign Secretary. Therefore, he had a certain amount of mental turmoil to overcome in voting as he did, and we honour him the more for that.

The other thing about Select Committees is that although they have an underlying tension, they also depend on an underlying trust. Without that, there can be no accepted ground rules and no properly functioning official channels. If the Executive of the day decides to use its majority in a steamroller fashion, it is not just the Opposition who will be crushed, but the whole mechanism by which Parliament functions.

The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington made that point explicitly when she talked about the vast majority that the Government currently enjoy. I think back to 1983 when the Conservative Government had not quite as large a majority, but nevertheless a large majority. An arrogance crept in—there is no doubt about that—and we made some very real mistakes. I frequently found myself in the opposite Lobby from my party and it was not a pleasant experience. I say to Labour Members—but not those on the Treasury Bench because they have a particular function—that they must hold this Executive to account, just as they sought to hold us to account when we were in government.

It is for all those reasons that we felt it necessary to table the motion. It is why I hope that, even at this late stage, the Government will feel able to accept it. The Leader of the House said in her opening speech that she had been minded—I must not distort her words, she said "tempted"—to accept the motion. I would like her, for once, to yield to temptation. She is not a yielding sort—she has great strength of character and she is not easily persuaded to adopt a course different from that upon which she has set herself. However, it would be a good thing—and the Parliamentary Secretary may be able to enlighten us on this when he replies—if the Government said, "Let us all, in the interests of Parliament as a whole, accept the motion and not divide the House."

There were 17 speeches from the Back Benches. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) performed a signal service in the way that he conducted himself on the Select Committee. I am glad to see Labour Members nodding in agreement. My right hon. Friend has behaved as a true House of Commons man. He was right to quote "Erskine May" and say that it is a key right of Select Committees to require witnesses to answer questions.

I have already thanked the hon. Member for Swansea, East for making the letters available. Although he made it plain that if there were a vote he would go into the opposite Lobby from us, he also made it plain that he believed that the Foreign Secretary had moved some considerable distance as a result of the report and the calling of this debate. Perhaps the whole sorry business that has brought us here tonight was best summed up in two words used by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who called it an "inglorious episode".

There was a very thoughtful speech, as we have come to expect, from the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. No hon. Member has served Parliament better than he. He has been a distinguished Chairman of the Public Accounts Select Committee. He is now Chairman of the Liaison Committee, and speaks with great wisdom and long experience. I agree with him emphatically that it is most persuasive and always desirable if a Select Committee can speak with a united voice. However, on this occasion, for very honourable reasons, two—in some Divisions, three—Labour Members on the Committee did not feel that they could go along with a certain proposed line and therefore did not.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Sometimes four.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Yes; I accept that correction from the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), who made a very entertaining speech, in which he said that he felt that some of his colleagues were trapped in an "obsessional loop". I am not quite sure what that means, although he will undoubtedly be able to explain what he meant by that to his colleagues in the Lobby—if they go into the same one. He also defended himself for using a certain procedural device—which was an entirely legitimate thing to do. However, I thought that it was a rather weak defence to say, "Please, your honour, it wasn't the first time in 60 years that it had been used—it was the second time." That did not seem to be a terribly strong defence.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley)—the most elegant of gamekeepers turned poacher—spoke with quiet passion on the importance of Select Committees. I am sure that, in her new role on the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, she will prove to be an increasingly valuable member of it.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Patrick Cormack: I have only a few minutes. I nearly always do give way, but—if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me—I want to give the Minister proper time to reply to the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) gave a very balanced assessment of Select Committees. He said that we had probably shot the fox—I think he is right—and we are glad about that. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) did not agree with that, and said that we should not have chosen this debate. Yet almost every word he uttered proved that we had been exceptionally wise so to do.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) delivered, as he always does, an inimitably witty speech, full of literary allusions and cricketing analogies that had the House hugely entertained. He, too, is a great House of Commons man.

At the risk of embarrassing the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood)—he is not in the Chamber at the moment—I should say that the House owes him a great debt for the way in which he has presided over the European Legislation Select Committee, to which he referred.

We heard speeches also from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff)—straight back from the royal show, and now Chairman of the Agriculture Select Committee—and from the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman), who always speaks feelingly on these matters.

As our system of parliamentary democracy has evolved, battles have occasionally been fought with an overmighty Executive. In the 16th and 17th centuries, absolute monarchs came to realise the need of working with and then through the House. In the 18th century, the battle continued. Perhaps the most remarkable episode in that century came about in 1780, when a Colonel Dunning tabled a motion, which was passed, stating that the power of the Crown has increased, is increasing and ought to be diminished—[Interruption.]

The Leader of the House should contain herself and listen. We are debating, not the power of the Crown, but the power of an overmighty Executive. It is all very well for the Government to luxuriate in a majority of 179, but the fact is that an Executive that becomes overweening and overmighty not only sows the seeds of its own destruction but does great damage in the process.

Dr. Godman: Like the poll tax?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Yes, as we did with the poll tax. The hon. Gentleman knows what I did on the poll tax on every occasion.

Today, we do not have at our command the elegance of the 18th century wits. We no longer cite in evidence Drapier's letters; we are reduced to Mr. Draper's mobile telephone. What we—most of us, I hope—do have in common with our forebears is a passionate desire to preserve this institution. On the future of this institution the freedoms of our country still rest, and there is no more valuable part of Parliament now than our Select Committee system. We damage it at our peril and to the detriment of those who send us here and whom we seek to serve.

The Leader of the House said that she was tempted to accept the motion. We were tempted to say that we would not press it to a vote, but there is still a gap between us. We believe it is important that we should send a warning and that certain hon. Members should be given the opportunity to stand up and be counted in support of the Select Committee system. It is therefore with great reluctance but total determination that we shall go into the Lobbies at the end of this debate and, in so doing, feel that we are not dividing the House, but voting for Parliament.

9.40 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): It is with some pleasure that I ask the House to vote against the Opposition motion and support the amendment in the name of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. We have had a wide-ranging but not especially enlightening debate. However, it has left me in good humour, as the speeches of Conservative Members were so soporific.

I have to make at least some reference to the way in which the debate came about. I have asked myself what was the purpose of this debate. Increasingly, as the long hours have worn on, it struck me that it is something akin to a family squabble. It is as if the members of the Select Committee cannot agree among themselves and have transferred the arguments to the Floor of the House. Indeed, I often felt like an intruder in that family squabble. Hon. Members from all quarters have made the same point.

I must respond immediately to various remarks that have been made. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) made a number of valuable points, which assisted my understanding of what has being going on in the Select Committee. He said that there was "confusion between the two compromises"

I would argue that the confusion is certainly not with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary or with his Ministers at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The confusion has been among the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling waxed lyrical about accountability to the House. I cannot think of anyone who has striven more gallantly and valiantly to be accountable, not only to the House as a whole but to the Select Committee, than my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling said that the Foreign Secretary had been perfectly within his rights to take up successive positions, and nothing that I have heard today has persuaded me otherwise. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the Foreign Secretary had gone much further than the Pergau precedent.

The subject matter of the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, seemed rather arcane to many of us. Nevertheless, it seems that the most appropriate place to deal with the differences of opinion that obtained in the Select Committee ought surely to be the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons. It could resolve the correct way forward, not just for the Foreign Affairs Committee but for other Select Committees. He also raised the issue of accountability and said that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had gone much further than the Select Committee in effecting a compromise. I have to agree with him and repeat the message that the disagreement is among hon. Members. We shall deal later with the analogy used by the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) when we talk about the game that is being played. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) made a similar point.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) described Sir Thomas Legg rather disparagingly, if I may say so, as a mandarin, as if that in itself were a pejorative term. Sir Thomas Legg is an outstanding public servant, and any imputation against either his impartiality or his ability to deal with a complex situation is to be deplored. He is attended by another equally eminent and impartial figure in Sir Robin Ibbs. The hon. Gentleman's entire speech was ruined by what I considered to be an attack on civil servants, whom he strangely accused of being guilty only of following the instructions of Ministers. Civil servants do follow the instructions of Ministers and they have their own code of conduct. Anyone who has experience of working with civil servants will know that their sense of probity and the way in which they conduct themselves and their careers are mainly beyond reproach, although there may be exceptions.

I agree with my right hon. and hon. Friends who said that, for us at least, the high point of today's debate was the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who is well regarded as an expert on Select Committees. As he said, he has been a member of Select Committees ever since they were set up and he was certainly an eminent Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. He said that it was a shame—and he used that word—to see a Select Committee divided. He effectively made the point that this was not the place for such divisions to be resolved.

The right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) is not in his place. I wish he were, because some people say that he is a little arrogant, but I disagree. I find him very arrogant. His comments about the arrogance of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary are absolute nonsense. The right hon. Gentleman and many other Opposition Members need to divest themselves of the notion that they have some kind of political droit du seigneur in respect of who Select Committees can and cannot summon. They have not yet been able to demonstrate that Select Committees have that right. They do not. As has been said, it may be desirable. Indeed, it may be a future development, but to express the opinion that because my right hon. Friend acted in a responsible manner, he was somehow being arrogant beggars belief.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West gave an honest and in my view impartial account of the problems experienced in the Select Committee when he referred to the games that some people were playing.

I am afraid that I cannot take seriously some of the comments by the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), who sanctimoniously sang the praises of the rights of Select Committees. If memory serves me correctly – and I stand to be corrected—when the right hon. Lady was Secretary of State for Health, a member of the then Select Committee, Mr. Jerry Hayes, the former Member for Harlow, leaked a report to the right hon. Lady and had to resign from the Select Committee as a result–

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Kilfoyle: No.

Mrs. Bottomley rose—

Mr. Kilfoyle: No. I will not give way.

Mrs. Bottomley rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The right hon. Lady cannot remain standing—the Minister is obviously not giving way. The right hon. Lady must sit down.

Mrs. Bottomley rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Lady must sit down. I am ordering her to be seated, please.

Mrs. Bottomley: In that case, I shall leave.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is up to the right hon. Lady.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not an invariable convention in the House that when one hon. Member not only names another, but positively launches an attack on her, he always gives way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for the Chair. What is a matter for the Chair is that when I give an order for an hon. Member to be seated, that hon. Member must be seated.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I had not even finished what I was saying, but it seems academic now.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) commented, on a point of order, that the Select Committee on European Legislation had been refused the opportunity to refer certain matters to a Standing Committee. I rebut that. It was the Select Committee that changed its mind about referring matters to the Standing Committee. It is important that that should go on the record.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) is a singular individual. I am sorry that I was unable to persuade him on another occasion to vote in a certain way. I am sure that tonight he will see the sense of the Government's amendment to the Opposition motion, and I know that he will support us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) made the point, which seems to have escaped the notice of several hon. Members, that there is at times a problem of secrecy with Select Committees. Some right hon. and hon. Members acknowledge that, but others act as if Ministers did not sometimes have to face the problem of how to deal with Select Committees. That must be recognised by all concerned.

The hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) made a constructive contribution on the possible development of the role of Select Committees. He asked how advice to Ministers should be construed. I would construe it with great circumspection.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) rightly pointed out the importance of the debate, but I should tell her to beware of Tories bearing gifts of support. It is a poisoned chalice, make no mistake about it. She referred to the Foreign Secretary being forced to change his mind about his response to the Select Committee. I can only say to my hon. Friend that if a Secretary of State does not wish to give information, that information will not be forthcoming.

If my hon. Friend needs confirmation of that, I refer her to the Trade and Industry Committee's third report of Session 1995–96, paragraph 168, which refers to the former President of the Board of Trade. The Committee remarked:

"We regret that the Government was not willing to allow the Committee, or even a single member of the Committee—a Privy Councillor and former Foreign Office Minister—to inspect the original intelligence reports."

That is obduracy from a Secretary of State.

Mr. Mackinlay: That does not make it right.

Mr. Kilfoyle: It certainly does not make it right, as my hon. Friend says from a sedentary position. That is why my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has offered time and again to compromise with the Select Committee.

I agree with the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) that the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster made a witty contribution based on an analogy with the game of cricket. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) pointed out that the Opposition had scored an own goal in the debate. What came to mind was the own goal scored by Colombia in 1994, and we know what happened to the player who put that own goal into his net. I hope that the same does not happen to any Opposition Member.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) made a general contribution on the role of Select Committees and raised again the Tory myth about resources for the Select Committees. There may indeed be a huge problem of resources, but it is not a problem for the Government. That is a matter for the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not blame this Government for the situation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) presented a reasoned, sensible approach to a mutually acceptable resolution of the difficulties faced by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire told us lots and lots about what we are not discussing. I am always amazed by his comments. Hon. Members are depicted as good Members of the House as long as they agree with the Conservative Opposition. He said that we should begin by asking why the debate had been held. I prefer the views of those of my hon. Friends who have said that some people are playing a game. The Tories are not interested in the way in which Select Committees are constituted, or in the powers of the Secretary of State or Ministers vis-à-vis particular Select Committees, but in scoring cheap political points.

For example, the hon. Gentleman referred to the alleged inability of the Leader of the House to find time for today's debate. We have had today's debate now, and I did not see many Opposition Members enjoying any stage of it. The Opposition could have chosen a half-day debate, but instead they chose a full day's debate on something that has turned out to be a damp squib.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) started off with a whimper and ended up with a sigh—at least, there was certainly a sigh of relief on Government Benches. The right hon. Gentleman made no impact and added nothing to our understanding of the issues before us.

What we are saying to the Foreign Affairs Committee is simple; it is "Not yet," rather than "No." There is nothing unusual about a Select Committee awaiting the outcome of a specific formal inquiry. There is nothing unusual about the Government deferring answers until such an inquiry has reported. The previous Government declined to answer parliamentary questions about arms to Iraq while the Scott inquiry was being held.

The present Government are committed to being open with Parliament. We are not trying to frustrate the Foreign Affairs Committee's inquiry in any way. The Committee could look at the relevant telegrams in private now, and Ministers will answer outstanding questions when Legg has reported. The only issue is whether there should be public disclosure, before Legg reports, of part of the evidence that Legg is considering.

The Legg report will be published. We want that inquiry to do a proper job and to report soon, and it cannot do so if those involved also have to answer questions in a parallel inquiry by the Select Committee. We fully respect Select Committees' right to ask for information. That is at the very heart of the way in which Parliament works, with individual Members, Select Committees and the House collectively seeking information.

Select Committees have the powers that the House gives them. They cannot be more powerful than the House itself. The House debated Sierra Leone on 18 May and agreed a resolution that included approval of the Government's commitment to an urgent outside investigation and publication of a full report. The Chairman of the Select Committee said that "it would be unwise to attempt to duplicate or parallel the inquiry"

Those are his words, not mine. He also said that if the Legg inquiry were conducted in public,

"such an inquiry would take a long time" [Official Report, 18 May 1998, Vol. 312, c. 621.]

Those, too, are his words, not mine.

I hope that the Committee will now accept the opportunity, generously offered, to see the summary of the telegrams for which it has asked, on a well-precedented, confidential basis—named, ironically enough, the Pergau process, after an inquiry during the previous Administration that many in the House will remember well.

The Foreign Secretary has offered to appear before the Select Committee, and that may prove a way for the Committee to find its own way out of its difficulties—difficulties, I have to say, that the Committee itself has created.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John McFall and
Mr. David Jamieson.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House reaffirms that, in accordance with the House's Resolution of 19th March 1997 and the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Second Edition, January 1997), Ministers should be as open as possible with Parliament; recalls that the House approved on 18th May 1998 the Government's commitment to an urgent outside investigation and publication of a full report of the Sierra Leone arms investigation; believes that nothing should be done to prejudice the conduct of that inquiry by premature public disclosure of parts of the evidence; and notes that the Foreign Secretary remains ready to make available to the Foreign Affairs Committee, on a confidential basis, the telegrams it has requested.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When a Minister makes an allegation about a fellow Member, particularly when it is entirely without substance, is it not a convention to allow the Member concerned to have some redress or to make some comment, especially if the Minister is responsible for open government?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can inform the right hon. Lady that regardless of whether there is an allegation, if an hon. Member is mentioned by any hon. Member, whether it be a Minister or a Back Bencher, it is the convention that the hon. Member who made the allegation gives way. However, it is not an enforceable convention. The Chair cannot enforce it. I know that the incident to which the right hon. Lady is referring happened shortly before the vote. Perhaps it would have been helpful, when I suggested that the right hon. Lady be seated while I was standing, if she had resumed her place. We might then have been able to sort out the matter.

Mr. Kilfoyle: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) looks at the record tomorrow, she will see that when she was having an altercation with the Chair, I had not finished the point that I was trying to make. It became academic once she had left the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps we can move on to the next business.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it not be in conformity with the courtesies that most of us like to expect if the Minister gave an apology?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order and it is not a matter for me. [Interruption.] Order. The House must settle down. We have further Opposition business.

Social Security Regulations (Lone Parents)

10.15 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): I beg to move,

That the Social Security Amendment (Lone Parents) Regulations 1998 (S.I., 1998, No. 766), dated 16th March 1998, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th March, be revoked.

I am pleased that we are having this debate tonight on the regulations—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I appeal to hon. Members to leave the Chamber quietly.

Mr. Burns: I am pleased that we are having this debate on the regulations because they are a direct consequence of the rebellion last December when 47 Labour Members came off-message and voted against their Government on the decision to equalise the benefit system with regard to lone parents and married couples. If that rebellion had not taken place, I can assure the House that we should not be having this debate tonight.

It is worth looking further behind the wider issue before questioning some of the details of the regulations. Perhaps the area of our greatest domestic failure is in the system of welfare. There is a deep sense of dissatisfaction among recipients and Government alike about what welfare has become during the past 30 years and where it seems to be going. The rebellion on the lone parents policy last December typifies the tensions and conflicts that arise in any attempt to reform the system.

Welfare is many things to many people. To the recipient, it may be the difference between living and surviving. To the taxpayer, facing rising inflation and mortgage payments, it may be an unwarranted imposition on an already overburdened tax bill. The unchallengeable fact is that the bill is rising further every day. With this enormous public expenditure, it might be expected that the recipients would be satisfied, but they are not hence the problems last autumn when the Government proposed those changes to lone-parents payments.

Lone parents and other recipients of social security are as dissatisfied with the social security system as everyone else in Britain. To some, that may be considered gross ingratitude, or is it more a sign of how the welfare system has failed? What are we to make of a system that seems to satisfy neither the giver—in this case the taxpayer—nor the recipient, and which embitters all those who come in contact with it? More basically, welfare has done much to divide our people; to alienate us from one another. That is why, however tortuous their journey, I welcome the Government's conversion on the road to Damascus on the question of lone parents.

The root problem is in the fact of dependency and the feeling of uselessness and the despair of unemployment. No one would argue that the answer to the problem, and what would help lone parents, is work, jobs and self-sufficiency rather than—

Audrey Wise (Preston): Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House what his Government were doing for 18 years if the welfare system is the shambles and disgrace that he describes?

Mr. Burns: The problem with the welfare system—over those 18 years and before that—is that its cost has risen inexorably. Although more people are being given help, some of whom had previously been unable to get assistance, the system is still inefficient, riddled with fraud and not targeted properly. That causes the tensions between taxpayers and the recipients of welfare, who all too often think that they should get a better deal from the system. [Interruption.] I shall return to discussing the system; the Minister for Welfare Reform, who is good at intervening from a sedentary position, should listen for a moment.

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): Will the hon. Gentleman answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise)?

Mr. Burns: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman was listening. I said to the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) that the problem with the welfare system is that its cost has risen inexorably—year after year, and during those 18 years and before that. Recipients of welfare, many of whom have been brought into the system by the Government expanding the basis—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman should listen; he may not want to intervene again. Many recipients are not happy with what they are receiving, because it is not properly targeted, and the taxpayer is similarly unhappy, as are the Government, because of the ever-increasing bills.

Mr. Field: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burns: No, I will not; I have answered the point.

It is a myth that all the problems of poverty and lone parents can be solved simply by an ultimate extension of the welfare system to guarantee everyone a certain income paid for by the Government. That cannot provide lone parents with a sense of self-sufficiency, self-respect and a job. To many people, work is a mundane and unglamourous word, but it is, in a real sense, the meaning of what we are all about. We need work as individuals, as a society and as a community, so we must ask whether the regulations will help to achieve that for lone parents.

Whatever the regulations achieve, it will not be as a result of a coherent and consistent approach to welfare reform by the Government. The regulations prescribe the circumstances in which lone parents will benefit from the family premium in council tax benefit, housing benefit, income support and jobseeker's allowance. Additionally, they introduce the concept of a 12-week eligibility criterion for maintaining the higher-rate premium in income support and JSA if a lone parent works for less than that period and then returns to the benefits system.

The Government are simply and cynically attempting to buy back some of the support that they lost among their Back Benchers and among the special interest groups that were misled and supported the Government at the previous general election. That led to the fiasco in December when, for the first time in this Parliament, some Labour Members had the guts to stick up for what they believe in, come off-message and go into the Lobby to vote against their Government.

Labour Members have been to-ing and fro-ing on this whole issue since my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) announced the policy of equalisation of benefits back in November 1996. The Government's flip-flop has been justified by various members of the Government, including the Prime Minister, as simply implementing a policy that they inherited, or as a policy to save money because of the constraints on public spending. If they really believe the latter, how much will the U-turn in the regulations cost, and what is the net gain to the Treasury from this exercise? I say it every time we have a debate, but perhaps in the run-up to a reshuffle, the Minister will change the habit of a lifetime and answer the questions tonight.

Similarly, do the Government appreciate the irony that, given their cost implications, the regulations completely undermine the initial savings that would have been made from the policy that was voted through the House in December, and totally destroy the argument that the Government made to their Back Benchers to try to justify their policy and stop them voting against the Government?

The Government justify their actions by claiming that the regulations will create an incentive to work. Do they not understand that, far from being an incentive to work, the regulations will be a disincentive for some lone parents? They encourage those with entitlement to the lone parent premium benefit to keep that benefit if they get a job, but work for less than 12 weeks. I suspect that a number of them will simply not bother to go down that route because of the hassle and bureaucracy that they will have to put up with. When they come out of the job after such a relatively short period, they will have to return to the Benefits Agency to reapply for their original benefit. I should be grateful to the Minister if he would explain what plans the Government have to minimise that bureaucracy and to counter the view that will be abroad with some lone parents that it will simply not be worth the candle.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burns: No. Time is limited in this debate.

Furthermore, the regulations fail to prevent abuse of the system. What will stop some people arranging contracts with unscrupulous employers to work for less than 12 weeks to protect their benefit status? It is unclear how the Government intend to prevent such potential abuse.

Mr. Field: You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Burns: The Minister may say that, but some lone parents may believe that the 12-week rule is a disincentive to get a job, whereas other lone parents and employers will abuse the system. It will not be the same people. After all, some 962 lone parents are currently on income support so there will be wide variations in behavioural patterns.

Mr. Field: There are more than 962.

Mr. Burns: There are 962,000. Once again, the Minister is displaying to the House the breadth of his knowledge of the welfare state. We are grateful to him for ensuring that we get the right number of noughts on the figure. We have now established, without making a big meal of it, that there are 962,000 lone parents.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): You should have got it right the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may wish to get into the debate, but he cannot do so now.

Mr. Burns: On the minutiae of the rules and regulations on the 12-week period, why have the Government chosen 12 weeks? Why did they not make it a longer period—perhaps 12 months—to encourage more lone parents to seek full-time employment? Why was 12 weeks considered to be a magical, relevant or applicable period? Why could not the Government consider making the period longer to create a greater incentive for lone parents who may think that 12 weeks is too short a period and cannot be bothered with it? It would not be that costly to take such a measure and I wonder whether the Government have given any consideration to it.

The regulations neither create enough incentive to encourage some lone parents to take up permanent employment nor produce the savings for which the original cuts were passed in December, and about which the Government made such a big deal at that time, not least to their own Back Benchers.

As the Minister will know, 75 per cent. of lone parents totally disregard the invitations that they receive to attend a new deal interview. Only 2,017 lone parents have got jobs under the new deal, and 309—which is 15 per cent.—have since gone back on benefits because they have lost their jobs after a relatively short time. As the Department of Social Security's figures show, 1.4 per cent. of lone parents get jobs, over and above those outside the pilot areas. However, the figure can be reduced by 0.8 per cent., because 0.6 per cent. are leaving income support but are not going into work.

The new deal achieves only a 0.8 per cent. success rate, which is 201 lone parents at a total cost of £6.1 million. The taxpayer is spending about £24,000 per job. If the present trend continues, the £200 million that the Government plan to spend on the new deal for lone parents will help just 6,566 out of a possible 9,600—sorry, 9,600.

Mr. Field: The figure is 962,000.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. It will help 9,000—62,000.

Mr. Field: It is 962,000.

Mr. Burns: Thank you—962,000 lone parents. The regulations do virtually nothing to alleviate the problem. If the Government are not careful, the new deal and the regulations will become a policy paved with good intentions but, sadly, remembered for its failure to meet the expectations that it has aroused. It will be consigned to history as little more than an expensive experiment in soundbite politics.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I am delighted to have the chance to speak to the House briefly on this subject. I must confess that I was slightly surprised that the Conservative party had found this matter important enough to table a prayer. We had no intention of praying against the regulations, because we believe that they are an improvement on what has gone before. If the Conservative party chooses to call a vote on this issue, we shall vote with the Government. Although we believe that what the Government have done to lone parents generally is appalling—we have made that point on several occasions—at least the regulations amend the previous ones in the right direction.

It surprises me that the Conservative party chose to call for the debate and to force the issue on to the Floor of the House. Many other regulations that, to my mind, were much more important and controversial have been taken in Committee. Having heard the speech of the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), I am now even less sure about why this item has been brought to the Floor of the House.

The hon. Gentleman did not seem to be clear in his own mind about whether there would be a greater incentive to work as a result of the regulations, and they should therefore be further improved. He did not explain whether there should be a linking mechanism of 12 months or the shorter period being allowed. If he thinks that the regulations would not give any greater incentive, because the bureaucracy will be too great, does he believe that they should be scrapped? That is what the Conservative ex-Secretary of State suggested in his response to the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee, which discussed the proposed lone-parent regulations. At that time, the ex-Secretary of State made it clear that he did not think that there should be a linking mechanism. That question is still open, so perhaps when the Opposition spokesman winds up, he will say whether they agree with their ex-Secretary of State that a linking mechanism should not be introduced, or whether they think that it should be introduced and increased to 12 months. I think that there is much to be said for increasing the linking mechanism to 12 months. I agree that, as has been said, the cost must be comparatively small, and that an even greater incentive must be given to lone parents to take up work when it is available to them.

The arguments advanced by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford struck me as remarkably muddled. As he has accused the Labour Government of performing something of a U-turn, it will be interesting to see whether he now accepts the points made by the ex-Secretary of State in his response to the SSAC, or whether he himself, and his party, have performed a U-turn. If he and his party do not in the end choose to call for a positive vote against the regulations, in that sense they will have performed a U-turn. If they act in that way, it seems to me that they will have lost the opportunity to increase work incentives. I should have thought that the Conservative party would favour that.

As they stand, the regulations take up one of the two main recommendations made by the SSAC. That recommendation is divided into three parts, but I understand that all three are covered by the regulations, and I welcome that. However, the Labour party has not chosen to implement the second recommendation, which I consider a major fault in the regulations.

The other SSAC recommendation was there should be "a systematic study of relative costs, incomes and expenditures of lone parent and two parent families on benefit and in work. This should be carried out before the regulations"— the changes in lone-parent benefit—

"are proceeded with."

That is the recommendation of the SSAC, which neither the Labour party nor the Conservative party accepted when the regulations were first laid before the House. They should have accepted that recommendation.

I know that many Labour Members would have wanted the Government to do so, and it is a great pity that they did not take that on board. They would have saved themselves a lot of time and trouble if they had, and they would have won a lot of support in the community. It is a failure on the part of the Labour Government that they did not take up the recommendation then, and that they failed to take it up again this year when they made the change. I wish that they had, but at least the regulations go part of the way in the direction that the committee would have liked, and we shall support them tonight.

Audrey Wise (Preston): I think that I can offer an explanation of why the Conservative Opposition tabled the motion. I think that they are playing an elaborate and rather silly game—dancing some sort of minuet. I must tell the Opposition that, if they think that that will have any effect on Labour Members, they are entirely mistaken. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) wishes to intervene, by all means let him do so—but it appears that he has changed his mind.

If the Conservatives press the matter to a vote, they will again be voting on the wrong side. They voted on the wrong side in December, unfortunately, and they will have the honour and distinction of repeating their error if they call a Division tonight. It is clear that the regulations are an improvement on the status quo ante. It is a pity that they are necessary; it is a pity that the lone parent benefit was tampered with in the first place; but the fact that the Government are now introducing a 12-week linking period constitutes a considerable improvement.

I note that one of the hon. Member for West Chelmsford's main arguments against the 12-week linking period is that unscrupulous lone parents will abuse it.

Mr. Burns: And employers.

Audrey Wise: And employers. There are rather more unscrupulous employers, but the hon. Gentleman is attacking lone parents. Throwing in a sop—acknowledging that there are unscrupulous employers—will not do. If we follow him down his road, those who will suffer will be not employers, but lone parents, who will not have the opportunity to take work, to give it a try and to see if it works out, without suffering a penalty if it does not.

All sorts of things can happen when a lone parent seeks and takes a job. The child may find that it is not happy with the mother going to work. The mother may find that the child-care arrangements break down. The child may become ill. There may be more stress on the family than the parent had anticipated, so having an opportunity of a 12-week period in which the premium is not risked is a wholly good thing, compared with the previous arrangement, where there was to be no linking period.

Having complained about 12 weeks, the hon. Member for West Chelmsford expects us to believe that he is seriously proposing a year's linking period. I am interested that he did not say anything about that last December. He has never said anything about that until this evening. I am sure that, if the Government had brought forward that proposal, which I would have accepted and supported, he would have said, "Oh dear me. It is going to cost the taxpayer a great deal of money." All he and Conservative Opposition are doing tonight is proving their complete hypocrisy and lack of understanding of what the controversy about lone-parent benefits on the Labour Benches was all about.

Therefore, if the Conservatives call a vote, we win and they expose themselves as wanting to depress the standards of lone parents and take away this opportunity. If they do not call a vote, they expose themselves as being silly and hypocritical.

Mr. Rendel: Does the hon. Lady accept that one thing that the Conservatives have managed to do is unite the Labour rebels with their party?

Audrey Wise: I think that perhaps the Government Front-Bench team might owe the Conservatives some little debt of gratitude for that, but that is not the mainspring; that is not what motivates us. Their silly games have nothing to do with what we on the Labour Benches do. We consider the issues and the Government have given—well, I was going to say, "A crumb." Perhaps I will say, "Half a loaf."

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): A crust.

Audrey Wise: Yes, a crust. A compromise. I am not one to throw away a crust. Being of a very thrifty turn of mind, I accept all the crusts and crumbs that are going.

Any lone parents who get some glimmering of what the Conservative Opposition are playing at tonight will be thoroughly disgusted because those parents will want a linking period and the opportunity to take a job without being penalised, and they are certainly not scroungers and unscrupulous people, in the main.

Mr. Burns: Who said that they were?

Audrey Wise: I thought that one of the hon. Member's major objections to the regulations was that unscrupulous people would take advantage of them, take a job for 11 weeks, go back on full benefit for a little while and take another job for 11 weeks. That is the picture that the hon. Gentleman was painting. [Interruption.] Oh yes it was. "Unscrupulous," he called them. I say that lone parents are burdened with the difficult job of child rearing on their own. They have far too much and far too many serious things on their mind to go in for the sort of shenanigans and twisting that is more commonly found in the realm of tax evasion. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is judging lone parents and people on low incomes by the standards of those whose main characteristic is greed and who milk the tax system at every available opportunity.

I am happy to be able to assure my right hon. and hon. Friends that we will all be in the Lobby with the Government if the Opposition are silly enough to call a vote.

10.45 pm

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): There are often occasions when it strikes me that the House spends too long debating certain items of business. I do not want to detain the House any longer than is necessary to discuss this business.

The hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) made an effective speech in the debate about lone parent benefit cuts in December and has made another effective and important contribution to today's debate. She used an analogy about the Conservative party playing games and I shall continue with that for a little longer.

I do not believe that the lone parents I see in my constituency surgeries are playing games with their lives. They are not trying to find some devious dodge here and there to find something in the system that will advance their position and allow them to dodge here, there and everywhere. Most of the lone parents who come to see me are in very difficult circumstances and have come to their Member of Parliament for assistance as a place of last resort. They are usually looking for a way through a labyrinth of difficulties through which they cannot find a way themselves. The idea that lone parents will be rushing off to the public information sources in my constituency to look through the regulations to find a dodge that will enable them to prosper is an insult to people who live in difficult circumstances.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Surely the hon. Gentleman realises that we are not talking about dodges. In many constituencies, including mine, seasonal and part-time work are a way of life for many people. How will the regulations deal with that? What explanation have we had for that? My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) talked about having a longer period which would, effectively, stop that being an issue. The regulations do not take account of those factors.

Mr. Swinney: With great respect, I do not think that we heard anything from the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman that provided a better solution than the proposal before us. I was in the Lobby with the hon. Member for Preston and others in December. We have to recognise that this is a step forward from the material that we were faced with then, and we should consider the regulations in good faith.

A great deal was said by the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman about work incentives. We can look at these issues as work incentives or some form of work compulsion, but we heard nothing from the Conservative spokesman that would make it easier, more advantageous or appealing for lone parents to find their way into employment.

Much of what we have heard tonight has been about the systematic fraud of the benefit system that we are told is always going on. We heard much of that rhetoric in the origins of the benefit integrity project. Not surprisingly, in that analysis fraud has been found to have been much less of a factor than was thought. Obviously, if fraud exists in the system, it must be tackled and rooted out. It deprives those who are genuinely entitled to benefit.

However, I cannot accept the idea that somewhere out there are people in desperate circumstances, calculating their way through the system and that those individuals are in a majority. The regulations mitigate some of the harsher effects of the legislation that we were faced with at the tail end of last year and it is important that we do not take any steps tonight that would undermine the step forward that the regulations deliver.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I want to make a few brief remarks about the linking period of 12 weeks. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) that it is a step in the right direction. Perhaps the one serious question raised by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is why it is 12 weeks. The hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) made the important point that a lone parent might try a job only to find that the child care falls through. Perhaps 12 weeks is a reasonable time for such things to be determined one way or another.

The longer-term issue is the job market in short-term contracts. I hope that, in responding to the debate, the Minister will say what analysis his Department has made of the job market for entrants from unemployment or income support. What sort of jobs are available to them, and what sort of jobs do they take? Are they fixed-term contract jobs? Are they three months or six months contracts?

There are people in my constituency who are afraid to move off income support in case they lose help with their mortgage because the linking period is too short. They are offered a three-month contract job, but they cannot take it or they will lose help with their mortgage. It is exactly the same principle with the lone parent premium. I hope that the Minister will tell us what assessment he has made of the job market for lone parents who move into low-paid work and how long the contracts are for.

I put a paradox to the Minister. He may say that we have to draw the line somewhere, and that 12 months might cost too much money. I have to tell him that if there are no lone parents going into short-term contracts, it will not cost the Government anything; if there are lots of lone parents going into short-term contracts, 12 weeks is too short a period. I ask him to tell us what evidence he has used to decide on a period of 12 weeks and to consider making the period longer.

10.50 pm

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): The fact that no Conservative Back-Bench Members have risen to speak in the debate, together with the fact that so few of them are here, shows that the analysis by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) of the Opposition's motivation in bringing the debate to the Floor of the House is, in the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, absolutely right.

I will not detain the House for many moments more on what is a wholly unnecessary debate. However, in welcoming the Government's proposals and the reversal of the cuts in benefits for vulnerable families, I want to ask one question of my hon. Friend the Minister.

Last July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security published her response to the Social Security Advisory Committee's report. Although that report was in response to the proposals by the former Secretary of State, it was published in July under the name of this Government. At the time, the Government refused to accept both of the committee's recommendations. I regret their failure to act on that advice. Today, the Government are accepting one part of that advice. What made them change their mind?

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): It was interesting to listen to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones). As she rightly said, this is a reversal by the Government. The hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) must feel rather pleased that she has managed to move the Government quite so far along the rails. We want to know why it has happened and why they did not have the courage of their convictions to say so last December. Why have they decided on a period of 12 weeks? Hon. Members have already asked what evidence was used to decide that 12 weeks is the right period. The fundamental question is: where is the coherence that pulls together Government policy?

There is no doubt that the problems of lone parenthood are a serious and proper matter for the House to consider. It ill behoves the hon. Member for Selly Oak to try to undermine the Opposition for wanting to discuss it this evening. I was the deputy chairman of Childline, an agency involved in child protection. I tell the hon. Lady that this is a subject that I care a great deal about and in which I have been involved for a great deal of my professional career. It is inappropriate for her to criticise Opposition Members for allowing her to speak before they have had a chance to do so.

We should consider why the Government are today offering a proposal that was completely unavailable last December—when the Secretary of State repeatedly turned her face against Labour Back Benchers by refusing to hear their criticisms. I have no quarrel with the idea that all children should be treated equally—which is why I think that the previous Government's policy was right, and why I think that the new Government were right completely to change their policy in government from their policy in opposition. The Government completed their U-turn in December, by supporting the Conservative party's policy on the issue.

I say with no qualms that I fully admire the Secretary of State for very bravely standing at the Dispatch Box, with the hon. Member for Preston and other Labour Members behind her, and arguing the case that Conservative Members intelligently and coherently made when in government and which we continue to support today.

There is no question but that it is necessary to back lone parents. However, how do we most effectively back them? There is no question but that lone parenthood co-exists with all kinds of poverty in the United Kingdom. Almost 2.5 million children are raised in the United Kingdom in very difficult financial circumstances. How will we deal with that situation and change it? The question is not how we accept or alleviate the situation but how we make the situation better.

Conservative Members support the idea of getting people out of welfare and into work. However, I think that the Government's regulations will turn that policy on its head. Far from encouraging people from welfare into work, the regulations may—because of their ludicrous, arbitrary time limit—encourage people from work back into welfare. The Minister must today explain to the House why 12 weeks is the right time period.

Lone parenthood is a serious problem which very badly affects children. Security in a home is crucial. Although I am not saying that lone parents cannot provide security, I think that all hon. Members will accept that single parents very often have a tougher job—simply because he or she must face all sorts of problems that are more easily faced by families fortunate enough to have two parents.

I do not take a moral view on the subject. A modern, civilised society should not apply moral judgments to such families, for the very simple reason that such judgments have a very nasty habit of hurting the children. As I have argued, as a director of Childline, I am fundamentally concerned with protecting children.

I must ask whether the regulations are the right way of protecting children and of making their lives better. I again ask the Minister what has happened in the seven months since December to change Ministers' minds—so that they have gone from brazenly saying no to the 50 or 100 Back Benchers who wanted the policy changed in December, to holding a completely different policy today.

As the Secretary of State said in a previous debate on the issue,

"We are trying to ensure equality of opportunity for lone parents".

Equality in December; now, in July, it is inequality.

The Secretary of State boasted in that debate:

"Clause 70 of the Bill provides power to equalise rates of child benefit for lone parents and couple families."

Today, we are debating inequality for lone parents and couple families.

The Secretary of State also said:

"The lone mothers in my constituency say to me, 'We want to work—we do not want to be dependent on benefit'".—[Official Report, 10 December 1997; Vol. 302, c. 1086–89.]

Yet, in July, we are debating in the House measures that are applauded by the hon. Member for Preston—who has a very serious position on the issue, with which I do not agree but fully respect. As I said, I find myself at a loss to understand what has happened to change the Government's position.

It is a shame that the Secretary of State is not in the Chamber today to explain her position. It is interesting that she was prepared to be here last December, but that she is absent for this debate—in which we are considering a partial U-turn in the Government's policy. Where is the encourage of her convictions today? The answer is "somewhere else".

Mr. Rendel: I am getting just as confused about the hon. Gentleman's policy and what he wants as I was about what the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) said. A moment ago, the hon. Gentleman seemed to be arguing that a presumably infinite period should be allowed; now he is arguing that there should be no linking at all and that the time limit for lone parents should be cut at a stroke. The two arguments seem completely contradictory.

Mr. Woodward: I am grateful for that intervention because it gives me the opportunity to make very clear what I believe. The Government should be thinking creatively about more opportunities to get people off welfare and into work, but we are debating proposals which will take people out of work and put them back onto welfare. The time limit will be very bad. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) said, it will encourage some, not all, people to think about short-term contracts. It will not encourage them to think about ending their dependency. The danger is that, having sent one signal last December, the regulations will send a confused signal because they will encourage some people to fall back into dependency.

Dr. Lynne Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman has finished his speech.

11 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I do not want to continue the eulogy of my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) about the Secretary of State's performance last December. I thought then, and have no reason to change my opinion now, that the frailty of her arguments on that occasion was matched only by the inadequacy of their delivery.

The fundamental point in this debate is the acceptance by Conservative Members that the fortunate have a responsibility for the unfortunate. Let us be open and frank about saying that. We are debating not that principle, but how it is enacted in terms of public policy. The problem for the Government in this debate which seems to have been misunderstood by hon. Members around the Chamber, is the hypocrisy implicit in the proposals.

When the Government introduced this contentious policy last December, they did so on the ground of cost savings. If the proposals before us are put into practice, the cost savings will be substantially reduced, so the force of the argument that was used, which divided the House and the country and which brought so much criticism on the Government in this place and elsewhere, has now dissipated because the money will no longer be saved.

A second question that needs to be amplified is that if one is going to choose a time limit, on what basis does one choose it? Surely, it must be on the basis of a proper analysis of the sorts of jobs that lone parents are likely to get if they take work. The issue of short-term contracts and occasional, seasonal, part-time, informal and flexible work needs to be addressed, and I shall be expecting some concise, pithy and powerful arguments from the Minister.

Dr. Lynne Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I will, so long as the hon. Lady is not going to quote the Prime Minister again.

Dr. Jones: I shall make the point that I was going to make to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward). Does the hon. Gentleman think—perhaps this is the point that he is making—that, in these times of flexible labour markets, lone parents, and many other workers, do not have a choice about what kind of work they take?

[Dr. Jones]

They are often forced to take short-term contracts. Is the hon. Gentleman proposing that we should change that and remove those opportunities?

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention. The nub of this debate is the Government's hypocrisy, but if she wants a straight answer to that question, I shall give it. Because of the nature of the opportunities—or choices, as she calls them—given to them, the sorts of jobs that lone parents take are precisely those that I defined. In my area, for example, where there is relatively full but low-paid employment, lone parents seeking work will be disproportionately attracted to precisely those short-term, seasonal, occasional jobs with which the proposals do not cope. I accept the hon. Lady's point that the choices for lone parents are likely to be more limited, and that lone parents are consequently disproportionately likely to be driven to the sort of jobs that I described.

To give the hon. Lady a straight answer, I would like a longer period, as 12 weeks is inadequate. It is a figure plucked out of the air. It does not deal with the issues. At best, it is a palliative; a crust. It is an insult. It has even been described in this debate as crumbs. Are we being told to pat the Government on the back for throwing crumbs to lone parents? If we are, we ought to examine our consciences.

Mr. Rendel: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene for the third time. I am interested in his argument. We are considering the possibility either of going back to the original regulations, which had no linking time, or passing these, which have a linking time of 12 weeks. The hon. Gentleman seems to want longer than that. Will he vote against 12 weeks because it is worse than none at all?

Mr. Hayes: I take no advice about sitting on the fence and having it both ways from a party that has made a profession of doing just that. The question is whether it is better to support a measure that is impractical, unworkable and will not do what it claims to do and to put in place something that will not deliver the goods, or to remain with the status quo. That is an open question. It is a moot point. I suspect that the proposed 12-week period has been plucked from thin air because it costs the minimum that the Government thought they could get away with to pacify their critics in the House and elsewhere. I do not think that it is workable. We have not had answers to some of the key questions that even the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) was perceptive enough to pick up. Unless we have those answers tonight, I would be very surprised if hon. Members on either side of the House will support the Government if there is a Division at the conclusion of the debate.

11.6 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Keith Bradley): I should like to respond to the prayer against the regulations by putting the measure in context. I start by thanking all hon. Members who have spoken in tonight's short debate, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) for her important contribution.

The Government believe that the social security system should support families and tackle child poverty. The electorate have given the Government a mandate to reform social security. Supporting families is a key principle guiding that reform.

We are committed to supporting all families with children because we recognise that all families have extra costs as a result of bringing up children. That is why we are committed to retaining child benefit as a universal benefit. It is why we are increasing the standard rate of child benefit for the first child by £2.50 a week—the biggest ever one-off increase in child benefit.

The Government also believe that the tax and benefits system should take account of the specific difficulties and extra costs that some families face on account of their children.

Families who are unable to work, or who have lower disposable incomes because of their parenting responsibilities, need extra help, so we are introducing measures that increase the incomes of those families. We are increasing the standard family premium in the income-related benefits by £2.50 a week, and are increasing the child personal allowance for the under-11s by a further £2.50 a week. The increases together will mean that a family bringing up two young children on income support can be better off by £7.50 a week.

Our working families tax credit will increase support for working families on lower incomes. It will provide around £5 billion of help to around 1.4 million families—that is £1.5 billion more than is spent on family credit, and 400,000 more families will receive help. The working families tax credit will guarantee every working family an income for full-time work of at least £180 a week, and around 2 million children will be better off as a result.

Those measures demonstrate the Government's commitment to ensure that vulnerable families receive an adequate income when out of work and to address the barriers that they face in moving into work. Even when taken together with measures that align family premium and child benefit rates, they will mean that around 1.5 million lone parents will be better off overall. That is why, within that context, we are changing the benefits structure.

Under the previous Government, there were no substantive measures to help more lone parents to work, despite the comments of the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward). Without the last election, that would continue to be the case.

Our approach is different from that of the previous Government. Work is at the heart of our proposals and the opportunity to work is at the heart of the Government's approach. We want to offer lone parents the opportunity to improve their lives, but lone parents often need practical help with finding a job and sorting out the changes to life that need to fit round a job. They need help with finding accessible, affordable, quality child care. Help with child care makes a job feasible and gives lone parents a genuine chance to work. That is exactly what the Government are delivering through the new deal for lone parents and the national child care strategy.

The new deal offers lone parents a tailor-made, one-to-one service from personal advisers who will offer advice on job search and will help them to sort out their benefits and child maintenance. Child care and training requirements will also be considered, to ensure that lone parents overcome the barriers to work, wherever they may be.

The interim findings of the independent evaluation of the new deal for lone parents show that it is helping more lone parents leave income support. Those who have been helped into work are, on average, £39 a week better off in work with family credit than they were on income support, and their benefit dependency reduces by an average of £42 a week.

The new deal for lone parents is real welfare reform in action. The figures cited by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) are meaningless, as independent research has made clear.

Mr. Burns: The figures were based on figures provided by the Department and examined and verified by the House. If the Minister says that they are so inaccurate, that implies that he has examined them, rather than taking some independent person's view. Will he publish the figures that prove that our figures are wrong, so that we can get to the bottom of the matter and see who is right?

Mr. Bradley: I am happy to do that. It is clear from the figures given by the hon. Gentleman that he cannot add up or divide by two. Independent researchers say that his figures are meaningless.

Child care is essential to many lone parents. For too long, Britain has lagged behind other countries in developing good quality, accessible and affordable child care. It is needed to offer equal opportunities to parents to support them in their choices, whether their choice is to enter work or to improve their employability through training, and to promote the well-being and development of children. That is why we pledged to implement a national child care strategy.

We need to ensure that child care is affordable. Affordable child care is crucial if lone parents are to have the same opportunities to work as other families. We recognise that many lone parents face substantial child care costs, so we are providing help specifically to address those costs.

We have already increased help with the costs of child care through the child care disregard in the in-work benefits. The improved help means that a lone parent with two or more children can receive up to £95.50 a week towards the cost of child care—nearly £40 a week more than was previously available.

That is just the first step. There will be more help with the cost of child care through the child care tax credit, which will provide extra help for all working families who need help with child care costs. It will provide help of up to 70 per cent. of eligible child care costs up to a limit of £100 for families with one child and £150 for families with two or more children. Lone parents will be the main beneficiaries of the child care tax credit, and they will receive more help with child care costs than ever before. Moreover, the structure of the credit will ensure that the poorest families benefit in full.

We are addressing the real barriers to work through our new deal for lone parents, our national child care strategy, the working families tax credit, and by introducing a minimum wage. We are also providing more help with paying for child care so that all lone parents can enjoy the opportunity to work.

I remind the House that existing recipients will continue to receive the higher rate of family premium so long as they continue to satisfy the entitlement conditions. So, there will be no cash losers—[Interruption.] That is made clear in the regulations, as the hon. Member for Witney would know if he had bothered to read them.

However, that protection was causing some difficulties for some lone parents. Lone parents participating in our new deal pilots told us—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) would listen, he might hear some of the answers to the questions that have been raised. Those people told us that the absence of a linking rule in income support was affecting their confidence in taking work. They were worried that if a job did not work out they would have to return to out-of-work benefits on a lower rate than before.

That is why we introduced a 12-week linking rule, so that lone parents receiving either of the benefits with the higher premium will now be able to take work knowing that if it turns out to be short term they will not be worse off if they have to return to benefit.

I shall consider carefully the point made by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), but, at this stage, I can say that most jobs being taken are permanent. We already have statistics showing that 80 per cent. of lone parents in work in 1991 were still in work four years later.

A 12-week linking period is in line with the recommendation of the Social Security Advisory Committee, which recommended a linking period of "at least eight weeks". We believe that that provides lone parents with enough time, once they have started work, to decide whether any problems that arise—with child care, for example—can be resolved. Our new deal for lone parents will also provide in-work support to help them address those problems.

However, if lone parents decide that a problem is insurmountable they will be able to return to benefit at the same rate as before. There is absolutely no evidence to support the contention by the Opposition spokesperson, the hon. Member for West Chelmsford, that lone parents are deliberately trying to manipulate the system by moving backwards and forwards between income support and work.

The linking rules will be further supported by the Government's overall commitment to an active modern service that will ensure that lone parents not only get help through their personal advisers when seeking work, training or child care, but continue to be supported in work by those advisers, so that any new barriers or crises that arise can be dealt with, and they do not have to leave work but can remain in the job.

We have been accused of implementing the previous Government's policy, and of completing some kind of U-turn in order to do so. Neither accusation is true. The previous Government intended to cut lone benefits, in isolation.

The present Government have provided new and innovative support to help lone parents who want to work to do so—a working families tax credit to ensure that work pays, the biggest ever investment in child care provision, substantially improved help with meeting the cost of child care through the child care tax credit, and an investment in excess of £1 billion in improving benefit support for families, including extra help for the most vulnerable and the introduction of the linking rule. That is the context against which the regulations should be judged.

The electorate have made clear that they expect more from social policy than the previous Government ever offered. They have told us that they want an active approach to welfare so that everyone can take part in society and can work for their living, if they can. We promised that we would provide help to lone parents in moving into work, and that is what we have delivered. We promised that we would protect vulnerable families who are unable to work, and we have delivered that, too. That is why the House will overwhelmingly dismiss this prayer tonight.

Question put and negatived.

Harlow Playhouse

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

11.19 pm

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): I am pleased to have this opportunity to have an Adjournment debate on Harlow playhouse. I want, first, to praise the work of the theatre in Harlow; secondly, to highlight the importance of a thriving community theatre to a community such as Harlow; thirdly, to point out the need for theatres such as Harlow's to receive better funding—a cry which, I am sure, will be heard from many theatres across the country; and, fourthly, to express my concern, which is shared across the eastern region, at the inequitable way in which the Eastern arts board is distributing funds to theatres in the eastern region.

Before I do that, however, it is worth providing some background and the history of the theatre in Harlow. Harlow playhouse was incorporated in the master plan that established the new town when it was founded in 1947. Although the design was in the original planning concept, the need for a local theatre was established quickly by the plethora of amateur groups that were set up in the early years of the new town.

The town had its first home-grown opera by 1953, and professional ballet arrived in 1957. In 1963, Harlow became the first town to sponsor a resident chamber music ensemble, the Alberni. Amidst the many amateur drama groups that were established, Harlow also developed a strong tradition of visiting professional companies. At that stage, it provided work for a visiting stage manager by the name of Alan Ayckbourn—something the town is still proud of.

With such activity, the pressure to build a theatre grew. People involved in theatre and drama wanted a theatre established. In 1957, the council—as then was—set up a working party to look at the need for a theatre and how it might be paid for. The working party—which did an enormous amount of good work—concluded that what was needed was a combination of amateur community productions and visiting professional theatre. To this day, that vision is being carried out, with some in-house production by the playhouse.

With that level of activity and with the pressure building, there followed in March 1967 a public inquiry into whether the council should be allowed to borrow money to build the theatre. Even in those days, concern for public expenditure constraints under a Labour Government were very much to the fore. Despite the constraints, the approval was granted and a contribution of £50,000 came from a new fund, set up under the Labour Government by the then Arts Minister, Jennie Lee. That really set the ball rolling for the theatre. I understand that Jennie Lee came to Harlow to lay the foundation stone of the new theatre and called for more touring by the Covent Garden opera company. It is worth stating, some 30 years later, that Harlow is still waiting for such a tour to take place.

The playhouse opened in 1971 for live theatre, films and exhibitions, and has developed and increased its range of activities considerably since then. For the next 23 years of its existence, Harlow playhouse worked effectively. However, in hindsight, I believe that it became overly reliant on funding from one source: the district council. That funding ceased in 1993 when Harlow council was capped by the previous Conservative Government. I was a member of the authority at that time and I can register the fact that the council received the biggest percentage cap in one year—50 per cent.—of any local authority in the country. The playhouse saw its funding cut from more than £500,000 per annum to about £150,000. Regrettably, that led to the playhouse's closure for one year to regroup and restructure and seek new funding streams.

As a result of that restructuring and reshaping, the new playhouse re-opened in 1996 with a mission to re-establish itself as a community theatre with atmosphere, a busy amateur programme and lots of events for young people by new groups while continuing to host touring professional productions. It has been a success story and the playhouse regularly sells out—it has had 23 sell-outs since January this year. The pantomime, which is a huge event in the local community, played to 93 per cent. capacity houses and received rave reviews in The Stage. More important, in 1997–98, 350 performances played to more than 45,000 people—the equivalent of more than half the population of Harlow. That statistic registers the vibrancy of the theatre.

It is worth highlighting the considerable efforts of three people, among many others, who helped to relaunch the theatre. Jon Harris was appointed to re-open the theatre, and his enthusiasm and integrity were a driving force in getting things off the ground. His successor, Laurence Sachs, who is the current manager, is, I hope, successfully guiding the theatre in a new direction. Councillor Jean Clark, who chairs the council committee overseeing the playhouse, has been absolutely tireless in championing its cause.

When the playhouse was relaunched, the council and the playhouse management were absolutely clear that financial support and theatre management structures had to be undertaken on a partnership basis so as to widen the streams of financial support for the theatre and not let it rely on funding from one source—the district council. Furthermore, there was a strong recognition that, in this day and age, different agencies with different backgrounds, perspectives and attitudes can bring more to the table by working collaboratively than by working alone.

While Harlow council continues to provide major financial support to the theatre, support also comes from neighbouring district councils and from parish and town councils. In addition, a very successful public-private partnership operates the playhouse restaurant and catering facilities and there are other private sponsors. In many ways, the playhouse is a model of the way theatres should be funded and managed today, but there is one glaring omission from the funding bodies that might reasonably be expected to support such a theatre: Arts Council of England funding through the Eastern arts board. As I have said before, that area is in need of fundamental reform.

The basic problem, among many others, is that theatre funding in the eastern region is based not on merit but simply on the pattern of historic funding. That is certainly the case with Arts Council funding through the Eastern arts board. The board provides considerable financial support to several theatres: the Wolsey theatre in Ipswich receives more than £322,000 per annum; the Mercury in Colchester receives £230,000 per annum; and the Palace in Watford receives £204,000 per annum. I am sure that all three are very good at providing productions for their local communities. I have nothing against them and do not wish to criticise them, but, because of the weighting of funding from the Eastern arts board towards them—they take about 66 per cent. of the funding—other theatres in the region receive meagre grants or nothing whatsoever, as is the case with Harlow playhouse.

My other concern is that the three top theatres to which I have referred received exactly the same money in 1996–97 as they did in both 1994–94 and 1995–96; there is not even an attempt to iron out the problem over a period. Essentially, my key criticism is that the Eastern arts board is carrying those three substantial theatres, to the detriment of everyone else.

The problem with such an unequal funding system was identified by the new chairman of the Arts Council, Gerry Robinson, in an article in The Guardian today. He argues:

"The past approach of equal misery for everyone is cowardly and fails to reward success. If all we are to do is dole out the same share of the pot to the same institutions year after year (and it is close to that) we should be replaced by a computer at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport."

I would not go that far—certainly not at this stage.

I hope that the Arts Council can learn some lessons, although the track record of the Eastern arts board is not particularly encouraging. I say that because when I raised this issue at Question Time a couple of weeks ago, my hon. Friend the Minister for Arts replied:

"the record of the Arts Council and regional arts boards in backing new companies and developments is less than inspiring—their priority has tended to be the defence and preservation of existing companies."—[Official Report, 1 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 2.]

I think that my hon. Friend was right.

The response of the Eastern arts board, however, was not to listen to that view and not to take that criticism on board. Instead, it claimed through its public relations office that I had misrepresented the Minister and that he was not criticising the board. If my hon. Friend had said, "their record is less than inspiring but I specifically exclude the Eastern arts board from those criticisms," I could have understood the justification and the defence that the board tried to make, but he did not say that.

I would be grateful if, this evening, my hon. Friend would reaffirm his view that "the record of ... regional arts boards in backing new companies and developments is less than inspiring", that that general criticism applies and that it does not exclude the Eastern arts board.

There are two other criticisms that I would make of Eastern arts board funding. The first concerns the length of time the review it has at long last initiated is taking. It initiated the review in September 1997, but not until 1998 did it agree a timetable. The initial results are not likely to emerge until nearly Christmas. I welcome the fact that a review is taking place, but I feel that there is a need for a greater sense of urgency and that all the theatres in the region should be actively involved in it.

My second criticism concerns Eastern arts board members' apparent direct interest in the decisions they make. Let me be clear that I am not talking about a personal financial interest. I ask the House to reflect on the fact that five Eastern arts board members are members of arts bodies that are in receipt of substantial funding.

[Mr. Bill Rammell]

There has been concern about that nationally, certainly in the Arts Council. Gerry Robinson said that the problem with the old structure is that people were looking after their own interests. He said that it was "nearly impossible for them not to be influenced by that."

That is a criticism which could have been made of the national situation as well as of regional arts boards structures. As we go forward, that factor needs to be taken into account.

Theatre is essential in broadening horizons, increasing educational opportunity, giving entertainment and, in a sense, civilising society. In Harlow, we have a vibrant and successful theatre doing exactly that and in a way that deserves support, but it is being poorly served by the Eastern arts board. I hope and believe that it will take on board the criticism that I am making and restructure its finances over time to give the playhouse in Harlow the support that it and the people whom it serves deserve.

The Minister for Arts (Mr. Mark Fisher): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) on securing tonight's Adjournment debate and offer him my sincere apologies for missing the beginning of his remarks.

My hon. Friend has expressed his concern about Harlow playhouse with great clarity and passion and, in doing so, he raises important issues about regional theatre that are common to towns and cities throughout Britain. Those issues concern the current state of regional theatres, their funding and their audiences, and how drama is organised in the regions and on what basis. Those are important matters, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving the Government the opportunity to debate them, because they concern anybody who is interested in and a supporter of drama in Britain.

My hon. Friend understandably began by praising Harlow playhouse, which is well regarded and which contributes to the life not just of Harlow but of the surrounding area, which provides a surprisingly high 75 per cent. of its audiences. My hon. Friend will recall that I visited the playhouse during the previous Parliament and was impressed by what I saw.

Although the playhouse is primarily a receiving house, providing a venue for touring productions, it produces every year what is, as my hon. Friend said, the largest community pantomime in the country, involving scores of local amateurs. The playhouse also has an active youth programme and links with schools and colleges locally. Its production this year of Timberlake Wertenbaker's "Our Country's Good", which is a superb play and on A-level English and theatre studies syllabuses, will play not only in Harlow but throughout Essex. Therefore, it is clear that what my hon. Friend said about the playhouse truly contributing not just to the cultural life but to the educational and community life of the area is correct.

In the light of such a record, my hon. Friend is understandably frustrated that the playhouse is not supported financially by the Eastern arts board, although it receives £150,000 a year from the local council, to which it adds more than £200,000 in ticket sales and hirings, with the remainder of its £400,000 turnover coming from catering, advertising and sponsorship.

The question that my hon. Friend raises is whether the Eastern arts board should do more for Harlow playhouse. The board is responsible for providing good-quality drama for the 5.87 million people in its region, spread over some important towns throughout the six counties there. The board spends £1.22 million on drama out of its £4.67 million grant from the Arts Council of England—that is, it spends approximately 25 per cent. of its total grant on drama, almost all of which is spent, as my hon. Friend rightly said, on four producing houses: the Mercury theatre, Colchester; the Palace theatre, Watford; the Palace theatre, Westcliff; and the Wolsey theatre, Ipswich. That leaves excellent receiving houses in Cambridge, Bury St. Edmunds, Norwich and other towns, including Harlow, without substantial support.

However, my hon. Friend will accept that those receiving houses benefit from the £2.84 million that the Eastern arts board receives from the Arts Council of England for touring and other activities, such as festivals, and some of them, such as the Cambridge arts theatre, have benefited substantially from the £8.5 million lottery money that has gone to theatres in the region. This is not only a matter of the core grants from the Eastern arts board.

My hon. Friend will realise that the Eastern arts board, like other regional arts boards, faces difficult choices in trying to provide, with just over £1 million, good-quality theatre to all the communities in the eastern area. That produces choices about how best to respond to the theatre needs and the talents of the region. To take a fresh look at precisely those difficulties, the Eastern arts board is undertaking a detailed review of its funding, and considering its funding patterns and the needs of arts organisations such as the playhouse in its region.

My hon. Friend asked whether the six to eight months that the review has lasted is too long, although he will agree that it is important that detailed consultation with organisations such as the playhouse should be thorough. I understand that new policies arising from the review will be published later this summer, which is somewhat earlier than he expected. I welcome that, and welcome the whole process. I agree with him that, for too long, funding throughout the arts funding system has been allowed to stagnate: historic commitments are silting up available funds, and good-quality projects and new initiatives are not receiving the support that they need and deserve.

That is a matter of urgent concern to the new Arts Council of England and to its chairman, Mr. Gerry Robinson. In respect of the eastern region, I am delighted that Lou Stein, the chief executive of the Eastern arts board, and Professor Stuart Timperley, the chair of the board, have anticipated the radical review that the Arts Council of England will undertake nationally. I am glad that my hon. Friend paid tribute to Mr. Robinson's article and trenchant remarks in The Guardian. Mr. Robinson is right, and the Government's confidence in appointing him is justified, because he will take a fresh look at the system. I obviously cannot anticipate the outcome of the review, but, knowing Mr. Robinson, who will work at national level, and knowing Mr. Stein and the Eastern arts board in my hon. Friend's region, I am sure that the local review will be radical, imaginative and thorough.

My hon. Friend raised the important and interesting question whether it is appropriate for people serving on regional arts boards to be associated with organisations or companies that receive grants. Those who appoint the boards—the Government and the Arts Council of England—face a genuine problem: should they put on those boards people who are involved with the arts and have a genuine engagement with and understanding of them, although that would run the risk that some grants may touch on their concerns, or people who are not involved in the system, which would ensure that all grants were seen to be totally objective?

I believe that having on the Arts Council of England and regional arts boards people who really know and care about the performing and visual arts, nationally or in their region, is erring in the right direction. My hon. Friend will have noticed that the Secretary of State has, in creating the new Arts Council of England, deliberately put on it known and respected practising artists such as Mr. Antony Gormley, Mr. Anish Kapoor, Miss Deborah Bull and others, to ensure that it returns to what it was in the 1950s and 1960s—an organisation based on living practice and the respect of fellow practitioners. My hon. Friend will understand that that runs risks, but I think that it is the right way to consider the issue.

My hon. Friend has done a service to all those who care about regional theatre by raising these important issues and putting a regional spotlight on the difficult choices that the system faces now and will face in the future. To address those choices, the Government have reconstructed the Arts Council of England and, with Mr. Robinson, given it a new direction. I believe that that will play out through the regions and produce exciting and interesting results.

I reassure my hon. Friend that the Government are determined that regional theatre should face a better future. As he says, regional theatre is absolutely central to the cultural life of communities such as his. It provides a core of creative energy in the middle of communities, which must be preserved and strengthened. It is to that end that the Government are directing all their energies and imagination.

I hope that my hon. Friend will bear with me, and I wish Harlow playhouse well. Whatever the result of the review, I am sure that the good work that the playhouse does will continue. Let us hope that we get a better future for regional theatre.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Points of Order

9.34 am

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your advice on whether Standing Orders allow a Minister to make a statement between now and 3.30 on the apparent leak of the strategic defence review which appears on the front pages of all this morning's broadsheet newspapers. Earlier this week, you once again felt constrained to observe that it seemed that the House was consistently being bypassed on these matters. I understand that the leaking of the document was systematic, in that it was sent to a series of newspapers in brown envelopes. We thought that brown envelopes were a feature of the previous Parliament, not of this one.

I am sure that you will agree, Madam Speaker, that leaking in that way is an insult to the House and to the men and women of the armed services whose jobs and future may depend on the contents of the strategic defence review. Can you advise me whether Standing Orders permit any Minister who seeks to make a statement between now and 3.30 to do so, and whether you would look favourably on any such application?

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. The examples that you dealt with previously could have been accidental leakages, but, in the words of my hon. and learned Friend, this leak seems to be quite deliberate. May I draw your attention to the fact that they were not photocopies but actual copies of the defence review? It seems to be a deliberate attempt to drive other matters from the front pages of the newspapers.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Given your strong feelings on such matters, could you tell Ministers that you would regard it as entirely appropriate if, following their investigations, the most proper and perhaps draconian action were taken against those who are responsible?

Madam Speaker: In answer to the first point of order, the Standing Orders of the House do not allow for a statement on that matter before 3.30. The Secretary of State for Defence has already telephoned me this morning. I am fully aware of the situation. He is prepared at 3.30 to make some comment—I put it no higher than that—on this matter, which disturbs him greatly, too. If the House will bear with me until 3.30, I think that he will be very forthcoming at that time.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I am very much obliged, Madam Speaker.

EU Structural Funds (London)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

9.37 am

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): I shall first declare an interest. I am a former director of Greater London Enterprise, and I am still the chair of Greater London Enterprise development capital on a pro-bono basis. I am a former leader of Merton borough council and vice-chair of the Association of London Authorities, a member of the leaders' committee of the ALG and a director of the London First centre.

I am pleased to have an opportunity to debate the current and future position of the EU structural funds for London. The United Kingdom's presidency of the European Union has just finished, and I am keen that the House should have an opportunity to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister about her progress in the past five months on achieving a good deal for the UK and particularly for London. She is, of course, a London Member.

Agenda 2000, which set this matter in train, led to the publication of new regulations governing the reform of the funds. They were published by the EU Commission on 18 March and cover the period 2000–2007. I understand that agreement on the overall structural funds budget is due at the Vienna summit in December and that final adoption of the regulations will take place at the German summit in June 1999. Therefore, the timing of the debate is helpful in ensuring that the London case is put in time.

Already, hon. Members in all parts of the House have been putting the case for their constituencies. A recent example of that was on 15 June when my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) had an Adjournment debate on the subject in the context of Wales. All hon. Members would wish to support Northern Ireland's quest to continue its objective 1 status. The continuing sad news from Northern Ireland underlines the need to ensure that the Commission allows Northern Ireland to retain that.

I pay tribute to the various organisations that have, over recent years, been part of making the case for London. Greater London Enterprise has been foremost in that. It has a specialist team working on that case, but it was important that, some four years ago, London house was made available by Greater London Enterprise to ensure that there was a base for London to be able to lobby the European Commission. Before 1994, other regions had already set up lobbying organisations. Perhaps they were ahead of London in realising the importance of having a visible presence in Brussels.

The next grouping that I commend to the House is the Association of London Authorities, the London Boroughs Association, and the Association of London Government, as it became in 1995. I particularly pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell), who, as secretary of the ALA and ALG, led the drive to ensure that London was not left behind in terms of ensuring that structural funds were available. I pay tribute to the current secretary, Martin Pilgrim, and to the assistant secretary,

[Mr. Tony Colman]

Madeleine Williams, the person in charge, for the work that she and her department do to ensure that London is properly represented.

I commend also the work that has been done on the London study, which was presented to my hon. Friend the Minister for London and Construction at a meeting on Monday to demonstrate a way forward. That study was part funded by the EU, by London boroughs and by many organisations in London, and sets the backdrop to a strong claim for objective 2 status for London in the negotiations that are coming up.

I obviously commend the work that has been done within the Committee of the Regions by our representatives on the committee, Councillor Peter Bowness, who has now been translated to another place and who, I think, was the first member of the committee, Councillor Toby Harris, who is shortly to be translated to another place, Councillor David Williams from the Liberal Democrats and Councillor Sally Powell. I know that other councillors have also done excellent work on the committee, but, at a key time, when it was so important to put the case for London in the committee and the European Commission, they were the four people who led the charge.

I mentioned the work of the London First centre. There was a tremendous need, which was clearly identified, for London to have its own development agency. On a basis of shared funding between the Department of Trade and Industry, the borough of Westminster, London Docklands development corporation, the Corporation of London and the business community, over the past three or four years, there has been a lively and successful inward investment agency for London, albeit working on rather limited funds compared with what is available for, say, Scotland, which has a similar population, or Wales, the population of which is significantly smaller.

As I develop my theme, hon. Members will see that London's needs are perhaps as great as those of Wales and Scotland combined, so it is important for the Minister to take back to the DTI the need to ensure that the funding for the London First centre and successor bodies is adequate.

Obviously, I commend the new shadow London development agency. That will help to bring together much more strongly the work of the organisations that I have mentioned. It is important that the Greater London authority—the elected mayor and assembly—has a clear view from the business community, from the social partners in London and from elected representatives in London of the way in which the GLA should support the way forward for EU structural funds and for the future of London.

I pay tribute to Members of the European Parliament who have spearheaded this work, including, obviously, Pauline Green, as chair of the socialist MEPs, and my own MEP, Anita Pollack, the MEP for London South West London, who has done sterling work in looking after that area.

As hon. Members will realise, Putney is not in an objective 1 or 2 area. Wandsworth council, with the local training and enterprise council, AZTEC, of which I was formerly a director, and the local regeneration partnership, the Wandle Valley Partnership, has been extremely successful in obtaining funds through objective 3, the European regional development fund, the European social fund, Adapt, Horizon, Social Exclusion, Youthstart, Life, Pacte, PHARE and Ecos Ouverture.

I have listed those EU programmes in full because I am concerned that virtually all the programmes will be subsumed within the new objective 2 and 3 status. It is important that areas in London that suffer from high unemployment and deprivation, such as Wandsworth and parts of Putney, should still be able to apply for and to receive EU funding.

I commend to the House the work of the Wandsworth economic development office, under Mike Brook and Judith Roscoe, in ensuring that those funds have been won fairly. One hears in the House, correctly, that there has perhaps been a tilting of the playing field, in favour of the standard spending assessment for Wandsworth, but, in this area, I commend Wandsworth council for its work to ensure that funds are available for unemployed people and others who can benefit from those programmes. It has won its case fair and square with Brussels, with the Government office for London and with Whitehall.

The vast majority of current EU London funding goes to the Lea valley and east London. I know that my hon. Friends from some constituencies in those areas wish to take part in the debate to do their own advocacy. Those areas will receive in 1997-99 some £80 million; that is 102 million ecu. That is 4 per cent. of the UK total of objective 2 funds. The London share of the UK unemployed is 18 per cent. and its share of the long-term unemployed is 25 per cent. London has more unemployed than Wales and Scotland put together; their share of the UK's unemployed is 15 per cent. London receives only 4 per cent. of objective 2 resources, compared with Wales and Scotland, whose share is 29 per cent. North-east England receives 15 per cent. of the resources and has only 7 per cent. of the unemployed. The west midlands receives 18 per cent. of the resources, but has only 9 per cent. of the unemployed.

I have no wish to denigrate other regions or countries within the British Isles about their share of those resources. I wish to ensure only that the London case is put. I believe that those comparisons have not been put to the House before. That clearly shows a lack of interest in London by the previous Government when it came to EU resources. I and fellow London Members want to ensure fair treatment for London for the next period—2000-07. I do not criticise the single regeneration budget division of resources, which more accurately reflects the needs of London, but it is remarkable that the EU share-out does not.

I have used comparative unemployment levels, which were the key indicator used for objective 2 for the last round. However, things are changing; the Minister will advise us of that. In terms of Agenda 2000, the amount of money that can be accessed is being reduced—the share of the EU population that benefits is reducing from 50 per cent. to between 35 and 40 per cent. There is a new way forward, which particularly takes account of EU enlargement in coming years.

I understand that, to maximise the UK overall take, the key criterion that should be used is gross domestic product; the UK has the fourth lowest GDP in Europe. However, while I would support that, other indicators should be looked at when considering the split of EU resources within the United Kingdom. I understand that 50 per cent. of the indicators come from Brussels and the other 50 per cent. from the UK.

The Association of London Government proposes criteria that relate to "areas with substantial rates of unemployment in excess of the EU average which have recorded substantial industrial job losses since 1985."

Greater London has lost 382,000 industrial jobs, representing 50 per cent. of industrial employment, since 1984. In east London and the Lea valley, 51 per cent. of industrial jobs have been lost—77,000 down to 40,000—with a further loss of 10,000 jobs in the service sector. It is a difficult area and it needs every penny it can get. It is important that the current £80 million funding is sustained, if not increased.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow): It is important to stress that 70 per cent. of Britain's most deprived wards are in the capital, which people often do not realise. Although my constituency has been fortunate to receive funding, in some wards unemployment is now rising. In addition, no structural funding money hit the ground until 1996, whereas every other British ERDF area has had funding over a much longer period. It is critical that we do not lose the objective 2 money, and that other areas of London are able to benefit from it.

Mr. Colman: I agree with my hon. Friend; I was about to discuss the wider indicators that need to be taken into account.

The partner of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Coleman), Councillor Sally Powell, has fought successfully within the Committee of the Regions and the EU generally to ensure that "urban areas in difficulty" qualify under objective 2. The criteria should include the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King)—first, a high level of poverty, including precarious housing conditions; secondly, poor housing conditions; thirdly, a degraded environment; and fourthly, a low level of education. All those criteria are met in a number of wards in the constituencies of my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow and other London Members, especially those representing the Lea valley and east London. It is important that my hon. Friend the Minister remembers that.

The London research centre-Peabody Trust document "A Capital Divided", prepared in February last year, gave information at ward level which clearly showed the needs of London.

Under the draft regulations for objective 2 funding, the particular strand covering "urban areas in difficulty" is seen as applicable to only 2 per cent. of the population. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to convince her colleagues that the urban industrial reconversion strand should be significantly increased, if possible up to 10 per cent., which is the level of the other strands. My hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow made that point well.

I listed a number of new areas that Wandsworth had been able to access and those areas outside objectives 1, 2 and 3 that will not be available. There is particular concern that the urban initiative will be cut. While the funding for that initiative is modest—£12 million for the period 1994 to 1999—the benefits have been real. In evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, the Local Government Association endorsed the continuation of the initiative.

The proposals for Community initiatives outside objectives 1, 2 and 3 will now have to be extremely limited. I understand that there are just three, of which only one is directly relevant to London—although it is highly relevant: the new initiative on transnational co-operation to fight discrimination and inequality preventing access to employment. I commend that initiative to my hon. Friend the Minister. I know that not just London but many other areas will want to have a strong say in it.

The new proposals around objective 3 are very much needed for London. The divide in London between those who are out of work and those who are in work is widening. Those who do not have the right skills—the new deal provides a way to acquire them, and I applaud the fact that the scheme has now been widened to include the over-25s—can fall further and further behind. It is specifically a London problem.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Structural funding is meant to help regions and economies through difficult times. It is intended to help economies to pick up and for the regions to benefit from that. The problem is that the more successful the scheme is, the greater is the risk of those regions losing continued support. Regions that already get funding argue to hold on to it, while others argue their need also to benefit from it. That is one of the problems with enlargement of the EU. Our Spanish colleagues are arguing against enlargement because they do not want any institutional reforms that would threaten their structural funding.

Mr. Colman: I agree with my hon. Friend. However, one piece of good news that we received last March was that Commissioner Kinnock had proposed a safety net, under which no areas would face a funding reduction of more than one third. That may be cold comfort to the Spanish, but it is important to UK regions in terms of their success compared with London.

In the 1970s and 1980s, London was booming while other regions were undergoing major industrial decline. London's nemesis came in the late 1980s, so we have had to face that problem later than other regions. It is important for those in areas such as Clydesdale, which my hon. Friend represents, to realise that the success that that area has achieved needs to be replicated, in particular, in the Lea valley and east London.

We need objective 3 to deal with retraining. We want London to get its full share, especially for areas that promote social inclusion, lifelong education and training, facilitation of economic change and, in particular, improving the participation of women in the labour market. London should be accessing those areas under objective 3. I know that other hon. Members will explore these issues in their speeches and will be urging the case for London.

[Mr. Colman]

For the remainder of my speech, I want to deal with NUTS. I am not insulting the House with that acronym, it stands for the nomenclature of units of territorial statistics—

Madam Speaker: Order. It is nice of the hon. Gentleman to spell it out.

Mr. Colman: NUTS provides a single uniform breakdown of territorial units for producing regional statistics across the whole of the European Union. Almost all the sub-national statistics collected and disseminated by Eurostat are based on the NUTS structure of regions. The statistics deal with topics such as population, birth rates, employment, unemployment, gross domestic product, transport and energy. I am sure that they also deal with other matters.

Since 1988, NUTS regions have formed the geographical basis for determining distribution of structural fund expenditure. Currently, objective 2 funding is based on NUTS level 3 regions.

On 29 June, the Chancellor of the Exchequer answered a written question from my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms) about the new United Kingdom NUTS map. I know that some changes, such as splitting Cornwall and Devon at level 2, have been welcomed on both sides of the House. That change may help to ensure that Cornwall receives its fair share as an objective 1 area. However, it seems strange, at level 2, to divide London into inner and outer London, and the borough groupings at level 3 seem stranger still.

The statisticians seem to have no appreciation of the sub-regional partnerships that have been developed in recent years with the help of the Government office for London. The partnerships include the Lea valley partnership, which stretches up to Enfield; the east London partnership; the Park Royal corridor; and, in my case, the Wandle valley partnership, which covers Wandsworth, Merton, Sutton and Croydon. The partnerships of boroughs, and of the business and social partners in those boroughs, have been recognised in the past four single regeneration budget rounds and are increasingly successful in delivering solutions to areas with considerable industrial decline in those parts of London.

NUTS also do not relate to TEC areas. I therefore ask again whether the classification system will be re-examined. Alternatively, could each borough be designated a NUTS level 3? I remind the House that current objective 2 funding is agreed on the basis of NUTS level 3. Moreover, the population of individual borough often exceeds the population of other NUTS level 2 units. The population of some London boroughs, for example, is greater than that of Cornwall. A re-examination of the system is necessary.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow said, the current objective 2 map is drawn at ward level. I think that level 4 should be composed of wards within boroughs, rather than—as at present—of boroughs. As hon. Members will know, some wards—of which I have examples in my constituency of Putney—have a very high deprivation level, whereas others do not. It is extremely important that the objective 2 status map should deal with that fact. I believe that the NUTS classification system proposed on 29 June is not helpful to London, and perhaps not to other parts of the United Kingdom that share the same problem. I look forward to the Minister confirming that the matter will be re-examined.

In Putney and at Wandsworth council, we are concerned about the need for support in making objective 3 bids. It has been possible in previous years to make them, but it has been a problem this year. We want to ensure, first, that areas such as Wandsworth that have been successful when operating on a level playing field and on a case-by-case basis are not squeezed out.

Secondly, we have to ensure that as much pressure as possible is brought on Brussels to operate a more positive urban policy—which, as I said, would reflect London's priorities.

Thirdly, it is important that we work to decrease bureaucracy and simplify the approval process. Currently, there are many criteria assessment processes. Whereas some bids are approved directly from Brussels—via GOL—others are approved via Departments. We need clarity in the matter. We need quicker decision making and prompter payments, and greater emphasis on outcomes and outputs rather than—as currently—on inputs.

London as a whole has lost out on the Euro-gravy train of the past 18 years, during which the previous Government ignored the pleas of local government leaders and of the community of London. The fact is that 18 per cent. of the United Kingdom's unemployed live in London, but they receive only 4 per cent. of the EU resources provided to deal with the problem here.

Once the Greater London authority is established, we will have a doughty fighter to ensure that London's voice is clearly heard. Meanwhile, I ask the Minister—who is a London Member—to discover how that great economic injustice can be righted, and to ensure that the right thing is done for London, so that we receive a fair share of resources.

10.4 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) on putting the case for London so well, and on pointing out that we have large unemployment problems in the capital and that we will have to ensure that London's case on the reshaping of structural funds is made.

I should like to make a few comments on reform of objective 3 funding—especially as it relates to the European social fund—which is particularly germane to London. As the hon. Member said, regional—even sub-regional—definitions can miss out areas of concentrated poverty, which are, by their very nature, quite wide. As he also said, London is likely to miss out not only on objective 1 funding but on much of objective 2 funding. In the worst case scenario, none of London's areas will be given objective 2 status. Therefore—particularly because of the regional definitions—it is important for areas such as London that overall objective 3 funding is well resourced.

As the hon. Member said, London has concentrated areas of poverty that are not revealed in the nomenclature of units of territorial statistics definitions. Those areas have to be able to share in support from Europe. If that support will not come from objective 2, we will have to ensure that objective 3 is well resourced so that it can back us up.

Administration of objective 3 funds is another issue which must be addressed. Although the hon. Member touched on the issue, I should like to make a couple of major points. Hon. Members will have read the Trade and Industry Select Committee's recent report on the reform of European structural funds, which makes two telling points on reforming administration of the European social fund. The first deals with the complexity of current administrative arrangements.

At the back of the report, there is a submission from the Leader II network in England, which describes current administrative arrangements for the social fund as "Kafka-esque" and says that the number and complexity of forms render it incredibly difficult for many organisations to apply. As a consequence of the complexity, simply to apply for funds, political lobbyists have to become involved in the process, and special posts have to be created. That is not an efficient way of running such a system.

Administrative complexity creates barriers for, and limits the number of, organisations that would otherwise apply. It is almost as if the funds were being rationed by complexity. We want a much more open, simple and transparent process in which many more people and organisations can apply.

A second aspect of the administrative arrangements that requires reform—which also was highlighted by the Select Committee—is to push down administration of large pots of money from Brussels to the national and regional tiers. Such reform would help to improve the fund's administrative efficiency, would inherently simplify administration and would provide a much more targeted focus in allocating funds.

The Liberal Democrats welcome the Government's proposals for regional government in London. The development of regional government and regional development agencies may well produce tiers of government to administer the pots of money that come from Europe through objective 2 or objective 3 status and ensure that they are more efficiently administered; the byzantine processes of the current system seem to miss many areas of need.

If we do not have better and simpler administrative arrangements that follow the principle of subsidiarity, we will miss out on money being channelled to some of the most severely deprived districts in the country. As the hon. Member for Putney said, some areas of London are severely deprived. The top four areas in the index of deprivation include London boroughs.

My constituency is normally considered to be one of the more prosperous boroughs, but some wards suffer severe deprivation. Norbiton, for example, has a higher Z score than almost any other ward in outer London and is on a par with the poorest areas of central London. The need to ensure that money goes where it is most required is urgent, and one of the best ways to achieve that is to reform the administrative processes.

10.10 am

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): I join the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) on securing today's important debate at such an appropriate time and commending him for focusing on London and correcting the mistaken impression of many right hon. and hon. Members and the wider public that London escaped the recessions of the 1980s and 1990s.

Londoners have not magically overcome or avoided the deprivation that affects other cities and regions. Indeed, there is enormous disparity between those who are very wealthy and those who are very poor. Greater London includes some of the poorest areas in the country, and is affected by poverty, deprivation and social exclusion.

This is an apposite time to be discussing structural funds for London. There are 13 objective 2 areas in the United Kingdom, covering 31 per cent. of the population and spending 30 per cent. of the objective 2 structural funds from Europe. However, as was said earlier, London receives only 4 per cent. of the UK allocation. That cannot be a fair distribution. Indeed, London has only one objective 2 area—east London and the Lea valley—which is programmed to spend about £132 million by the millennium.

Many have pressed the case for London over an extended period; several organisations were mentioned earlier. They include Greater London Enterprise and the Local Government Association, but I should like to pay particular tribute to the London Members of the European Parliament who campaigned for a long time, despite the scepticism of their colleagues and the opposition of many bureaucrats in Europe, but finally won through to secure a bridgehead for London and recognition of the multiple deprivation that is suffered here.

East London and the Lea valley objective 2 area combines great need and significant opportunity. The need exists across the entire area, but it is concentrated in the central and eastern parts—in Tower Hamlets and Newham. There are also significant development opportunities in the upper Lea valley where there are more than 200 hectares of underdeveloped and derelict sites waiting to be developed to provide opportunities.

The London TEC Council, recently produced a report entitled "Skills and Sustainable Development", which identified six distinct local economy profiles within London. They range from the global city core, which I do not need to describe, to the regeneration economy. The report states:

"A regeneration economy requires comprehensive long-term economic, social and physical development to compete successfully for investment, jobs and resources."

That is a description of east London and the Lea valley. All the indicators show that the area suffers significant deprivation, poverty and social exclusion. Tower Hamlets, Hackney and Newham would appear at the top of any list from any statistician. Indeed, parts of Haringey, Waltham Forest and, in my constituency, Enfield also appear high on the list of deprived areas.

Of course, the problems in the Lea valley have been exacerbated in recent years. There were 26,000 jobs losses between 1984 and 1991, and the area has failed to benefit from the wider new industries that have been attracted to the regional economy in Greater London. Perhaps most significantly, local people have been unable to maximise the opportunities that are available because they lack the skills to tap into the job market. The objective 2 bid was originally made in order to tackle some of those deep-seated problems.

[Mr. Andrew Love]

East London and the Lea valley has a population of just over 500,000. The area has a significant level of need, which is illustrated by one statistic that has been used by European statisticians. Unemployment there is two and a half times the national average. There are many deprived communities, especially black and ethnic minorities, who represent 36 per cent. of the total population, and, according to all the indicators, suffer significantly greater deprivation and unemployment than the norm. A recent survey carried out of the Bangladeshi community showed that only 44 per cent. were engaged in the real economy.

There have been a number of successful projects that will benefit local communities and have a significant impact on the development of the objective 2 area. I shall mention three of them briefly. First, a science park is being developed in northern Enfield on 45 hectares of derelict land. There are three partners: Middlesex university, Thames Water and the London borough of Enfield. The lead agency on the site is building 60 incubator units to foster new and high-technology businesses. It is a very exciting business called the Lea Valley Business Innovation Centre and it does tremendous work. It was set up using regional development funding and is one of 12 such developments across the United Kingdom and one of 150 in the European Community. It promotes innovation by providing support and advice, and early-stage finance, should that be needed for the development of the business. Since it was set up three years ago, it has supported more than 1,000 business ideas. In its first year, it helped to establish 22 new businesses, creating 44 jobs. It is a very exciting development.

I should also like to mention the Tottenham Hale transport interchange, which provides a one-stop service to either Stansted airport or central London. There are excellent connections on the London underground, and the road network is connected directly to the M25 and central London. The interchange will open up an entirely new and, until now, fallow area of the Lea valley objective 2 area for development.

I turn briefly to the impact that Agenda 2000 and the Government's negotiations will have on objective 2 funding for London. First, I accept that enlargement of the European Union will necessarily mean a refocusing of funds on new member countries of eastern Europe, although the Government's acceptance that that will lead to reductions in the overall structural fund does not sit easily with their commitment to regeneration. Indeed, in a recent consultation document in which the Government outlined the features that should underpin their future regeneration policy, they concluded that "policies must be aimed at addressing social exclusion and need. Our cities will not be competitive unless opportunities are extended to everyone who lives in them. There is nothing more corrosive than the existence of disaffected or disadvantaged groups who feel they have no stake in their city's decisions and prosperity."

Achieving such aims require continued funding of objective 2 areas and the Government to address poverty and deprivation in many parts of London.

Secondly, concern has been expressed at the use of unemployment as the principal criterion for the designation of new objective 2 areas. That would be to the advantage of east London and the Lea valley—and, indeed, as has been said, of Greater London. I accept—and I think that London would accept—that, given that different countries are at different stages of their economic cycles, the use of such a criterion does not make sense and may not be the most appropriate basis on which to divide spoils among member states. Unemployment is only one of many indicators and will not, by itself, give an accurate picture of local need. Below the national criteria, some form of assessment of deprivation or social exclusion based on national and regional criteria would be favourable and a sensible way forward. After all, local people know best what is happening in their area.

Thirdly, there must be flexibility of implementation to allow member states both to decide on the new criteria for objective 2 designation and to draw the boundaries of new areas, taking account of the situation on the ground. For example, many deprived areas may be concealed in a larger and much more prosperous region. Such a problem is far more prevalent in Greater London than in other parts of the country. We need to take on board local experience and local knowledge in evaluating the criteria on which we want to operate.

Fourthly, I should like to address the issue of the safety net, which has been mentioned. According to recent estimates, before the concept of a safety net came forward, only a third of the current eligible population under objective 2 status were likely to be covered under the new criteria. A safety net that allows us to drop only a third of the coverage marks significant progress. The Government—and Commissioner Kinnock, if he was involved—should be congratulated on that.

However, there is still a difficulty. I understand that part of the EU's policy on objective 2 funding states that it will be limited to 18 per cent. of the population of any country. Such a limit could adversely impact on objective 2 funding in London. I ask the Minister to consider that carefully.

Fifthly, we must protect existing investment. East London and the Lea valley achieved objective 2 status only in 1995. Projects and programmes will have been running only for a maximum of four years by 1999. Continuity of funding is therefore necessary to deliver the regeneration that was called for when the objective 2 area was set up. That is important if we are to replace jobs lost through industrial decline, and train the local work force so that they can take jobs that are becoming available not only in the Lea valley but across London. The investment that has already been made in east London and the Lea valley area should not be put at risk by the phasing out of objective 2 status after 1999. Such status has contributed to a reversal of economic decline in the area.

To take up a point made by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, there is growing awareness among local groups and voluntary organisations—even the private sector—of the benefits that an area can accrue from structural funding. It is important that we maintain that interest and focus. If that is lost through the phasing out of objective 2 status, it will be difficult not only to maintain such interest but to set up the partnerships that will be critical to the future success of the area.

The new arrangements for Agenda 2000 should attempt to achieve several other things. They should reduce the complexity of the system. The EU has already gone some way towards that; it has reduced the number of objectives to three and the number of initiatives from 13 to three.

greatly simplifying the structure. The Trade and Industry Committee suggested that funding arrangements for four or five different funds should be simplified and brought together in one straightforward fund.

We also need to consider how we can simplify the process for people at the other end of it. If we do so, we shall achieve significant benefits. We need to reduce bureaucracy. To how many agencies do people who have received European structural funds have to report? How many do they have to keep in touch with? How many forms do they have to fill out? The situation is ridiculous; we need to simplify it and ease the process for organisations and partnerships that are trying to achieve the objectives that we have set them.

We must simplify form-filling. One needs a degree in the subject simply to understand the complex forms. Indeed, the complexity of EU forms is legendary. Everyone who has attempted to contact the bureaucracy in Brussels has to complete an exceptionally complex form. That has become a major impediment to new groups coming forward, and it has meant the failure of groups that could have delivered on the objective 2 criteria if that hurdle had not been placed in their way.

We need arrangements to increase transparency. No one understands how Europe operates; I am still trying to find out.The reality is that we end up with consultants, political insiders and people who know how the bureaucracy operates earning a living doing that rather than contributing to the objectives. There should be opportunities to simplify matters for those filling in forms and trying to create local partnerships.

We need flexibility, a greater say for local agencies and the involvement of non-statutory organisations to help ensure that we target the funds more efficiently. That will be essential if we are to maintain public support for an effective programme of regeneration into the 21st century.

10.30 am

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I congratulate the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) on securing the opportunity to debate the needs of London in relation to the European Union. I congratulate him also on his stoicism, as he appears to understand the bureaucracy and the nonsense related to accessing those funds.

I was surprised to hear him describe his constituency of Putney—where I was born and raised—as having pockets of severe deprivation. That must be a triumph of rhetoric over reality. I have toured all around Putney all my life, and to compare it with parts of other cities seems a slight exaggeration.

Mr. Colman: I was referring to the Roehampton estate. Perhaps since you left Putney—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman should remember to address other hon. Members in the third person. His remark appeared to be directed to the Chair.

Mr. Colman: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I, through you, remind the hon. Lady that Putney has several parts to it, including Roehampton, which is seen within the Z scores laid down by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions as being an area of significant deprivation?

Mrs. Gorman: The hon. Gentleman has no idea which part of Putney I lived in. The old Roehampton estates were the jewel in the crown of the old GLC and were greatly desired by people moving out from the innermost parts of London, who regarded them as almost a rural retreat. As for the other parts of Roehampton and the appalling tower blocks overlooking Richmond park, they were a triumph for the gerrymandering of Labour Governments after the war. I deplore the blocks, but they are still much more pleasant places to live than many parts of our cities.

I wish to support, and not repeat, the remarks of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) about the rabbit warren of regulations and the regiment of bureaucrats through which one must manoeuvre to get to the pot of gold—gold which has been enormously contributed by the British taxpayer. We are, after all, accessing our own money as we go through the European rabbit warren. It is slightly more difficult than accessing lottery funds—perhaps not much more.

I wish to correct the image of London given by the hon. Member for Putney in his quite understandable pursuit of European money. I have lived almost all of my life in London, and I have represented parts of London on a council. That has given me an intimate view not just of central London, but of many of the parts of London that he described.

I have had a lot of contact with businesses that were driven out of London. The problems that they experienced were largely made by their own councils—most particularly with the rates, which went up and up through the roof until the roof came off and the businesses had to move out of town. People may not realise that local authorities often demanded from £10,000 up to £100,000 in rates from small high street shops, which made it impossible for them to function. All the small furniture factories in the east end and areas such as Hackney and Haringey—which sustained an enormous number of valuable jobs—were driven out by the nature of the local councils.

We cannot lay the blame for the depredation at the door of central Government. If the problem exists, bringing in European money will not necessarily solve it. The costs of running small businesses will still exist.

We hear about the 18 per cent. unemployment in London. That figure beggars belief. It can be difficult to find a Londoner working in some industries—particularly the service industries. The other evening, I had the great pleasure of going to dinner at the Norwegian embassy. We were served by young women from the Philippines, the butler who handed round the drinks was Spanish and I am not sure of the nationality of the person who opened the door for us.

The point is that there are massive opportunities in London to work, particularly in the service industries. We have one of the largest tourism industries in the country, which provides many opportunities for us to solve the problems. If there is unemployment, we should look at legislation that impedes employers from taking on English workers, or we should study the nature of the councils—many of which are under Labour control. It is for a council to decide how to utilise the funds that are available. Whether they wish to give funds to the society for sustaining three-legged dogs or to the useful business of keeping the rates down for shopkeepers is a matter for them.

[Mrs. Gorman]

I have lived in London long enough to see parts of Wandsworth that were deprived turned into desirable areas, with lots of new industries, under the stewardship of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). It is a question of management and leadership. Battersea is another part of central London which used to be considered run down. I am sure that the hon. Member for Putney would have described it as a deprived area, yet that, too, was resurrected—not by structural funds from Europe, but by the good management of Conservative councils. I urge the Minister to remember that we have in our hands the powers to restore the pockets of deprivation in London.

I read in the newspapers recently that a great many Indian restaurants are crying out for staff because of a staff shortage. Perhaps some of the unemployed Bangladeshis in London could find jobs if they looked for them a little harder.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): We have had a good debate, ably introduced by the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman). My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) shares with me the privilege of having been born in Putney, so this is very much a debate about Wandsworth and London as a whole.

The hon. Member for Putney's conclusion that London had lost out on the Euro-gravy train over the past 18 years rather ignores the facts. The 1998 edition of "Regional Trends" shows that gross domestic product per head in London is over £13,000, compared with £8,700 in Northern Ireland and £8,900 in Wales. By 1996, disposable household income in London was 16.4 per cent. above the average for the rest of the UK, compared with 12.8 per cent. above the average in 1992. Things were getting better in London between 1992 and 1996, yet the hon. Gentleman tried to paint a picture of things in London getting worse.

In Wandsworth, and in Putney in particular, Wandsworth council has been able to deliver improved services, which have received massive endorsement in local elections. The hon. Member for Putney, intervening on my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay, described the Roehampton estate as an area of significant deprivation, but it will not have escaped his notice that, in May, for the first time in many years, the electors chose three Conservative local councillors, whom they believed would more properly represent them. That is a reflection of the success of the Conservative council in Wandsworth.

We should consider the structural funds in context. Figures from the Government office for London show that, last year, this year and next year, £25 million per annum have been and will be allocated to London through all the EU structural funds. The revenue support grant for London, which comes from the taxpayer, is £4.4 billion, which is in addition to Government capital grants. To debate structural funds in London—which are only £25 million a year—for one and a half hours, while ignoring the much larger sums of money that are being spent on London, is to fail to see the wood for the trees.

The hon. Member for Putney argues that small EU-funded programmes in Wandsworth should be preserved, but, this year, the Labour Government substantially reduced the revenue support grant to Wandsworth. Surely Wandsworth council is in a better position than remote officials in Brussels to judge the needs of the local community. If he believes that there are pockets of deprivation in Wandsworth that need assistance, he should be arguing for a larger revenue support grant funded from our national taxes; he should not be trying to use a complicated structural arrangement through which a proportion of the money that we give to Europe returns to us after myriad committees have determined how it should be spent.

The leader of Wandsworth council stated in the foreword to the most recent annual report:

"These are exciting times in Wandsworth. The local economy is more robust than at any time in the last decade while confidence has returned in a spectacular way to the housing market . . . the council's economic development office helped to create more than 600 new jobs for local people . . . The value of construction activity last year topped £200 million—almost double the previous year".

That is the role that a local council can play in developing the local economy. With the greatest respect to the bureaucrats on the continent, I do not think that they are in a position to second guess local judgment.

I hope that the Minister, in winding up, will explain how, in what seems to be a new anomaly, the 14 new electoral areas that the Government want to set up for the Greater London authority will fit in with the five new NUTS regions for London, given that local authority and other electoral boundaries are supposed to be linked to the NUTS system.

There is also a problem with the lag in statistics. The allocation of EU resources between 2000–07, meagre as they are, will be based on average gross domestic product in 1993-95 and will be subject to a safety net to reduce the number of losers in the change from the previous system. Despite the unwieldiness of the system, that will allocate, at most, some £500 million. It would be much better if we left the Brussels bureaucracy out of it and kept the £500 million ourselves, so that Parliament could decide how the money should be allocated to individual regions or even wards.

A number of hon. Members mentioned subsidiarity. I understand that, as a result of a £90,000 European regional development fund grant allocated to the Banglatown area of Tower Hamlets, 10 historic buildings, 2 km of footpaths and one environmental area have been improved and one permanent and 300 temporary jobs have been created. Surely those matters should properly be dealt with by the local council—probably by the local councillor—rather than by highly paid bureaucrats in Brussels. One can only speculate about the amount and cost of the bureaucracy needed to allocate that one grant.

At a meeting of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, the Minister rather wriggled when she was asked whether she thought that individual member states were in the best position to decide the needs of their communities. I hope that, in responding to the debate, she will be more robust and say that, yes, she thinks that local councillors and Parliament have a better idea of the needs of individual parts of the United Kingdom, and that it would be much better if we kept the money and allocated it according to our wishes.

10.45 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) on bringing the needs of London to the attention of the House. As he rightly said, I am a London Member of Parliament, so I share his interests. However, as the Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry with responsibility for the co-ordination of structural funds issues for the United Kingdom as a whole, I have to take a wider view of the process and the factors that have to be taken into account.

Many good points have been made in the debate, especially on the need to tackle bureaucracy—something that the previous Government failed to do. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) said much in his speech, but little about the reform of structural funds. Perhaps he will give a more considered response when he has had his brief a little longer. It will not surprise the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) to hear that I did not agree with everything that she said in the speech that the House is used to hearing from her, although she made a good point on the need for simplification, as did my hon. Friends the Members for Putney and for Edmonton (Mr. Love).

Since the publication of the draft regulations on 18 March, we have, under the UK presidency, taken forward the negotiations on structural funds with the Commission and other member states. Throughout the negotiations, the Government continued to emphasise the overarching principles of fairness, affordability and durability. As we head into the discussions in the autumn under the Austrian presidency, those principles will remain as important.

The desire for fairness has dominated the lobbying position of the Government—and of local organisations—in Brussels with the Commission and with other member states since the publication of the Agenda 2000 communication. As I have said on a number of occasions—I have no compunction about repeating it now—fairness means that the costs of reform should be shared fairly between all member states. However, the Government do not believe that the current proposals will achieve that. We believe that, if we are to agree fair and affordable reforms, all member states must be prepared to accept cuts.

We are not prepared to bear disproportionate cuts in United Kingdom coverage. On the strength of our lobbying before publication of the proposals, we secured the last-minute concession of the safety net in the draft regulations, limiting the loss of coverage for objective 2 and 5b areas to no more than a third. That could certainly prove to be an important achievement in several areas in the UK.

In addition, the Government will continue to press for flexibility, both in the objective 1 gross domestic product cut-off and in the new objective 2, in which we are keen to ensure that funds are targeted within member states, using national and local indicators that accurately reflect the areas of greatest need. It has also been said that member states have the ability to know where their areas of deprivation are, and we shall seek the maximum flexibility on objective 2. Those points were well made by my hon. Friends the Members for Putney and for Edmonton, as well as by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey).

In the negotiations to date, the UK presidency has been able to secure agreement on some of the general principles that support the universally agreed aim of simplification of the funds, making them more effective and better value for money. That is an important first step, and we are proud to have played our part in it.

Reference has been made to the agreement on changes to the UK NUTS boundaries announced last week by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who has responsibility for the Office for National Statistics. The structural funds reform negotiations are entirely separate from the issue of NUTS boundaries.

The Government supported the Government statistical service's proposals, sent to Eurostat last summer, which were the result of a general consultation early last year. We asked the Commission to encourage Eurostat to produce a rapid and satisfactory result. Ultimately, as the House will be aware, this has been a statistical exercise, subject to Eurostat's decision, and we welcome the fact that agreement has now been reached.

The European Commission has proposed that NUTS II and III areas be used to draw up the new European Union structural funds map. The Government expect that the new UK NUTS boundaries will be used. However, all those issues depend on the content of the final structural funds regulations and on the data for individual areas. We cannot at this stage predict with certainty what might be the implications for individual areas.

One of our goals in our presidency was to leave a solid framework for continuation of the work into the Austrian presidency, which began last week. All member states have very distinctive views on issues affecting finance and eligibility criteria. Most, including the UK, have difficulties with the proposals as they stand. The issues will begin to be tackled in earnest under the Austrian presidency. The discussions are likely to take place from the autumn and will continue into early 1999.

The Cardiff meeting last month set a deadline of March 1999 for the Agenda 2000 discussions. Reform of the structural funds is one of the most important elements in the process. It is certainly one of the most visible benefits of the European Union to local people, and I warmly welcome the emphasis in this debate on the local nature of the funds.

Many local representatives have put their case to me for objective 2 status, and I am sure that they will continue to do so. The eligibility criteria for the various strands within objective 2, and the distribution of funds, will not be clear until the final structural funds package has been decided. Neither will we know how much flexibility we shall have at member state level in determining the eligibility of areas. I am certainly aware that people feel strongly on those points, which is why the Government will press for maximum flexibility.

I think that we all welcome the proposal to target a number of non-industrial urban areas under objective 2. The extent to which we can do so is a matter for consideration and discussion. We would welcome the ability to home in on pockets of deprivation.

From various parliamentary answers, and the recent Adjournment debate through which I was able to bring the House up to date, hon. Members may know that the focus of our presidency has been to a large extent on simplifying the administration of the funds, which means attempting to reduce the bureaucracy wherever possible and to increase the involvement of local people.

[Mrs. Barbara Roche]

I am delighted to say that we have achieved a great deal of consensus among member states. At the informal meeting of EU regional policy Ministers in Glasgow last month, chaired by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, there was universal agreement on a number of principles: the importance of job creation, employability and regional competitiveness; the value of effective partnership between the Commission, national Governments, and regional and local organisations, with a clear definition of the role for each; and bringing decision making as close as possible to the people affected. All hon. Members will welcome more regional and local control over the funds' delivery.

The UK has a reputation in Europe as a good manager and administrator of European funds. That has been earned through the hard work of those involved in the partnerships and on the monitoring committees throughout the country, including in London. The House has learnt today about some important projects.

I have been able to observe the development of some of the projects: for example, the business innovation centre in the Lee valley, which does excellent work with small businesses, and especially those looking for expertise in new technology. That is why I attach so much importance to ensuring that we engage those involved in the day-to-day administration of the funds and feed their views into the relevant discussions.

I spoke at the national simplification conference in May, where we discussed, among other matters, ways of improving administration and regional partnerships. We have heard about the important issue of community initiatives in London, such as the urban initiative in Park Royal. Some of those initiatives have helped to form useful local and regional partnerships, such as the urban partnership groups, which have involved local residents, community groups and voluntary organisations in the strategy for tackling social exclusion. My hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) spoke about some of those important partnerships.

I am aware that the programmes can be complex to administer, especially given the small amounts of funding involved, and often fragment the strategic approach to the very issues that they are designed to address. It is important that community initiatives should add value to the mainstream programmes. They should certainly not duplicate or cut across other programmes. Since there must be a close relationship between the community initiatives and the main objectives, we can take a view on particular initiatives only once the framework for the main objectives is clear.

We should remember that this is merely the starting point in a long and complex set of negotiations. A great deal more work needs to be done to achieve "fair criteria and transparent systems"

—a phrase that we used time and again for all the objectives. I am grateful to those hon. Members and their local groups who have lent their support to our efforts in the structural funds discussions so far and also to all hon. Members who have come to see me. We have a long way to go, but, by working in the common interest in the United Kingdom, we can have a fair and just solution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now move on to the debate on disadvantaged areas in Wales and to the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

Disadvantaged Areas (Wales)

10.59 am

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am very grateful for the opportunity to debate this subject and for Madam Speaker's choice of subject. I also thank the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), who is here to reply. I had half expected a Treasury Minister to be present. Indeed, the Treasury can be said to have most to answer for with regard to the state of the Welsh economy. Perhaps Treasury Ministers know that all too well and that is why they are not here. Clearly, the problems of the Welsh economy go well beyond the competence of the Welsh Office; likewise, the solution, which is worth remembering in the context of the National Assembly for Wales, which is to be set up next year and which will have no greater remit than that of the present Welsh Office. Its powers may not be adequate to deal with the problems.

I am conscious that this debate follows the publication yesterday of "Pathway to Prosperity". No doubt we will have an opportunity to discuss that document in detail when the Welsh Grand Committee meets in Merthyr Tydfil next Monday, and I look forward to that debate. Suffice it to say now that the document is certainly strong on analysis. Indeed, it is brutally honest about the lamentable state of the Welsh economy—more honest than any previous publication. It recognises the appallingly low gross domestic product per head in Wales. According to the figures in that document, GDP in Ireland is 43 per cent. higher; it also admits to a job shortfall of about 260,000, which presents a massive challenge on any analysis.

Whereas the publication is strong on analysis, it is sketchy on how the problems will be put right and it offers no additional resources, which is its central weakness. It is remarkable for such a document to refer to the need for better education and skills, better road links, fibre-optic networks, strengthening business support services, creating industrial villages and providing basic rural services, when all that is to be achieved without one single penny of extra Government expenditure in Wales. It is appropriate that we are debating the matter this week—the week before the Government's spending review—as the Treasury has a lot of responsibilities to face up to in that context.

There are both disadvantaged people in Wales—people who may be disabled, unemployed, sick, poor or old—and disadvantaged areas, with high unemployment, low activity rates and low incomes. Those are areas of physical decay, with sub-standard housing, dilapidated social provision, old hospitals, schools and village halls and even old toilets—a decaying environment. They are areas of inadequate provision: a lack of new leisure facilities; a lack of doctors and dentists, which is a problem that is becoming more and more apparent in many areas of Wales, both rural and industrial; a lack of a modern transport system; and a lack of opportunity and hope.

The disadvantaged areas come in many forms and in several parts of Wales. Parts of our cities suffer acute deprivation and poverty. Equally, there are areas of acute rural poverty, which is being exacerbated by the present rural crisis. What is more, in the old industrial areas—the coal mining valleys, slate quarrying villages, iron and steel working towns and sea fishing ports—those old industries have gone, leaving only their relics behind, and new industry has yet to find them.

Between 1986 and 1996, while the M4 and the eastern A55 corridors gained 9,600 new manufacturing jobs, which we welcome, the western part of Wales and the valleys lost 9,200 manufacturing jobs, which is almost an identical loss. That shows how Wales is becoming polarised.

We often hear about Wales's success in attracting inward investment and we certainly welcome what has been achieved, but we are in danger of becoming victims of our own propaganda. There is a gross disparity in the distribution of the jobs created by inward investment within Wales. The six counties with most jobs in overseas-owned manufacturing plants are Flint, Wrexham, Bridgend, Rhondda Cynon Taff, Caerphilly and Cardiff. Between them, they have 52 per cent. of all the jobs that have come to Wales by way of such plants. As that pattern shows, they are mainly in the north-east and the south-east of Wales. The six counties with the least such jobs are Conwy, Gwynedd, Ynys Môn, Ceredigion, Pembroke and Carmarthen, which have between them only 8 per cent. Of course, those areas are all in the west. There is thus a massive east-west divide in inward investment and the creation of new jobs.

Needless to say, the prospects for disadvantaged people who also live in disadvantaged areas are acutely limited. Surely we must put a priority on Government action in those areas. Whereas the Government may not be able to answer the problems of every man, woman and family in every community and every company, they can and must create the conditions in which those problems can be met and overcome—problems of economic, social and environmental infrastructure. Only Government can provide those prerequisites.

Which areas am I describing as being disadvantaged? Some are economically and some socially disadvantaged, and the two overlap. One may be the consequence of the other or may cause a spiral with one leading to the other. Economically disadvantaged areas can be considered in terms of high unemployment. In May 1998—the most recent date for which figures are available—Aberdare and Blaenau Gwent had 10 per cent. unemployment and Ynys Môn and south Pembroke 9 per cent. Those are in the north-west and the south-west and the old coalfield valleys. The lowest unemployment is found near the border with England in the counties of Flintshire, Wrexham, Powys and Monmouthshire.

Clearly, Wales has a problem with low activity rates. Blaenau Gwent has one of the lowest, with 67 per cent., Caerphilly has 68 per cent., and Ynys Môn and Rhondda Cynon Taff, 69 per cent. Again, it is the same pattern. There is a massive gulf between incomes per head in Wales. The lowest incomes per head are due to part-time and seasonal jobs and low wage rates. The areas with the highest wages, on a band of about £340 to £350 per week according to last year's figures, include Cardiff, Wrexham, Neath and Flint. The lowest have wages of about £280 to £290 a week and include Conwy with £284, Gwynedd with £289, and Blaenau Gwent with £309. There is a gap of £60 between weekly incomes in the better and the poorer areas, a fact which reflects pockets of real poverty, both rural and urban, and the Government must do something to close that gap.

Some areas have low wage rates. There are variations within manufacturing industry, of course, and some assembly jobs pay abysmally poor wages—only £3 to £4 an hour. There are also areas with high manufacturing wages, for example in the steel industry, which mean that the Port Talbot and Neath area have a relatively high income per head.

Without doubt, the biggest problem is in the service sector because tourism, for example, pays relatively low wages and is seasonal. The service sector in Wales has a level of remuneration that is about 10 to 16 per cent. below the average for Great Britain because of the difference of the mix within that sector—tourism and other such elements in Wales, compared with financial services in south-east England. The problem of low incomes is acute and is increasing in agricultural areas, where farm incomes have fallen by 43 per cent. Many small family farms in Wales are subsistence farms. With that sort of reduction, if the farmer's wife did not have another job, the farms would not survive.

In the socially disadvantaged dimension, we have areas of high sickness and disability, particularly in the old industrial areas and the valleys—that is particularly true of Merthyr Tydfil. Indeed, eight of the 10 constituencies in the United Kingdom with the highest figures for long-term illness are in Wales, in the old coalfield areas of Dyfed, Glamorgan and Gwent. Many of those areas have poor housing stock, which worsens health. Housing renovation should therefore be a priority.

The four factors of unemployment, activity rates, low wages and widespread sickness mean that some areas have desperately low GDP per head. Of the five counties in Britain with the lowest GDP per head, three are in Wales—Mid Glamorgan, at 62 per cent. of the European Union average, Dyfed at 68 per cent. and Gwynedd at 72 per cent. Yesterday's publication showed that, for 1988-98, Gwynedd got just 3 per cent. of regional selective assistance spending in Wales, and Dyfed-Powys got only 4 per cent. RSA has certainly not started to solve the problem.

In addition to the disparity in GDP per head among areas of Wales, the gap is widening. Between 1982 and 1995, real GDP per head grew by 72 per cent. in Flintshire, 78 per cent. in Torfaen, 62 per cent. in Bridgend and the Vale of Glamorgan, 69 per cent. in Wrexham and 55 per cent. in Cardiff. In the same period, it grew by only 13 per cent. in Pembrokeshire, 16 per cent. in Conwy, 25 per cent. in Anglesey, 23 per cent. in Carmarthenshire, 23 per cent. in Blaenau Gwent and 31 per cent. in Rhondda. Unless action is taken to help the west and the valleys, the gap will worsen.

The western areas and the coalfield valleys are structurally disadvantaged. They are further from markets than other areas. They are at the fringe—sometimes they seem beyond the fringe—of the modern motorway network and of railway links. The population's age puts immense pressure on local government to provide personal services. The skills pattern is often geared to an industrial structure that has long gone. There is inadequate investment in modern educational and training facilities. Housing stock is often old and in need of renovation. Many of the remoter communities have long travel times to work, to hospital and to recreational facilities.

In many disadvantaged areas, money from grants, subsidies and social security immediately flows back out through the centralised structure of retailing and the banking sector. It is also difficult to retain maximum benefit in those areas from any Keynesian-type investment project. There are three approaches to those problems. First, there is the Thatcherite, free market response: "Let them decline; if they cannot regenerate, let them die." Plaid Cymru emphatically rejects that approach. Communities have rights; people are entitled to reasonable hope of decent jobs and services within reasonable reach of their homes. Young people should have a future within their localities, and should not simply be told to get on their bikes. Elderly people should not be left in limbo in aging communities that their grandchildren have left to search for work.

A second approach is Government intervention to help disadvantaged areas. What can the Government do? They could compensate for disadvantage by subsidising low wages through systems such as family credit. They could provide job creation schemes, although those may not survive in the long term. They could subsidise industrial premises, rents or capital.

However, a third approach, which we favour, is to work to remove disadvantage and to create better communications by air, rail, public transport and fibre optics. I was glad to see a reference to that idea in yesterday's publication, although there was no reference to the money needed. We could create better skills through investment in education. Ireland has used regional colleges of technology to boost the skills of its labour force, and to increase income per head. We need to make curriculums relevant to places of work, a point also referred to in yesterday's paper. We need to invest in infrastructure—hospitals, clinics, schools, energy conservation measures, housing and leisure facilities.

The second two approaches—subsidy to compensate for disadvantages, or action to remove the disadvantages—involve public spending, on social security and on rebuilding the capital stock of our communities. If we reject the Thatcherite approach, we must face the need for higher public spending. That is where the Government's juggernaut of promises crashes into the rocks of reality. It is not possible to implement a meaningful programme to rectify the disadvantages of western Wales and the coalfield valleys without higher public spending, a point ignored by "Pathway to Prosperity".

I can hear the Thatcherite mandarins, whose writ still seems to run in the Treasury, claiming that private capital will sort out the problems of the disadvantaged areas. However, private capital goes only to areas in which it will make a profit. It has not gone to western Wales and the valleys, because no profit can be seen. The private sector could be bribed to go there, but that would mean continuing subsidy, diverting public money into private pockets. It would be better to use public money to remove sources of disadvantage, and to harness public and private activity in competition or co-operation, as appropriate.

We cannot hope to tackle the problems of the disadvantaged areas if we adhere to Tory spending ceilings. We need to improve education with more teachers, schools and better equipment; to improve health care, build hospitals and clinics, and employ more doctors, physiotherapists and community nurses; to improve the housing stock through renovation and insulation, better rooms and replacement of defective doors and windows; to tidy up derelict buildings and the environment, bringing wasteland into proper use; to create a proper public transport system and new railways; and to develop recycling schemes.

If Tory orthodoxy were not in charge at the Treasury, we could choose between two options. First, we could divert expenditure from Trident and aircraft carriers to schools and hospitals, from millennium domes to fibre optic networks, and from nuclear weapons to energy conservation. The second option is to raise total public spending. The United Kingdom spends about 40 per cent. of gross national product in the public sector, less than in all but one EU country—Ireland, which ought to spend more in the public sector, too. Finland spends 52 per cent. of GNP in the public sector, Denmark 57 per cent. and Sweden 62 per cent. Yet those countries have high standards of income and quality of life, and of public services. We could raise taxes to allow ambitious plans to go ahead. We could, of course choose both options, changing spending priorities and raising taxes to meet our agenda.

If the Labour Government are not willing to put more public resources into helping disadvantaged people and communities, what on earth was the point of electing them? Were they elected just so that we could see different smiling faces at the Dispatch Box as they carried out the same old Tory Thatcherite policies? From May, responsibility for health and education, housing, roads, jobs and the environment will pass from the Secretary of State for Wales to the national assembly, to which the Welsh Office will be answerable. Where will the assembly get the extra resources to spend on disadvantaged parts of Wales to help attract private sector investment in new industry?

Are we restricted by the Barnett block, which Lord Barnett himself has acknowledged to have been inadequate to meet the needs of Wales? What new expenditure will there be? The figure seems to have fallen to £6.7 billion for 1998–99. Will that be the figure included in next week's spending review, or will we be allowed the £6.9 billion mentioned in April, or the £7 billion stated in the White Paper on which the referendum was fought? The White Paper provisions are being met in many other areas, so I hope that the spending priorities to be published next week will not take the figure below £7 billion.

What will happen if the Department of Trade and Industry changes industrial development policy by giving Wales higher status? In 1993, the Tories reduced development areas in Wales from covering 35 per cent. of the population to covering 15 per cent. Will resources additional to the Barnett block be available, or will money have to be diverted from education or health? Will the assembly be able to borrow to invest in infrastructure projects in disadvantaged areas? What are the prospects for the European structural funds, especially objective 1 funding? I am glad that the nomenclature of units of territorial statistics, NUTS 2, map has been accepted by Eurostat.

Wales has the lowest gross domestic product per head of any country or region in Great Britain and stands 68th in the league table of European regions. It is ridiculous that, unlike England, Scotland or Northern Ireland, we in Wales have never had any objective 1 funding. It is time that changed, and I hope that it will later this year with the announcement for the period 2000 to 2006.

What will happen if we get objective 1 funding? May we assume that the additionality rule will apply and that such funding will be over and above current expenditure patterns? If so, it would logically be over and above the Barnett formula. Will the Minister confirm that? If we need to find 25 per cent. matching funds to trigger the objective 1 money, will they have to come from within the Barnett formula; and will there be enough to meet that cost without depriving other necessary social projects?

Can the Minister give an idea of the timetable for objective 1 decisions? Can he confirm that Eurostat accepts the east-west NUTS 2 map, as I think he can? Will he confirm that 75 per cent. of GDP per capita will still be the threshold for objective 1 eligibility? Will he clarify the financial implications for the assembly and ensure that a beefed-up Welsh Office team will work on projects to take advantage of objective 1 money for disadvantaged parts of Wales?

Will the Minister clarify the position on the new regional policy map? When can we expect the details? I realise that that is not a Welsh Office decision, but it is no doubt involved in discussions. Does he accept that the UK regional map should reflect the UK NUTS 2 bid, as in all logic it should? We hope that significantly more than 15 per cent. of the population will be in the new development areas.

On direct public spending programmes, will the Minister take note of the great dissatisfaction among local job seekers and local subcontractors about the way in which capital projects are managed? In many disadvantaged parts of Wales, for significant capital projects such as the A5 scheme across Anglesey the companies with the contracts bring in their workers with them. It is not only the key workers; we realise that they must come. They also bring people in to do work when local unemployed people could equally well do it. They give subcontracts to outside companies when local companies could do the work.

I realise that the European Union public contract rules tie the hands of central and local government but there must be some way of maximising local employment from such projects. Unless that is done, we lose half the benefit of the investment programmes. If Wales is to get objective 1 status, the objective is surely to raise the standard of living in these areas, not to let the benefit leach away and so lose the maximum impact in the NUTS 2 and objective 1 areas. I hope that the Minister will consider that.

We hope that the Welsh Office will create a new European project department that has some clue about how to use European funds to the maximum benefit of disadvantaged areas. The main issue is how those resources can create long-term self-regenerative economic activity in such areas to ensure that they develop in a way that makes subsidy and grants unnecessary, as Ireland has succeeded in doing. I acknowledge that Ireland has not yet distributed its new-gained wealth to eliminate its pockets of acute poverty.

These are the basic issues. In our disadvantaged areas, how do we ensure that we maintain and expand employment in existing enterprises in manufacturing, agriculture and services? How do we make them more efficient to give better rewards? How do we create more indigenous enterprises and innovation? How do we attract inward investment to disadvantaged areas and create in them the social infrastructure that enhances the quality of life? What is the role of public expenditure in creating industrial, transport and communications infrastructure? How do we adapt UK and EU regional policy to that end? Can that ever be a priority here in London; and shall we have the vision, drive and resources for it to be an effective priority in the Welsh assembly?

We give the Welsh Office credit for recognising the size of the problem, but we are far from convinced that it is providing the answers. We do not believe that it is possible to create 260,000 new jobs and increase GDP per head by 40 per cent. in an environmentally sustainable manner without higher public spending. We suspect that the Welsh Office ministerial team share that misgiving but are constrained by Treasury rules. "Pathway To Prosperity" ends on a significant note. Paragraph 9.6 states:

> "Our success in achieving the vision will be judged against how well we do in closing the GDP gap, raising employment rates, increasing average earnings, and spreading prosperity."

We shall indeed judge the Government by those criteria. We look forward to working in our national assembly to achieve what Westminster has so far manifestly failed to deliver.

11.25 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on raising this subject. It concerns all hon. Members that there is gross imbalance in the Welsh economy.

When I came to the House in 1964, regional policy was based on a uniform system. There were development areas, and the rest of the country. Areas had development area status or nothing. As a Back Bencher, I argued that parts of the development areas were as much worse than their neighbours within those areas as the development areas were worse than, say, south-east England. We therefore needed a differentiated regional policy. I was lucky as a Minister in the Department of Economic Affairs in 1967 to be able to take my proposition through Cabinet Committee. That led to the creation of the special development areas that were so valuable to the valley communities while they were allowed to exist. They were destroyed by the previous Administration, however.

What worries me is that I am more depressed today than I was in 1964 when I was arguing for differentiated policy. I jotted some points down as I listened to the right hon. Member for Caernarfon. I am sorry that my remarks are not as structured as his speech was. He mentioned the 200,000 job shortfall. That conceals a problem in itself. The important thing is that the shortfall is not uniform across Wales. Most of it is in the areas that hon. Members here today represent. That is an internal problem of imbalance within Wales. The Cardiff area is doing relatively well, and I am delighted that it is. I find it incredible that Swansea, which was once a sub-regional hub of industrial development, now has some of the most deprived wards in Wales. Hon. Members present can cite wards in their constituencies in the same situation.

The job shortfall is not evenly spread throughout Wales, but is concentrated in the areas that have the least prospect of being able to make up the shortfall. It is not only that there has been job loss but that there has been a downgrading of jobs. New jobs have in general not matched the quality of the jobs that have gone. Well-paid, skilled and manufacturing jobs have been replaced by part-time and low-paid jobs. Welcome as such jobs are, it is implicit that the ability of the areas that have experienced this to pull themselves up by their own shoestrings is diminishing. As income levels in those areas go down, their ability to generate redevelopment becomes increasingly dependent on resources from outside.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): My right hon. Friend provides a telling description of the dilemmas facing communities such as mine. I was astonished that the press and other media did not record more prominently the stark and startling 200,000 jobs gap. So that we can get an impression of how much of a mountain that is, can my right hon. Friend tell us what is the averaged and annual net job creation over the past 10 years?

Mr. Williams: I have to confess that I do not have that information immediately to hand, but if my hon. Friend would give me two or three minutes, I am sure that I could produce it. My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench have access to the collective wisdom in the Box in the corner, so perhaps they can come up with those figures by the end of the debate. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that it is important that we should have that information, so perhaps the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), can produce it when he winds up the debate. If he cannot, I have no doubt that he will provide the answer in a parliamentary answer as soon as possible.

The structural imbalance is sad, because it is a divisive force in Wales. We do not want Cardiff and the rest of Wales to be turned against each other. I rejoice in the prosperity that Cardiff and the south-east have in prospect; but to return to the comments of the right hon. Member for Caernarfon about resources, that prosperity has been achieved by an abnormal distortion in the flow of resources within Wales. We know that massive sums from the public purse have been put into the Cardiff bay development. That has been a success—as the Welsh Office rightly boasts, it has also drawn in £800 million or more in private funds—but when one adds the massive injection of lottery money, one can see how Cardiff has become what I would describe as a black hole: it has developed the capacity to draw in all the significant new developments that come to Wales.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): My right hon. Friend makes the point that Cardiff is heavily dependent on public expenditure. Does he agree that some of that is old-fashioned public expenditure, in hospitals, universities, the BBC and other fields; and that that is where the danger lies, because restrictions on public expenditure could affect Cardiff's GDP?

Mr. Williams: My right hon. Friend is absolutely correct. One does not solve the problems of deprivation in an area as large as Wales without matching needs with resources.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney will forgive me for saying that part of the problem is that the valley communities, for example, were created as artificial economic units, bringing to previously sparsely populated areas people to drag the coal out of the ground. When we stopped mining the coal, economic logic ceased to be in the communities' favour. One needs only to look at an Automobile Association motorway map to see where the economic strength in Wales lies—at the focal point of all the motorways and of the Severn bridge.

Mr. Rowlands: All roads lead to Merthyr.

Mr. Williams: I desperately hope that Merthyr, too, will enjoy all the benefits that are currently flowing to Cardiff, but the fact is that, in addition to that capital and resource inflow, the south-east benefits from its strength of location, with its distribution network leading via the M5 and the M4 to the north of England, middle England, the east of England and the continent.

That enormous advantage is, as I said, creating a development black hole, which presents the rest of Wales with a double problem: we are in danger of being wedged in, because although we talk about what Ireland has achieved, we tend to forget that Ireland is our competitor. Those of us who represent western areas of Wales, not just the south-west, are competing against the attractions that Cardiff has to offer and against the massive incentives that Ireland has to offer. I remember my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney telling me that the ratio of European Community funds per head flowing into Ireland compared with Wales is about 5:1.

Recently, it looked as though Swansea was going to get a worthwhile electronic development, but we lost it. The Welsh Development Agency has suggested to me that the reason why that happened was not only the incentives that Ireland offered, but the fact that Ireland's tax regime is far more favourable to investment than is ours. It seems to me that that is a matter which we can solve without worrying about the EC. I recognise the constraints on Ministers and I know that, in respect of regional policy and incentives, we are in an EEC straitjacket—but we are free to set tax policy. When I was in charge of regional policy and inward investment in the last three years of a 1970s Labour Administration, we had the best tax regime of anywhere in Europe, with optional one-year 100 per cent. write-off with roll-on facilities, so a firm could choose the form of depreciation and write off that which best suited it. That enabled us to get a disproportionate share of new industry.

Ireland now occupies that position. It has probably the most benign tax regime in Europe, in addition to its regional incentives. The result is that new industry that looks beyond Cardiff has to ask itself whether it wants to go to the relatively low incentives available in west Wales, or whether it might as well go that little bit further and enjoy the tax regime plus high incentives available in Ireland. We are negotiating from a position of weakness, which is why it is essential that we do not lose out in the current negotiations in Brussels on the objective 1 status that Wales so desperately needs to keep. I welcome the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about what appears to be a marked improvement in our prospects in those negotiations.

Let me conclude on the following point. Recently, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State devised the term "powerhouse"; but a powerhouse that is created purely by merging three existing quangos, without providing extra resources, is a form of support that is only a marginal improvement on what was there before. All that can be achieved is a few efficiency gains. If a powerhouse is to work, it has to have power; and in this context, power is resources. I know that my right hon. Friend has been fighting his corner in the Cabinet, but so has every other Minister. We will see the result in the near future. It is important to recognise that the powerhouse is symbolic unless it has the resources to match the needs with which we expect it to deal.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on introducing this subject to the House. As we well know, there are many disadvantaged areas of Wales, including the valleys, Pembroke dock, Llandudno junction and areas to the west and the north as well as rural areas such as Powys and west Wales.

Rural and urban disadvantaged areas share similar problems in some respects, but there are causes and effects specific to certain areas. The key signs are poor housing, failure in education and training and, in many parts of Wales, low aspiration. That is a sad commentary.

The economy is the key to improving those social problems. The document published yesterday, "Pathway to Prosperity", is to be welcomed as far as it goes, but it does not tackle the issues of rural Wales comprehensively enough. It does not provide information or data specific to the area that I represent, which is Powys. Powys is lumped with Dyfed. I should like to know why no figures are available for Powys. It is a unitary authority. Will the Minister confirm that the Welsh Office does not intend to provide individual figures for the county of Powys? Why is it being ignored? The Office for National Statistics has the figures and I understand that it consulted civil servants in the Welsh Office, only to be told that the figures were not required.

I led a campaign in the early 1990s, when the previous Government were in office, to obtain economic indicators for Powys. I was told then that they were not available. I warn the Minister that I will bombard his Department with questions to get the answers as soon as possible because it is a serious matter. We need those indicators to quantify the problems.

The economies of disadvantaged areas of Wales must be addressed if Wales is to be successful within a United Kingdom and European context. According to 1995 figures, the weekly wage for males in Wales was £331: the figure for Powys was £278. As a result of work done by Bristol university, we know that in some areas of Powys, such as parts of Newtown and Cwmtwrch in my constituency, wages are as low as £159 and that in Ystradgynlais they are £188 per week. The average in Powys is £100 per week less than the UK average and that does not include figures for those who are not earning. These areas are really disadvantaged. According to Welsh Office reckoning, the whole of Wales must surely be disadvantaged, except the south-east and perhaps some corners of the north-east.

The economic disadvantage that exists already is worsened by the migration of educated young people. In mid-Wales, many young people leave at the start of their economically active life, as a result of which we cannot foster enough locally based entrepreneurs. I am glad that the document produced yesterday will address that problem.

In rural areas, there are many people over the age of retirement—20 per cent. is a common figure in many parts of rural Wales. Large sectors of the population are not economically active enough and place a huge strain on local public services.

There is very little mention in the document of the agriculture crisis. We cannot blame that entirely on Welsh Office Ministers because Treasury policy on the strength of the pound has had a great impact on agriculture and on manufacturing industry, of which Wales has a higher percentage than any other part of Britain. It is difficult for anyone to export now. Last week, I visited a factory in Wrexham that produces JCB machines. I was astonished to find that most of the parts that it uses are imported from Turkey. Eighteen months ago, the factory obtained 20 per cent. of its parts from Britain, but it now imports 80 per cent. of its parts for transmissions. That is a big problem and is a result of Treasury rather than Welsh Office policy. It demonstrates how hamstrung we are.

The agriculture crisis is felt throughout the rural economy in support and service industries. We have a low-wage economy with low expectations. Urban areas of Wales face problems of higher unemployment. Many parts of rural Wales do not have such high unemployment, but that is partly because of the migration of many of our young people. There is a lack of job security in urban Wales with low-wage, low-skill jobs. Many social problems stem from that, as the document recognises. Bad housing, low educational achievement and so on must be put right, but it is a mammoth task.

The document, "Pathway to Prosperity", and the economic proposals were announced to the press yesterday, but not to Members of the House. I had to seek out the information from the press. The electronic revolution may be proceeding well in Wales, but nothing came through on my fax machine or e-mail to tell me about the announcement. I looked for it on Monday when it became obvious that there was a planted question, but we did not hear anything until the middle of yesterday afternoon. It was announced by an all-Wales electronic network known as Link-up, of which I heartily approve, but some hon. Members struggled to find the information yesterday.

I want to address specifically the issue of average earnings, which is a problem that is hanging round our necks. Many jobs in rural areas, particularly in Powys, are manual and are agriculture related. What targets does the Welsh Office have for manual workers, or are they not in the equation? The economic powerhouse must regenerate the whole of the Welsh economy, both urban and rural.

Money for home improvements—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I apologise for intervening, but it is important to record the fact that "Pathway to Prosperity" was available to Members of Parliament at the same time as it was to the press conference. A parliamentary question was also answered at that time.

Mr. Livsey: I acknowledge what the Minister says, but we expected the document on Monday—it slipped out yesterday. We were not aware of its existence until well into the day. I have just been told that envelopes were made available during the morning, and, if that is true I apologise. I was not aware of that, and neither was the Vote Office because, when I asked for the document, it did not know that it existed. There is something wrong somewhere, as they say in some parts of the press.

[Mr. Livsey]

I want to move on because many hon. Members want to speak. A Welsh Office Omnibus survey carried out in 1995 showed that almost a third of households in Powys suffered from some social deprivation and that almost one in six households suffered from material deprivation. Those figures were much higher than for Wales as a whole and they were much higher than for Dyfed. As I said, in many economic indicators for Wales, Powys is lumped with Dyfed. For example, the GDP figure is averaged out at 76 per cent. for Dyfed and Powys combined. That is not a satisfactory way to proceed and it must be put right.

The right hon. Member for Caernarfon stressed the needs of the valleys and west Wales. I am well aware of those because I lived in west Wales for many years. However, the needs of Powys are being lumped in with a NUTS 2 area excluded from Powys. We are not in the same income league as north-east or south-east Wales. We have many needs, but have practically no infrastructure—we do not know what an A55 or a motorway is.

Mr. Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd): What representations has the hon. Gentleman made to the Welsh Office for his county? Is he aware that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), my hon. Friends the Members for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) and for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) and I made strong representations to the Welsh Office at the 11th hour and managed to get Denbighshire and Conwy included in the objective 1 bid? What measures did the hon. Gentleman take to ensure that his county was included?

Mr. Livsey: The only official figure was 76 per cent. of average GDP, which, as the hon. Gentleman will realise, does not qualify for objective 1 status. The figures for Powys are lumped in with those for Dyfed. The county council had to commission and pay for a special study by Bristol university to produce many of the statistics that I am quoting in the debate, and that is not good enough. I want the Minister to promise that Powys will be considered for objective 2 funding from European Union structural funds because that is vital.

In future, we want better statistics about Powys. We know that it is very difficult to collect data for Powys because it is the most rural area in Wales. None the less, we need them.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that the people of Powys and we, as their representatives, have repeatedly impressed on Ministers, until they have probably become sick of hearing about them, the difficulties of rural poverty in our area and the need for objective 2 status?

Mr. Livsey: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend.

I realise that time is short, but I want to address one or two important issues; otherwise, as an agriculturist, I should be doing less than justice to the present crisis in rural areas. We are approaching common agricultural policy reform, which is very important for our family farms. CAP reform, as it affects rural Wales, must take into account the family farm structure, which differs from that in England. We must examine modulation and direct payments to farmers in the context of CAP reform. Direct payments will certainly be allowable within the context, for example, of the World Trade Organisation negotiations. It is vital that our family farm structure is maintained.

In the past two years, farm incomes have reduced by 90 per cent. Many of our farms are no longer viable—in fact, at DM3 to the pound, they are bankrupt. All these issues are causing enormous stress to farming families in rural Wales. I beg Welsh Office Ministers to influence the Chancellor to change his policy of high interest rates and high valuation of the pound to assist agriculture.

We are also having great problems with the domination of the supermarkets in purchasing livestock throughout Wales. I should be grateful if Ministers would take account of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee's report, which called for an investigation by the Office of Fair Trading, particularly into the marketing of meat through supermarket outlets and the possible problem of excess profits being made in that way and rock-bottom prices being received for livestock in markets in Wales.

We need—I am grateful that this is recognised in the "Pathway to Prosperity" document—much more effort in co-operative marketing of Welsh produce from our farms and added value for that produce so that more income can be generated in rural areas. That matter needs urgent action.

The creation of the Welsh Assembly and its start-up next year will undoubtedly assist the economy of rural Wales. The assembly's committees, particularly those that will focus on economic development in conjunction with the strategy for the Welsh Development Agency and the powerhouse, will certainly bring great benefit. However, those plans are long term—perhaps too long term for some parts of Wales that need immediate assistance.

The quangos must be made more democratic and responsive to the needs of many parts of rural Wales. I make a special plea for our local authorities, which need much more assistance and more generous support from the Welsh Office. I hope that Ministers succeed in their negotiations with the Treasury for the block grant so that local authorities can have greater assistance in the coming financial year. The Government will, I hope, propose targets for greater activity by local authorities, which have huge responsibilities throughout Wales and which, on the whole, have an excellent record of doing a good job.

Once again, I make a plea to the Minister on behalf of rural areas. In the past three months, 86 jobs have been lost in Powys from rural businesses. That may not sound like many, but if one examines the statistics, one realises that 100 jobs lost in Powys are the equivalent of 1,000 jobs lost in Merthyr. Those jobs are a huge loss. Some agricultural merchants have closed, as have two machinery firms in Powys. A multinational company has closed its feed mill. Many such closures have occurred. They may not be writ large on the pages of the Western Mail or the Liverpool Daily Post, but they are severe blows to some of our more remote rural areas.

The assembly has a huge task to improve the lot of people living in disadvantaged areas of Wales. Much poverty in urban and rural Wales must be dealt with. I know that Ministers' hearts are in the right place, but we need action.

Mr. Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on securing this important debate. I agreed with about 95 per cent. of what he said.

My county is hit particularly hard in a number of sectors. In the heavy industrial sector, we lost the Point of Ayr pit, which is on the outskirts of my constituency and used to employ 700 people. In the light industrial and service sectors, 1,500 jobs have been lost in my constituency in the past four months. Traditional British seaside tourism is in decline, which some say is terminal. Two of the biggest towns in my constituency—Rhyl and Prestatyn—have experienced that. Denbighshire has a large rural area which has suffered enormously in recent years. It has an abysmal record of attracting inward investment—that has created only 89 jobs in the past four years. I therefore share the opinions of the right hon. Member for Caernarfon.

I shall try to stress the positive aspects. We are very close to achieving objective 1 status for Wales. Last week's announcement by Eurostat that it has accepted the NUTS 2 map for Wales could provide the springboard for the long-term recovery of the Welsh economy. I am informed by Welsh Office civil servants that that would allow Wales to tap into £1.8 billion between 2000 and 2006. We have now jumped the biggest hurdle for achieving objective 1 status, but we are not there yet. Important negotiations must take place and decisions must be made before we have access to that money.

It is time to reflect on our success to date. Before we try to jump the final hurdles, we should assess our success so that we can go into the final straight invigorated and more determined than ever to secure the best possible deal for the people of Wales. There are many unsung heroes in the fight to gain objective 1 status. Many of the main movers have been castigated for their role. I want to take the opportunity to redress the imbalance and to mention a few of those key players.

I pay tribute to the work of the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain). I extend to him my heartfelt thanks, on behalf of the people of Denbighshire, for his decision to allow, at the 11th hour, Denbighshire and Conwy to be included in the objective 1 bid for Wales. My hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams)—who, unfortunately, is in hospital for two months—has asked me to pass on her heartfelt thanks on behalf of her constituents.

The acceptance of Denbighshire and Conwy has extended to two of the most economically crippled counties in Wales the opportunity to share in a huge aid package. I remind hon. Friends of the plight of those two counties. Conwy has had the worst record of foreign inward investment in Europe—no jobs have been created by foreign inward investment in the past five years. The county has the lowest pay rates in the country and the lowest gross domestic product in Wales. Denbighshire, my county, has experienced 1,500 job losses in the past four months—800 jobs at KwikSave Group, whose national headquarters in Prestatyn have relocated to Bristol, 180 jobs at Hotpoint, Bodelwyddan, and 50 jobs at Egatube in St. Asaph in the past eight weeks alone.

Some people urged my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to forget about Denbighshire and Conwy because, they said, their inclusion so late in the day would threaten the objective 1 bid for the rest of Wales. They said, in ignorance, that the inclusion of Denbighshire and Conwy would raise the GDP level of the Welsh objective 1 bid above the crucial 75 per cent., which would have excluded us—despite the fact that Conwy has the lowest GDP in Wales. Some people said that Denbighshire and Conwy belonged to the prosperous north-east region or sphere of influence in Wales, and that to include the two counties would produce a NUTS 2 region that was not cohesive or coherent—despite the fact that, historically, geographically and linguistically, the two counties share more with west Wales, and therefore should be included in the west Wales and valleys bid.

My hon. Friends the Members for Conwy, for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) and for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) and the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and I put the case for Denbighshire. My hon. Friends the Members for Conwy and for Clwyd, West and I countered the opposing arguments strongly with facts, figures and logical argument. Many of those opposed to the inclusion of Clwyd and Denbighshire would not listen. I am pleased to say that the Under-Secretary did listen. He listened carefully to our case and, after due deliberation, he included the two counties. Many were upset by that decision, but he stuck to his guns and did not waver in his support. He was truly a good shepherd, who looked after his entire flock, maximising the area and population covered by the Welsh objective 1 bid.

I pay tribute to the work of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. He spoke up in Cabinet for the Welsh case for objective 1 status. I commend him for the way in which he acquitted himself in that task. He carried the Welsh case forward, convincing his Cabinet colleagues and the Prime Minister that Wales had a fair and just case for objective 1 status. He had to do so in a Cabinet whose other members represented other areas that wanted objective 1 status.

The Secretary of State's calm and measured approach paid dividends. The Welsh case received the backing of the Cabinet and the Prime Minister. Some people openly criticised the Secretary of State for not being blatant, dogmatic and vociferous. If my right hon. Friend had adopted that approach, he would have jeopardised the Welsh case in Cabinet instead of aiding it. Many of those accusations were not responded to. He took the statesmanlike approach, put his country before political sniping and let the accusations go unchallenged, for to answer them would have distracted his attention from his main goal—that of achieving objective 1 status for Wales.

I congratulate other Ministers on their role in connection with the objective 1 bid, including the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury and the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning. Their guiding principle was "fairness not favours". They have shown themselves ready to hear the cases put by all Members of Parliament, from all areas and all political parties. Their every word and intonation on objective 1 matters was subjected to detailed examination. They have walked a political tightrope. Some hon. Members challenged those Ministers to declare openly their support for the Welsh objective 1 case. For a Minister to do so would probably have meant the end of that Minister's career, and it would definitely have meant the end of the Welsh objective 1 bid, because favouritism would have been seen to have preceded fairness.

[Mr. Chris Ruane]

I thank the individuals, institutions and organisations who provided the hard-headed facts that enabled the debate to progress. I include among them the staff of the Library—I do not know whether I am allowed to name any individual, but I especially want to mention Jane Dyson, now Jane Hough. I also want to mention Cardiff business school and the Wales European Centre. They provided the factual information that was lacking. I share the concern of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) at the paucity of factual information available. I believe that that was due to the fact that Wales experienced local government reorganisation, and those facts were not available on a unitary authority basis. However, the Library and others dug out the facts, enabling us to prove our case.

The purpose of my contribution has been to recognise our achievements to date and to pay tribute to those who have worked behind the scenes, out of the glare of publicity, carefully making the case for Wales. I hope that, by recognising and celebrating our achievements to date, we can go forward with high morale, refreshed and united, in the final stages of achieving objective 1 status for Wales.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on his good fortune in securing this debate, which allows many of us from many parts of Wales to make a contribution, and on the way in which he introduced the subject. The speeches that have been made from both sides of the Chamber have revealed much common ground.

I make common ground with the hon. Member for Vale of Clwyd (Mr. Ruane), who represents an area that I know extremely well. He put his case for objective 1 for his area forcefully and, obviously, successfully. Now that the European Commission and Eurostat have accepted the plan we are on our way, and we hope that an announcement will shortly be made on objective 1 status for west Wales and the valleys.

The comments of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) struck a chord with me, especially when he spoke of jobs in rural Wales being lost and replaced by jobs of lower quality. That is a significant factor in the reduction of gross domestic product in many of the areas that we represent. The response of previous Governments to the loss of jobs in, for example, Trawsfynydd and Trecwn was to appoint task forces. I make a plea to the Minister to forget the idea of using task forces as a response to the loss of jobs in rural Wales. We need a coherent policy that replaces those jobs with jobs of equal quality, although we accept that there are difficulties in ensuring that that always happens.

I should like to respond specifically to a point that the President of the Board of Trade made in the statement on energy policy. My right hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon alluded to the very high unemployment in Anglesey and to the fact that all parties—including the Labour party—fought the last election in Anglesey on a manifesto of support for a gas-fired power station at Porth yr Ogof on the Wylfa site. As the Under-Secretary knows, there was another application for Rhosgoch. Therefore, the statement gave rise to great disappointment.

In a letter to me, the President of the Board of Trade acknowledged that the people of Anglesey were disappointed by the Government's energy policy proposals, which will prevent that gas-fired power station from being built. That disappointment is tinged with anger because we had a plan, agreed by all parties, that would have created hundreds of construction jobs in the next few years, created 100 permanent jobs and secured the future of Anglesey Aluminium, the other major employer on the island. The announcement by the President of the Board of Trade has jeopardised not only the construction plan and permanent jobs in the energy sector but the long-term contract for Anglesey Aluminium.

I understand that the Minister will see an Anglesey deputation next week to examine those issues. I stress the importance of looking again at plans to build the gas-fired station in Anglesey. It may be difficult for British Nuclear Fuels to do that itself, and it has highlighted the reasons for that. It is hard for a wholly owned Government company to breach the Government's energy plan. However, there is no reason why the plan could not be transferred to the private sector for section 36 consent. I ask the Minister to respond to Anglesey's concerns. If the path to prosperity is to be meaningful, quality jobs must be created in places such as Anglesey.

12.10 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to this important debate. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on securing the debate. It was wonderful to hear the old orthodoxy in his speech. Labour may have dropped socialism, but it is good to know that Plaid Cymru has picked up the torch and is running strongly with it.

I shall split my speech into several parts, but I do not want to rehash the speech that I may make next week in Merthyr Tydfil when we discuss the economic agenda for Wales. That is especially important because of the publication of "Pathways to Prosperity". It was not one of my most gripping reads and I have condemned it as being next to useless. It is full of apple pie and spin and has more waffle than Bird's Eye. Wales needs action, not rhetoric, which is what that document contains.

Wales came a long way during the 18 years of Conservative government. Before that, in 1970, some 270,000 people were employed in mining, but the figure is now down to 2,000. More than 30,000 jobs have been lost since the 1970s. Many jobs have transferred from heavy industry and mining to the public service, other service industries and tourism. Manufacturing is vital in Wales; I shall speak later about that.

We must consider the economic context in which Wales operates. The Government have inherited the longest period of low inflation for 50 years and faster growth and lower unemployment than in any other major European Union country. Britain was winning the lion's share of inward investment from outside the EU. With 5 per cent. of Britain's population, Wales gained 20 per cent. of that investment, but not enough of it was spread to west, north-west and south-west Wales. Much of it went to the M4 and A55 corridors.

I welcome the fact that the shift in investment emphasis started when my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) was Secretary of State for Wales. He ensured that it was more evenly spread and that there was greater emphasis on the Welsh Development Agency. One of its great challenges when it is turned into an economic powerhouse will be to compete with regional development agencies in England.

The golden legacy that I have mentioned is being wasted, frittered away. For the first time in many months unemployment is rising, and is doing so even before the introduction of the minimum wage. The Economist of 20 June stated:

"Ministers may make the situation worse in a number of ways: imposing a minimum wage will add to labour costs without any guarantee of improved productivity . . . By setting out his spending plans so far in advance Mr. Brown seems to have ruled out using fiscal policy to help bring the economy smoothly down to earth, leaving the bank to do the job alone by means of interest rates".

Interest rates have risen six times in the past 14 months, and it is pointless to blame the Monetary Policy Committee under Eddie George because the Government set that up with the emphasis on controlling inflation, which is now rising. The target has been missed 12 times out of 13, and there is a threat that interest rates will rise again. If that happens, Welsh businesses, especially the smaller businesses of west and north-west Wales, will be hit again. Inflation is bad for their ability to predict, and higher interest rates are bad for those with loans and overdrafts. The minimum wage will have a knock-on effect on differentials, and the high pound, which has been mentioned several times in the debate, is bad for exports.

I spoke about the importance of manufacturing. The publication "Pathways to Prosperity" states that manufacturing accounts for 28 per cent. of the Welsh GDP. The strong pound is hitting exports, and higher interest rates mean a stronger pound. A non-competitive pound makes our exporters less able to compete with those in the rest of the EU. A CBI survey shows that export orders for May and June were the lowest since January 1983. In a document that it sent to me, the Federation of Small Businesses recommends the introduction of an export promotion board.

"Pathways to Prosperity" states that the Government will try to bring together a number of agencies so that there will be a one-stop shop and advice centre for exporters and those who want to export. It is said that that will be introduced at the end of this year, but manufacturers face problems now and cannot wait until then. I urge the Minister to bring that plan forward to ensure that as much support as possible is given to Welsh firms that could benefit from an increase in exports. If they can increase exports, more jobs will be created throughout Wales.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) spoke about investment in Cardiff. We welcome that tremendous success, but we must ensure that investment spreads to the rest of Wales. One of the local Welsh newspapers reported that about £110 million is to be invested in redeveloping Swansea city centre. I hope that that is a success and that it will attract more jobs to Swansea and, as a result of the ripple effect, to west Wales.

The Federation of Small Businesses also seeks a development bank for Wales to help indigenous firms. It is excellent that 20 per cent. of inward investment comes to Wales, but indigenous firms must be enabled to grow. In a letter to me, the federation states:

"Many small businesses currently find borrowing money over the medium term impossible because either the banks do not offer such facilities or the repayment conditions place an excessively heavy demand on cash flow. A development bank for Wales would ensure a greater degree of certainty that borrowing terms would be affected by cyclical factors such as inflation, recession or a housing market slump."

Farming is another disadvantaged sector in Wales. A press release from Bob Parry of the Farmers Union of Wales refers to the rally in Cardiff at the time of the European summit. It states:

"Farmers must stand together and fight for their rights against the hostility shown to the countryside by some senior members of the Government."

He condemned the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and said that farm incomes in some places had fallen by 89 per cent. The press release continued:

"He is responsible for agriculture in the UK, but seems more interested in cutting costs and guarding the purse strings of the Treasury. He is the enemy within. Chancellor Gordon Brown is keeping a miserly grip on spending despite the overwhelming crisis that threatens to engulf our industry. Prime Minister Tony Blair is presiding over this farce as the entire fabric of rural life in Wales is torn to shreds."

On Monday, I was in Welshpool, where I spoke to some farmers from Smithfield. They have no doubt about who is responsible for this crisis—the Government. The Government must take urgent action to assist farmers in Wales before it is too late. It is already predicted that, if this carries on much longer, 8,000 more farming jobs will be lost in Wales. That must not be allowed to happen.

All that the report says about farming is that we should think about putting greater emphasis on organic farming. Farmers want to do the job that they set out to do. Many have done it for generations, yet all the Government can offer them is greater emphasis on organic farming. The Government are simply not listening.

The economic report talks again and again about education. It says that the Government need to invest more in education to ensure that more people in Wales get a better education, yet what do we see? Apart from the fact that we were promised lower class sizes, which are increasing in Wales, yesterday, the House of Lords threw back to this House the amendment that proposed that students in Wales, England and Northern Ireland should pay £1,000 extra if they go to Scottish universities—£1,000 more than students from Scotland, Milan and Catalonia.

That has to be wrong. I hope that the Minister will put great emphasis on that, and will have words with Ministers in the Department for Education and Employment and with the Prime Minister to ensure that we do not throw that amendment back to the House of Lords, but accept it. It is common sense and it will help all the people of Wales and Britain with their further education.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on securing this debate because it allows the Government to underline our absolute commitment to achieving economic prosperity for the whole of Wales.

May I immediately respond to the predictable tirade of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans)? Instead of being cheap and cheerful, he has become cheap and cheeky in his role in Welsh affairs. He attacked—I know that he is doing his job valiantly as an Opposition Member—"Pathway to Prosperity", saying that it is "next to useless." That is interesting. The document was written in careful partnership with the Confederation of British Industry, the Federation of Small Businesses, the Trades Union Congress, academics from the economic sector and others involved in the serious job of building the Welsh economy. The hon. Gentleman rejects it with a cheap and cheeky slogan.

The hon. Gentleman's Government presided over 20 years of destruction of west Wales and the valleys, from which we are now trying to recover and which the right hon. Member for Caernarfon addressed with great eloquence We never had an economic agenda from the Tory Government; it could have been written on the back of an envelope. At least we have produced 53 pages of closely argued analysis and action proposals, which need to be debated on their merits.

The higher pound is undoubtedly causing severe problems, especially for manufacturing exporters in Wales and elsewhere in Britain, but two thirds of the rise in the pound occurred under the Tory Government. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley cannot simply wish away or ignore that. I remind him that "Pathway to Prosperity" proposes detailed action plans, which we will have an opportunity to discuss next Monday in Merthyr Tydfil; in that sense, the pathway to prosperity leads to Merthyr Tydfil. We will address that when we get the opportunity.

I apologise on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, who is unable to be here for the whole debate, but he assures me that he will carefully read all the speeches—with the exception perhaps of the previous one—for the detailed points that they make, especially the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), which included some valid points, and of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey). I look forward to being bombarded with questions about statistics, but I tell the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire that Powys will be a separate NUTS 3 area, so the Office for National Statistics has been asked by the Welsh Office to supply detailed figures, including those on gross domestic product, for Powys. I hope that that will therefore absolve him from the obligation to bombard me, and absolve me from the obligation to reply to him.

Mr. Rowlands: Anyone who has read "Pathway to Prosperity" will have been struck forcefully by the enormous job gap figure of 200,000. Earlier, I intervened on my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) to ask how we can measure that job gap by net job creation in Wales over the past 10 years. I do not know whether the Minister can reply to that point today, but, if he comes to Merthyr Tydfil, I hope that he will have an answer.

Mr. Hain: The broad answer to my hon. Friend's point is that, if we had the Tory strategy on job growth, it would take another 40 years to make up that gap, so it is not a strategy at all.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) understandably raised important points about Anglesey, particularly the future of Anglesey Aluminium. As the Minister most immediately responsible, and having worked with the Secretary of State, I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have been determined to protect the future of Anglesey Aluminium in particular, which is crucial to the local economy. I am confident that we will be able to do that and to secure its energy supply at a relatively cheap rate, if not at exactly the rate that it has enjoyed, which it was not expecting to maintain. Therefore, I do not think that there is doom and gloom ahead for Anglesey in general, or for Anglesey Aluminium in particular.

I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Mr. Ruane) for his contribution and especially for the expert way in which he identified the plight of Conwy and Denbighshire.

Nearly two decades of woeful neglect have produced a real crisis in west Wales and the valleys. There has been a dramatic change in the economic and social fabric of Wales over the past two decades; rather than the historic north-south divide, there is now an east-west divide. That has been confirmed by an authoritative analysis from the department of city and regional planning at Cardiff university, which I understand is to be published next week.

I was particularly grateful that the European Commission has now designated west Wales and the south Wales valleys as a single NUTS 2 area and, in so doing, has recognised the new realities of the Welsh economy.

I agree with many of the points that the right hon. Member for Caernarfon made, and join him in rejecting the Thatcherite free-market approach that plunged Wales into such difficulty over 20 years. I gently point out that his contribution was strong on analysis, but weak on the action that he called for us to provide. I hope that when he inspects this pamphlet before making his speech in Merthyr—which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) always reminds me, is the centre of the industrial revolution—he will read some of our detailed proposals and discuss them on their merits.

Mr. Wigley: My main criticism was the lack of resources. Will the Minister confirm whether there is any additional money to turn this into reality?

Mr. Hain: There is much money; indeed, tens of millions of pounds, if not hundreds of millions, is embedded in this strategy, but I point out that, next week, an announcement is due to be made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the comprehensive spending review, and the right hon. Gentleman would not expect me to anticipate that—at least not if I wanted to stay in this job.

GDP per head in west Wales and the valleys NUTS 2 area is about 72 per cent. of the European Union average. It is one of poorest areas of Europe, as the right hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out. That compares with the east Wales GDP per head, which is over 90 per cent. of the average.

A third of the working age population are jobless. They may or may not be on the unemployment register, but they are without work. In areas such as Pembrokeshire and Anglesey, the official male unemployment rate is more than twice as high as for the rest of Wales. Even those in work suffer among the lowest wage rates in Britain. Ill health and disability is rife in the south Wales valleys in particular, where the rate of limiting long-term illness is more than 60 per cent. higher than the Great Britain rate. That is a terrible indictment.

Those problems have been at the forefront of our thinking on the analysis in "Pathway to Prosperity", our new economic agenda for Wales, which the Government published yesterday. We did so for the first time with a video link conference throughout Wales. The Secretary of State was able to take questions, including some from Caernarfon, Wrexham, Newtown and Newcastle Emlyn, not forgetting Swansea. The chief executive of Gwynedd county council welcomed the document, and we are grateful for that.

The document is an important milestone and there will be a full opportunity to debate it next Monday. One of its themes is the need for a pronounced and decisive shift of effort to those areas that are most in need, notably west Wales and the valleys. The area must have the infrastructure that it needs, key industries must be fostered, small businesses must receive the support that they need to grow, and communities and individuals must be given the opportunity and facilities to sustain them. This programme depends on a powerful and productive partnership between the public and private sectors and we are determined to secure one.

Concern has been expressed about tourism. I fully acknowledge that the Welsh tourist industry, which is vital to the economy of west Wales, is under real pressure. Increasing competition—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Illegal Encampments

12.30 pm

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Every year, with the onset of spring and summer—although this year the onset of summer has been some time coming—all elected representatives begin to fear one particular telephone call. It usually comes on a Saturday evening, and it is that some 30 caravans have descended on one of the public spaces in our constituency. We are asked, "What are you going to do about it?"

The problem arises every year and we try to deal with it. Once summer has passed and the pressure eases off, the determination to work out a defined plan goes with it. Therefore, I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the matter today, more in anticipation of difficulties in Birmingham—which we have experienced from year to year—rather than because there is an acute problem.

I chose "Illegal Encampments" as the title of the debate quite deliberately. I am not referring to Romanies and other people with an alternative life style, who have the right to be protected. They have the right to expect us to treat them as seriously as we treat our constituents. I am talking about cowboy builders and traders who use mobile phones to do business from public sites. They cause havoc for neighbouring communities. They cannot be traced when anything goes wrong—they move on and leave devastation behind.

I shall never forget the Ley Hill estate last summer, when some 30 caravans and their owners occupied one of the parks. The devastation they caused was more like an invasion of the original tribe of the Vandals than the pursuit of an alternative life style. The village hall's windows were smashed and wooden fences were ripped apart. Several cars were dismantled and torched; one caravan was gutted and dismantled. They even left bits of kitchen units behind. I had some difficulty explaining how they came to be there. They also left behind soiled clothes and general household rubbish. There was fly tipping. My powers of description are inadequate, but I know that hon. Members will be familiar with the scene that I am trying to describe.

I am talking about cowboy builders and tradesmen, unsafe working practices, stray dogs, noise nuisance from generators and fly tipping of commercial as well as domestic waste. Local residents feel threatened, intimidated and helpless. They turn to us and say, "What are you going to do about it?" If a local authority serves notice, the whole process of eviction can take up to 10 days. That may not seem a long time, but try living next to one of these sites and 10 days is a very long time.

The problem appears to be seasonal; during the summer, tarmacing and double glazing businesses are pursued from public spaces. During the winter months, the traders move to more permanent and, I assume, more comfortable surroundings.

I know that some of my hon. Friends feel that it is not especially useful to try to draw a distinction between real travellers and cowboy business men with their anti-social behaviour. I understand that it may be difficult to define that distinction in legislation, but I can assure the House that our constituents do not care a great deal about the finer legalistic difficulties; they are exposed to nuisance and they want us to deal with it.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Does my hon. Friend accept that part of the problem is that the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 means that local authorities have to deal with the problem on an individual basis? Could not part of the solution be a return to a designated area, which might solve some of the problems she has described?

[Mr. Brian White]

Ms Stuart: I accept my hon. Friend's point and I am grateful to him for raising it.

How much of a problem are illegal encampments? Birmingham city council suggests that the number of encampments is not rising, but the number of complaints is. There is a little sophistry here—if the number of complaints is rising it is because people are getting very tired of the absence of any co-ordinated action. The council also made the point, which I accept, that, as the city has changed and there are now fewer derelict factory sites—which the travellers used to use—travellers have moved to more publicly visible spaces, which has provoked a more open public response.

The council also suggested that, because of public hostility, travellers feel the need to travel in larger groups for security. I accept that, but the travellers are not an homogenous group. People who want to pursue an alternative life style, such as gipsies, may want to travel in larger groups, but cowboy business men do not need to do that.

No evidence from national figures is available. When I raised the issue with the council, it said that when travellers are moved on they simply go to another area and cause the same problems there, which does not resolve the underlying problem. I am reluctant to accept that. We have no national figures that show the true extent of displacement, but I am convinced that a significant section of the transient business community could be discouraged from continuing with the practice.

When travellers descend on public spaces, where do we ask them to go? Birmingham has two properly supervised sites—one run by the local authority, the other private. One is in Castle Vale, the other in Aston. They can accommodate some 20 vans. However, I am far from convinced that the sites are properly managed. At one, internecine disputes between groups of travellers means that the minute one group moves on, warfare breaks out. I understand that the National Gypsy Council tried to intervene. One of my colleagues has told me that some of the travellers are on the electoral register, with the caravan site as their address. That gives a degree of permanency to the sites, which is not what was intended. The sites in Birmingham are not properly used.

When there is an invasion of a public space and the travellers move on after 10 days, at the most, we are left with the bill for clearing up. Birmingham city council has spent £300,000 over the past two years on clearing up such public spaces. That is unacceptable.

I understand that, in the last week of June, 20 caravans were illegally parked—compared with 70 last year. I have some doubts about the comprehensiveness of the figures. Perhaps one reason for this year's figure being slightly lower is the particularly successful police operation at Woodgate Valley country park a few weeks ago. Some 30 caravans were on the move and local residents tipped off the police. When the travellers reached the park, they began to dismantle a wooden fence. The police arrived and Inspector Pepper told them that they could either face charges of criminal damage—they had been caught red handed—or they might like to move on. They decided that, on balance, they would like to move on.

What would happen if the police brought criminal damage charges against 30 caravan owners? They have the power to impound some of the vehicles, but if the owners are charged and taken to the police station, the administration is time consuming and bureaucratic and probably will not help in the long run.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): I fully support my hon. Friend's argument and should like to add a further point to the one she has been making. In Hertfordshire, we have similar problems with encampments, which impose substantial costs not only on the police and local councils, but on private individuals. A number of private individuals in my constituency have incurred considerable expense either making security arrangements to stop people encamping on their land or remedying the effects of such encampments. Harassment of many members of the local population when dealing with travellers is another problem. Does my hon. Friend think that that is also a problem in her area?

Ms Stuart: Yes, I can confirm that it is a problem in my area. Some of the remedies that I should like the Minister to consider would address the problems of both private individuals and local authorities. My hon. Friend's intervention was therefore very timely.

Speed—being on the spot almost immediately—is the essence of resolving the problem, as it is almost too late once an encampment has been established. We have to have good co-ordinated action involving a variety of agencies, which must act simultaneously and with one purpose. We also require good local intelligence—perhaps almost as an extension of neighbourhood watch schemes.

We must also not overlook the availability of properly supervised traveller sites. Such provision is essential. It is perhaps a pity that local authorities are no longer under a statutory duty to provide sites. Nevertheless, as I said, I do not accept that lack of sites in Birmingham can be used to justify lack of action. The problem is one of supervision.

Birmingham city council has not entirely ignored the problem, and I give it credit for the advances that it has made. The council has committed £108,000 to secure—as my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) described—five public open spaces that have frequently been used by travellers. Although, unfortunately, all five sites are outside my constituency, I shall certainly continue to press for securing the more vulnerable ones.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Two of those sites are among about five in my constituency that are regularly abused by itinerants. I hope that the Government's Crime and Disorder Bill—which puts responsibility on councils, in partnership with police and local organisations—will show that partnerships are one way of preventing such illegal trespassing, which is what it is, and finding swifter means, by building local crime action plans, to combat trespassing when it happens.

Ms Stuart: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. I very much support his comments.

Although securing sites by installing concrete bollards, for example, is useful, it is only a delaying tactic.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Although I am aware that my hon. Friend has to finish her speech, I should like to say that one of the sites—Barnes hill—is in my constituency. She will be aware that it is a great tribute to the area's residents that security measures are now being installed there. They co-operated with the local council and me to ensure that scenes of devastation such as she saw in Ley Hill could not happen there. Does she agree that our hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) is right: we need better co-ordination, which must operate both inside and outside working hours? All too often, the system seems to grind to a halt once 5 o'clock comes along.

Ms Stuart: I thank my hon. Friend. He is absolutely right.

Do we—as we are constantly told—require new legislation? Birmingham city council's environmental services committee presented proposals to Birmingham Members and asked us to push for new powers allowing local authorities, once they had made proper provision for alternative sites, to ask police to require travellers to move on to those sites within 48 hours. Although that is a very tempting solution—which should perhaps be pursued with another Minister—I have a difficulty with the proposals because they define a gipsy as a person of nomadic habit of life, whatever their race or origin, but do not include members of an organised group, travelling showmen or persons engaged in travelling circuses who are travelling together as such.

I am worried that such definitions get away from the real problem—anti-social behaviour. We object to such behaviour—by whomever and in pursuit of whatever life style. We have to deal with it.

What can be done? It is a difficult problem and there is no easy solution. Travellers form an extremely diverse community. Very often, that diversity of backgrounds and purposes is used as an excuse for doing nothing. I am no longer prepared to accept that excuse. We have reached a stage at which we often mistake activity for achievement—thinking that we are achieving something by holding yet another meeting to discuss a difficult problem. The time has come to deal with the problem.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): The problem that my hon. Friend is describing exists in the outer conurbation—it certainly exists in south Staffordshire and Cannock Chase. The issue has previously been discussed as it applies to the shires, but the urban aspect of the issue is the pressing one. Although my hon. Friend has discussed some solutions, my meetings with police suggest that only two things are required: moving-on power, to which I should add power to impound vehicles, and the provision of sites. I speak as someone who was stoned by some of the people she has described when trying to make those points to them.

Ms Stuart: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention and am delighted that—by the looks of it—they missed.

I stress that I take traveller welfare issues extremely seriously. I am not dealing with those issues more explicitly in this debate because of time limitations and the fact that I want to deal with co-ordinated action.

The Crime and Disorder Bill provides us with a unique opportunity—it imposes a duty on local authorities—with police, to make provision for safe communities. I should like the plans to include specific proposals to deal with illegal encampments and to state who will be responsible. Who does one telephone on a Saturday afternoon? Who will man the telephone lines? As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, it is entirely unacceptable that—as happened last year—a city council does not start until the Tuesday morning following a bank holiday to deal with an encampment that started the previous Friday. The Crime and Disorder Bill's safer community strategy will provide us with power to take immediate action.

We should establish a communication system so that people know there is a hotline and who to telephone if they see encampments on the move. They should be clear about whether police or the local authority are responsible for reacting to reports. We need fast and reliable information.

The public have a role to play not only in providing information but in taking some responsibility for the problem. It is no good complaining one week about cowboy traders but using those traders the next week to fix the driveway. There is some inconsistency in behaviour which will have to be resolved. We will have to make it clear to people that a natural consequence of using cowboy traders is that those traders will be attracted to an area.

I should like other agencies to be involved in the matter much more swiftly and with much greater co-ordination. I expect those who do business from open sites to pay tax. I therefore expect the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Benefits Agency to take some interest in such trading. The action should be co-ordinated—even at the risk of stoning—and possibly include police.

Illegal encampments are a local problem with national implications. I urge the Minister to assess the various local strategies to develop a national strategy. We need agreed and enforceable protocols. We cannot continue with the current arrangements whereby responsibility is shifted from one agency to another. At the end of the day our residents suffer and, to add insult to injury, they are also left to pick up the bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) on securing a debate on a subject that I know is of very great concern to her, to many of my hon. Friends who are here today and to residents and businesses in her constituency. I fully take on board the concerns that have been voiced about the particular problems experienced in the west midlands.

We do not underestimate what an appalling nuisance unauthorised encampments can be. I and my ministerial colleagues have met a number of local authorities and hon. Members to discuss the issue, and it is not surprising that correspondence about it continues to feature heavily in my postbag. We liaise regularly with our colleagues in the Home Office, who have responsibility for police powers to deal with trespass on land and with criminal activity, whether by gipsies or by anyone else.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): On that very point, perhaps the Minister or his colleagues in the Home

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

Office will be able clarify a matter that I am raising on behalf of the Country Landowners Association, of which I am a member. Can the Minister confirm that the Wealden case did not apply to section 61 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, but only to section 77, which applies to local authorities, and that therefore the police can take action even though the landowner concerned may not have taken civil action first? I appreciate that it is a highly technical point and I should be grateful if the Minister would respond by correspondence in due course.

Mr. Raynsford: As the hon. Gentleman recognises, he has raised a highly complex issue and, rather than give a brief response on a matter of which I have had no prior notice, I would prefer to write to him and I undertake to do so.

On a more positive note, however, our latest biannual count of gipsy caravans shows the lowest number ever on unauthorised sites. For the first time the figure has fallen to below 20 per cent. of the recorded number of caravans, compared with 50 per cent. when the counts began almost 20 years ago. Some of those vans will be on sites that are tolerated, even without planning permission. The remaining 80 per cent. of caravans are on local authority or authorised private sites.

Before moving on to talk about what the Government are doing to tackle the problem of unauthorised camping, let me make it clear that we recognise that not all gipsies and travellers cause problems. The Government have no quarrel with those who pursue a nomadic way of life. Many gipsies are keen to follow their travelling way of life in peace and are keen to provide sites for themselves or to secure places on authorised sites. In addition to meeting those concerned about unauthorised camping, I have met several groups representing gipsy and traveller interests to gain their perspective on a travelling way of life.

As I have said, it is clear from our biannual count of gipsy caravans that there is a persistent problem with unauthorised camping in the Birmingham area, and I understand the wishes of my hon. Friend's constituents to have something done about it. I understand that she has put forward proposals to the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) for changes to the law that her local authority considers would enable it and the police to deal more effectively with unauthorised camping.

Of course, it is for my hon. Friend the Minister of State the Member for to respond in detail to those proposals. I understand that he is to meet my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston to discuss the matter further. He has certainly made it clear that he will do so.

In the meantime, I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department is deeply concerned about the disruption and misery that can be caused by unauthorised encampments. The police have a wide discretion under sections 61 and 62 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 to remove people who trespass with a view to taking up residence. Enforcement of the law is the responsibility of chief police officers. The Government urge them to use their powers in relation to trespass whenever appropriate. The law makes no distinction between travellers and anyone else, and applies to anyone who acts in a way which society finds unacceptable.

Mr. White: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is often easier for police and local authorities to negotiate travellers to move on than it is to use the powers that are available to them, and that that is part of the problem?

Mr. Raynsford: I shall come to the specific procedures in a moment, but I wanted to make it absolutely clear that the police have powers to remove people. There is no question about that.

The Government are under no illusion about the nuisance associated with many unauthorised encampments. If there is evidence of criminal activity on an unauthorised site, of course it is right that the police should deal with that as they see fit, just as they would with members of the settled community.

I have seen the proposals for changes in the law to which my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston has referred, and I have given some thought to the policy issues relevant to my Department, in particular the proposals that affect local authorities. The proposals appear to envisage a return to the position in part II of the Caravan Sites Act 1968, which is now repealed, which placed a legal duty on local authorities to provide sites for gipsies, as then defined. Once a local authority had provided adequate sites, or the Secretary of State had deemed it not necessary or expedient for them do so, the authority's area could be designated by the Secretary of State as an area where gipsies camping on certain categories of land were committing an offence.

The provisions in the 1968 Act resulted in a good number of sites being provided by local authorities, and there is a network of well over 300 sites providing some 5,200 pitches for gipsy families. We want those sites to remain open and available for gipsies to use if they wish. They should also be properly managed. My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston referred to that important issue. I understand that one site in Birmingham can accommodate up to 15 caravans and that the last five biannual counts indicate that there may be vacancies on it. That may be associated with the management difficulties to which my hon. Friend referred.

However, the overriding demand from gipsies is for sites owned and managed by gipsies themselves. That came across very strongly in the meetings I had with gipsy representatives. The proportion of vans on privately owned sites has more than doubled in the past 20 years, but, in the same time, the number of vans on local authority sites has increased by only a third. The January 1998 count revealed that a new privately owned site, with planning permission, has emerged in the Birmingham area, which in January was accommodating five caravans.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): The council has identified that providing for all the unauthorised campers would require an additional 70 places. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) referred to the seasonality of the problem. Surely we need to establish the origin of some of the travellers. Rather than being taken to local sites, they should be sent packing back to where they came from or where they stay in the winter.

Mr. Raynsford: I should make two points to my hon. Friend. First, the provision of local authority sites in Birmingham reflects the level envisaged as appropriate for Birmingham to meet its responsibilities under the 1968 Act. I am not sure whether further extensive provision to meet the needs of a substantial number of additional people who may well be transients is necessarily appropriate, given the seasonal factors to which she referred. Secondly, it is extremely difficult to anticipate whether and when people of a genuinely nomadic life will arrive in a particular place; therefore, there have to be proper arrangements in place to cope with the particular problems generated by unlawful camping, which is often the consequence.

The provision of sites for gipsies under the 1968 Act required a tremendous level of local political will to identify and produce sites that were acceptable both to gipsies and to the local community. I can see no reason why local authorities today would find it any easier to secure such sites. It involves difficult decisions, often against considerable local opposition, so I am somewhat sceptical about the proposed changes in the law back to the 1968 model.

It is clear that the authors of the proposals my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston described recognise that there will be a need for further sites to ensure that gipsies will have somewhere lawful to camp. Local authorities already have discretionary powers to provide further permanent sites if they consider it necessary. Alternatively, if the gipsies concerned are visiting the area for short periods, they can consider the provision of temporary, tolerated sites on council owned land. Circular advice to local authorities from my Department already advocates the provision of such sites in local authority areas to cater for the needs of those visiting the area for short periods.

The provision of short-stay sites with sanitary and refuse collection facilities can do much to ameliorate nuisance and should deter some gipsies from camping on more unsuitable public or private land. My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston rightly drew a distinction between genuine gipsies and people whom she described—probably rightly—as cowboy builders. It is important to recognise that the Government are determined to ensure that effective action is taken against people who camp unlawfully and cause immense nuisance and trouble to others. In consultation with the university of Birmingham, we have therefore been developing good practice on the handling of unauthorised camping. Work on that is proceeding apace; there will be an announcement in the autumn. Obviously, we are also working with the Home Office and other Departments.

In the meantime, I am sure that Birmingham city council appreciates the importance of working closely with the police in dealing with this issue. Inter-agency agreements—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Village Schools

1 pm

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): It is a great privilege to secure this Adjournment debate on village schools and rural communities—it is disappointing that not a single Liberal Democrat Member is present to listen to it.

When I became the Member of Parliament for North Norfolk more than a year ago, I was unaware of the extent of rural deprivation. I knew what poverty was like in cities such as Birmingham, Sheffield and Glasgow because I had lived and worked in such places. Poverty is much less obvious in small rural villages, but it is just as serious. Industrial areas have suffered great change, but, to some extent, have been cushioned by inward investment and Government spending. Rural areas have faced similar changes, but without the cushion.

The change has been insidious; village life has progressively had the heart torn out of it. In my village, there is no longer a school, a pub or a shop. The church is hanging on by its fingernails. Public transport in many areas is a joke. Market towns are facing competitive challenges from supermarkets and big-city shopping complexes, and as a result of changes in agriculture. Housing, especially in coastal and other tourist areas, is being priced out of the reach of local people. Some villages are in danger of being populated solely by retired people and holidaymakers.

That is the social background against which politicians must assess the importance of village schools. The Minister for School Standards will know that I intend to raise the future of Potter Heigham first school: I visited the hon. Gentleman only 10 days ago with the school's chairman of governors and head teacher, the vice-chairman of the parish council and a parent of a child at the school. I raise the subject of Potter Heigham both because I feel passionately that the school and its children deserve a future and because it raises wider issues.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): On such wider issues, does my hon. Friend agree that the decision whether to keep open a village school is often taken purely on financial grounds, without giving proper consideration to the children, who, on the closure of their school, must be bussed much greater distances to another school in the local town, thereby making their school day very long and their schooling programme much less satisfactory?

Mr. Prior: I fully agree with my hon. Friend. I shall draw out some of those points later.

Potter Heigham parish council has written as follows:

"The whole structure of our village and way of life would be gravely affected by the loss of the School.

We would be condemned to a retirement village with an ageing population. Young people with families would no longer come and live here, and those already here will move away to where there is a local school.

We feel that children are an essential ingredient in a balanced society and the children and School play an important role in the local community.

The School holds a Nativity Play, a Harvest Festival and a Carol Service. They sing regularly at the Old People's Home and appear every year in the Christmas Pantomime run by the local drama group—all this will be lost to our village if the School is closed.

The loss of young persons in the village will also affect various Village Hall-based clubs:—Playgroup, Brownies and Cubs will all fold through lack of numbers . . . There would be a domino effect on local amenities and societies".

The parochial church council has written:

"The PCC has always had links with the School. The village children have held their own services in the Church . . . Closing the School will result in those village children whose parents do not take them to services, never having the opportunity to get to know the Church building and its associated activities. Whichever school they attend will naturally have links with its own village Church.

The Church and other village organisations would lose the vital energy that young adults bring to them, besides the enjoyment of young children participating in village life. The result would be a steady and unstoppable decline in village activities".

Elderly residents of Potter Heigham have written:

"As elderly residents of Potter Heigham, we realise the value of having a School in our village. Young families are vital to small rural communities such as ours, otherwise a village dies. We enjoy visiting the School several times a year for functions such as shows, fetes and the School's Nativity Play."

A group of past pupils has written:

"The presence of the School in the village engenders a community spirit which stays with children throughout their education, and helps provide a sense of identity. All children and parents know each other, and can provide support for each other; for example, pupils have familiar adults present if their parents are late."

Those statements are more eloquent than any words of mine could be.

I should add that transport is another key consideration. in the debate. In Norfolk, home-to-school transport costs £11 million a year. The closure of village schools will add to that, as well as putting more cars on already-congested roads. The Minister should be in no doubt that village schools go to the heart of the rural community. I know that he spent some time as a child in Coltishall in Norfolk, so he will be well aware of those facts.

Village schools do far more than I have so far described. Being part of the community would not be enough if they did not also provide excellent education for our children. I ask the Minister to go to North Norfolk to see for himself. Last week, he was in North-West Norfolk, where he said, if the newspapers are right:

"We are investing in schools in rural areas . . . to offer a high quality of education."

He knows that village schools can and do offer excellent education, so long as they have high-quality teaching resources and the support of their local education authority. He went on to say:

"Norfolk's village schools will be protected, so long as they are providing pupils with a high standard of education."

There is a fashionable belief in some quarters that small village schools somehow cannot deliver the national curriculum. That is rubbish, and totally contradicted by all the evidence—certainly in the primary schools that I have visited in North Norfolk. In last year's key stage 2 tests, schools with fewer than 100 pupils delivered the goods: 66 per cent. of pupils reached level 4 or above, compared with the national average of 57 per cent. In science, the figure in small schools was 65 per cent., compared with 54 per cent. nationally. In maths, it was 74 per cent. against 62 per cent.

In July 1996, the present Secretary of State for Education and Employment sent a message to the National Association for the Support of Small Schools. He commended the excellent service that village schools offered both to their pupils and to their communities. He hoped that "the period of pressure of 'surplus places' is drawing to a close and that we can concentrate instead on developing the excellence that does exist, and recognising the valuable work of all schools, including those that do form the core of the communities."

I—and all those in Potter Heigham and other villages with schools—rejoiced when the Minister stated earlier this year that

"All proposals"—

by an LEA—

"for the closure of a rural school will be called in by the Secretary of State for decision", and that

"there will be a presumption against closure".—[Official Report, 26 March 1998; Vol. 309, c. 672.]

We now want the Minister to honour those words and to send out a message to Norfolk county council and other rural councils that village schools are too important to be allowed to wither and die. Councils and the Government have an obligation to rural communities to provide high-quality local first and primary education. The Minister must make it clear that the deliberate, orchestrated attempt to close Potter Heigham by Norfolk LEA is wrong and must be reversed.

The council seized on a temporary decline in teaching standards—which has since been reversed, as confirmed by the Office for Standards in Education—and a poor head to justify the closure of the school without making any serious effort to address the problem. Indeed, the council encouraged parents to take their children away from the school to help to prove the case against it. That is not acceptable, and I hope the Minister will examine all the facts surrounding the proposed closure with great care.

The matter does not reflect well on the council, and there are local demands that the council's behaviour should be placed before the ombudsman. There are also legitimate claims that it is not just the schools which should face tough Ofsted examination, but the LEA. I can agree with the council in one respect, however. The Government must recognise the extra costs implicit in providing education and other services—especially social services—in rural areas. I accept fully the comments of Bryan Slater, the director of the LEA, who has written to me as follows:

"The issue for Norfolk and for the Government is whether historical funding mechanisms adequately meet the inescapable additional cost of providing education through small schools in the county. A recent study carried out for Norfolk County Council showed that it can reasonably be estimated that the sparsity factor in the existing Standard Spending Assessment falls short by up to £100 per primary age pupil (or about £6 million) for the county in this regard alone. This is in addition to the unsupported additional costs of transporting children to school in the county which are a staggering £50 per school pupil, or about £5 million in total."

The Government must recognise the funding issue. First and primary schools in North Norfolk and other rural counties have been the Cinderella of the education budget for far too long. There are far too many mobile classrooms and dilapidated buildings in primary schools in North Norfolk.

The governors of Potter Heigham and those who live there are not against change—neither am I. In my experience, institutions and organisations never stay the same—they either improve or get worse. The Potter Heigham village school has been around for over 100 years. It has seen good heads and bad heads come and go. It has gone from being a primary school to being a first school. It has seen its numbers vary between 100 and about 40. It has seen the arrival of Ofsted and the national curriculum. Perhaps above all, it has seen the extraordinary and wonderful rise in the aspirations of parents and children. Children whose ambitions would have been limited both by geography and education and by their parents can now raise their eyes to wider and much more challenging horizons.

Small schools can and do adapt to change. Perhaps we shall see a cluster of village schools sharing a head in that part of North Norfolk. Perhaps the internet, or an intranet between local schools, will provide part of the solution. No doubt nursery education will pose its own challenges. All I know for sure is that village schools, when properly supported, provide a firm foundation for an excellent education, the right transition from home to school and a strong basis for a cohesive integrated local community.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): I realise that the hon. Gentleman is coming to the end of his comments, and I thank him for giving way. Does he agree that village schools are important in preventing the depopulation of the countryside, which ultimately becomes inevitable if there is nothing to attract young families?

Mr. Prior: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has taken his place, and I agree fully with his comments.

For me, and for the people of Norfolk—I am glad to see two other Norfolk Members on the Government Benches—Potter Heigham is a test case. The Government's commitment to village schools will be judged by whether or not the school stays open. I hope that the Minister will reassure us in that regard.

1.13 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior) on securing this debate and on the measured and reasoned way in which he presented the important arguments concerning village schools and the part that they play in the rural community—an important issue.

May I say how pleased I am that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) has joined us for the debate? He has been missed over the last few months—certainly by me. I am delighted that he is back in the House and, I hope, fully fit.

Mr. Öpik: Just.

Mr. Byers: "Just," he says, and I hear the sound of plastic being tapped. It is good to see the hon. Gentleman here.

This is a timely debate. As the hon. Member for North, including Norfolk said, I had the opportunity last Friday to visit schools in North-West Norfolk at the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner).

I visited five schools serving that part of Norfolk, including Magdalen primary—where I saw a good example of a village community supporting a school by offering the use of the village hall to ensure that the school has a vibrant and successful future. I visited Terrington St. John primary, to see at first hand the difficulties of an old building having to be adapted to meet the needs of the new national curriculum. I visited Harpley primary school, which serves a clearly identifiable community—and I was pleased to be there on the day that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced not only more than £1 million for Norfolk schools as a whole, but £72,000 specifically to ensure that the pupils of Harpley primary would no longer have to suffer the indignity of using outside toilets. I visited Smithdon high school in Hunstanton, to see the links it has developed as a high school with local primary schools, serving a rural community, and I visited Brancaster voluntary controlled primary on the north Norfolk coast—a very small school whose education difficulties and problems of a few years ago have been turned round by the devotion and hard work of a good and effective head teacher.

That visit showed clearly the commitment from heads, teachers, parents and the community, and brought home the very important role that schools play within the community. Schools are part of an active community, and that is particularly important when we consider their role in rural areas. That is why the Government support rural schools. We are aware of the problems that may arise if there are smaller numbers of children in a catchment area. However, it is not good enough to say that we support rural schools—we have to do more. We have to offer practical help and assistance.

Clearly, one of the major concerns of village schools is the threat of closure. We heard from the hon. Member for North Norfolk about his concerns about Potter Heigham, and I shall say a few words about that school later. It is worth reflecting on the fact that, since 1983, some 450 rural schools have been closed. I would not wish to suggest that none of those schools should have been closed—clearly there will be occasions when it is wholly appropriate through amalgamation or closure to provide the sort of education that our children deserve.

Having looked at some of the schools that were closed—I have to say, under the previous Government—I am in no doubt that, had the previous Government adopted a presumption against closure, as we have done, a number of schools would have been saved. We have adopted a presumption against closure because we recognise that a rural school is often the focus of village life.

If a rural school closes, it affects not just the pupils attending the school but the wider community. That is why we announced last February that proposals to close rural schools would be called in for decision by the Secretary of State and that there would be a presumption against closure. That policy is now in operation. No rural school will be closed until all the issues have been considered carefully, including any points made by local people. The onus will be on the promoters of closure to provide clear evidence that a school should be closed.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify that point? He confirms the statement that he made at the time of the countryside march earlier this year, that decisions to close rural schools would be called in by the Secretary of State. The Government resisted attempts to enshrine that policy in the School

[Mrs. Theresa May]

Standards and Framework Bill, but will they now give it a legislative framework, rather than merely asserting it in the House?

Mr. Byers: We are in danger of rehearsing a debate that we have already had. As we said in our discussions on the School Standards and Framework Bill, it is not appropriate to specify in a Bill the detailed criteria that the Secretary of State must consider. However, in exercising his powers to decide whether a school serving a rural community should be closed, the Secretary of State will make a presumption against closure. I have put that on the record and, if people feel that we are ignoring that criterion, they can take action against the Secretary of State through judicial review.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk mentioned standards in small schools. He was right to say that it is almost an assumption in some quarters that small schools cannot deliver a quality education. However, it is clear that they can. He referred to the excellent results that schools with fewer than 100 pupils attain. The independent inspectorate Ofsted has also said that there are many effective small schools and that small schools do not disadvantage their pupils in terms of standards or the national curriculum and the breadth of the curriculum that can be offered.

All schools, whether they be small or large, whether they serve a rural or an urban area, need the same things—strong management and good teachers—to deliver the quality of education that we all want. Obviously, small schools find it more difficult to offer the range of activities that are available in larger schools, but there are many examples of small rural schools which, with imagination and flair, offer a whole range of experiences to those children for whom they are responsible.

I do not have time to go into great detail about how that can be achieved, but I want to give three examples of small schools in rural areas that have met the challenges that they faced. Hornton primary school in Oxfordshire has 49 pupils. It has developed a productive partnership with parents and governors; it has good teaching and excellent support from adults in the classroom; the environment is imaginatively used; and the school is the focal point for the community.

Temple Sowerby Church of England school in Cumbria has 30 pupils. Its philosophy and aims are strong and it enjoys good leadership. It has a rich curriculum, which is enhanced by good use of outside activities. Again, the school is well led by a head teacher who expects and requires high standards.

Thornton in Craven primary school near Skipton in North Yorkshire has 24 pupils, but its standards are well above average. There are high expectations and standards throughout. The school has an exciting and challenging curriculum, and excellent use is made of school grounds, visits to museums and education resource centres. There are many other examples across the country of small schools in rural areas that offer a rich diversity of provision and high standards of education.

The hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) referred to the procedures that must be followed when closure or a significant change of character of a school is proposed. First, the local education authority must consult all interested parties. Detailed information must be given on all the options, and the responses that are received as part of the consultation exercise must be listened to carefully. The LEA can publish its proposals for a school only when it has considered all the views and, if there are disagreements, all the objections. The proposals must say who may object, and to whom their objections should be sent.

A copy of the published proposals must be sent to the Secretary of State; Ministers will consider them very carefully, along with any objections, before arriving at a decision. In doing so, Ministers will take into account the views of Ofsted about the quality of education that is offered, but we shall also consider other factors, including the accessibility of alternative schools—and the length of bus trips to them—the standards of those schools and the effect of closure on the local community. Those who promote the closure of a village school will need to consider those significant factors if they want to rebut the presumption against closure.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk mentioned the proposals for Potter Heigham county first school, which the Department is currently considering. He will understand that it would not be appropriate for me today to deal with the issues that he raised, but I assure him that I shall take them into account before a final decision is made. I shall also take into account the points that were made so effectively by the delegation of concerned parents, teachers and people from the local community that he brought to meet me some 10 days ago. I am conscious that people want a decision to be made, and I hope that we shall be able to arrive at one in the near future.

The hon. Member for Maidenhead referred to the decision-making procedures. As she knows, the School Standards and Framework Bill contains proposals, through the establishment of school organisation committees, to devolve the power to determine school closures to local level. I assure the House that the Secretary of State will ensure that the presumption against closure of a rural school will form part of his guidance to those committees on how to determine applications; the committees will have to take account of the needs of local communities in arriving at their decisions, as will any independent adjudicator to whom the issue is referred.

The key must be to raise standards in our schools. That applies to rural schools as much as to schools in urban areas. Rural schools face particular challenges, but, as I said, those challenges can be met. We need to find new ways in which to ensure that children in rural schools have the opportunity to progress and achieve the highest standards.

I believe that we can harness the new technologies to assist small rural schools and communities. The STARS—superhighways teams across rural schools—project, for example, has created a network of schools in isolated rural areas across the north and north-west of Scotland, with the aim of enhancing provision for able pupils. Eighteen small primary schools with four teachers or fewer and two secondary schools have taken part in the project, with excellent results. In Argyll and Bute, effective use has been made of new technology to enhance the curriculum, extending opportunities for teaching and learning and supporting the management of schools and co-operatives. Forty small rural schools participated, using a combination of text and video conferencing, e-mail and fax.

New technology can be harnessed to provide a lifeline to small, rural schools, and I am pleased that, through the national grid for learning, we have been able to help Norfolk—to the tune of £1.6 million—to improve information technology. As we develop the national grid, we shall similarly help schools across the country.

There can be no doubt that a small school in a rural area plays an extremely important role. The Government recognise and intend to address the issues not only by fine words but by deeds, ensuring that schools are given the support that they deserve and need.

This debate has provided a timely opportunity to discuss the importance of rural schools and the communities that they serve. A school is part of a community, and sees it through good times and bad. Because we value the role played by rural schools, we have taken practical steps to help them and to safeguard their future.

We look forward to working with rural schools and the communities that they serve to raise standards and provide children with the quality of education that they deserve.

Women (Science and Engineering)

1.30 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): I should perhaps declare an interest as I am a woman scientist, although, unless the electorate decide otherwise, I do not intend to return to my scientific career.

The importance of science, engineering and technology to Britain's future prosperity is well recognised and has been stressed by my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the President of the Board of Trade and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If we are to build a truly competitive economy, we need to develop the new industries that exploit the opportunities provided by science and engineering, and especially biotechnology and electronics, and a key component of that strategy is to ensure that we have qualified scientists and engineers to work in those high-technology industries.

The pharmaceutical industry, which is arguably the industrial sector in which Britain is most competitive internationally, is already expressing concern at the shortage of suitably qualified scientists, and the engineering industry, including some firms in my constituency, is seriously affected by skills shortages. In that context, the under-representation of women and girls in science and engineering is of great concern.

In 1993, although 60 per cent. of university students in the biological sciences were female, women accounted for only 30 per cent. in maths and the physical sciences, and only 14 per cent. in engineering. How can we hope to meet future needs for scientists and engineers if half the population is excluded?

The previous Government, to their credit, began to recognise the problem, which was documented in the report, "The Rising Tide", published soon after the science White Paper, "Realising Our Potential". Measures were introduced to try to encourage girls and women to take up scientific careers, and those have been built on and extended by the present Government.

Much attention and activity, including the Engineering Council's WISE—Women in Science and Engineering—campaign, have focused on making science education more girl-friendly. The problem for girls is not only getting in, but getting on. There is considerable qualitative research evidence suggesting that women actively choose not to enter science and engineering professions because they perceive that they offer them poor promotion prospects. A report by the Prism group of the Wellcome Trust in 1994 documented a feeling among women science undergraduates that science had a masculine culture of which they did not want to be a part.

There is little quantitative data on women's participation in science in the private sector, so most of the statistics that I cite will relate to the academic sector, but anecdotal evidence suggests that women scientists experience the same difficulties in both the private and the public sectors.

In 1994, although 17 per cent. of all university science academics were women, they were disproportionately concentrated in the lower echelons, constituting 19 per cent. of all science lecturers, but only 5 per cent. of all readers and senior lecturers and only 2 per cent. of all science professors.

[Dr. Phyllis Starkey]

A recent study by Fielding and Glover of the occupational destinations of women science and engineering graduates, funded by the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council, showed that only 15 per cent. were employed as professional scientists or engineers, compared with 31 per cent. of the equivalent male graduates.

Most women science graduates are employed in teaching and in non-professional jobs for which they are overqualified. That represents not only a limitation for the women involved, but a considerable underuse of public resources. It is expensive to train engineers and scientists, and it must be of general concern if a high proportion of those trained choose not to stay in science and engineering, even when jobs are available.

Given the apparently poor promotion prospects for women, it is not surprising that they choose not to enter science. I want to focus on one factor that may contribute to women's problems in getting on in academic science: the difficulty in successfully competing for research funding. That funding is absolutely essential for scientists to establish themselves as independent investigators and progress up the academic promotion ladder.

Last May, a paper was published in Nature by two Swedish women scientists, Christine Wenneras and Agnes Wolde. The authors used Sweden's freedom of the press rights to gain access to the scoring system used by the Swedish Medical Research Council in assessing candidates for post-doctoral fellowships.

It was already public knowledge in Sweden that women had a lower success rate than men in the fellowships. The panels that award them base their assessment of each applicant in part on a score for scientific competence, the most objective measure of which is given by a person's record of scientific publication, which would consist of both the number of articles and the quality of the journals that published them. Wenneras and Wolde showed that women were consistently marked down by the assessment panel, and on average a woman needed to have published 2.6 times as many papers as a man to be awarded the same competence score.

The publication of the Swedish study raised concerns in this country about the appraisal methods used in allocating research funding here. In response to that concern, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade asked the director general of the research councils to investigate whether their assessment methods for allocating both grants and fellowships were free from any bias against women.

The director general reported that the success rates of men and women applicants for funding were similar, and that there was no statistically significant evidence of a bias against women. That is confirmed by figures given to me in parliamentary answers and by a study by the British Medical Research Council, published in Nature in December 1997.

Will the Minister ask his officials to examine more closely the systems used by the research councils? The strength of the Swedish analysis was that the competence scores of all the applicants, both successful and unsuccessful, were compared with an objective measure of their scientific output, whereas the director general's analysis merely compared success rates, which would demonstrate an absence of bias only if the quality of the male and female applicants was exactly the same, and I shall expand in a moment on why the quality of female applicants might in fact be expected to be higher. The director general should be asked to look again and consider whether candidates of equal competence are assessed equally, regardless of gender. The research councils should also be asked to monitor their own assessment procedures internally to ensure that British peer review panels, unlike their Swedish counterparts, do not discriminate in favour of men.

In questioning whether equal success rates really reflect a lack of bias in assessment, I pointed out that women and men applicants might not have equal competence. The most striking statistic in relation to research council funding is the percentage of women among the applicants. Even in the biological sciences, which have the highest proportion of women graduates, only about 15 per cent. of applicants for project and programme grants from the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council are women, for the Natural Environment Research Council, the figure is only 9 per cent., and for the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council, the figure falls even further to 7 per cent.. The percentages are slightly higher for fellowships and grants aimed at new investigators, but even so, they are still low.

I have already quoted data to show the reduction in women's participation as they move up the scientific career pyramid. That must indicate a greater difficulty for women in achieving promotion in science, which suggests that women who have succeeded in establishing themselves as independent investigators—that is, the women who are in a position to apply for research funding—may well be of higher average competence than the much larger group of male applicants who have faced fewer barriers to their career progress. If that is so, one would expect women to have a higher success rate than men if the assessment system were truly without bias.

The low percentage of women among applicants for research funding is an issue in itself. Promotion within academic science depends on publication record and the number of publications depends, apart from on ability itself, on the ability to win research funding for oneself and one's research group. Clearly, the larger the group, the more work it will get done and the more publications it is likely to be in. We need to identify the factors that discourage women from applying for grants and fellowships. It could well be that fewer women are in a position to apply for funding. In most cases, only researchers in permanent positions can make independent applications, which rules out many women researchers as evidence shows that men are more likely to get permanent positions.

The Government have encouraged the research councils and the universities to introduce more family-friendly conditions, including more child care provision, holding women's grants in abeyance while they are on maternity leave and allowing women to take fellowships with them if they have to move from one place to another because of family commitments. I applaud all those measures, which obviously help to make it easier for women to pursue a scientific career and I hope that the Government will redouble and continue their efforts in that way.

However, it appears that the barriers to women's progression in science are more complex than that. Comparisons between the situation in Britain and in France, for example, suggest that the problem is more fundamental. France has a tradition of high levels of support for child care, which is reflected in the fact that most women scientists in France have full-time and relatively uninterrupted working patterns similar to those of male scientists. That is not so in Britain. In addition, academic scientists in France do not have to cope with the same degree of insecurity and mobility as do scientists in British universities. Obviously, that is a factor that tends to affect women more than men. Despite those advantages, French women scientists and engineers experience exactly the same difficulties in promotion as do their British sisters, which suggests a need for a serious rethink about the way in which science is organised.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend on this debate, as I have been involved in this matter for some time as a boss in a university department where more than half of the students were female, but where we had only one female member of faculty. It took some brutishness on my part and that of others to increase the number of women, but we managed to get it up to five after much resistance.

Recently, I went to the United States on a Science and Technology Committee visit with my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones), to find out how practices in science were progressing. Somehow, I had expected more of the United States. Sadly, the situation is just as bad there. The US Congress has now set up a commission, which will legislate to improve matters for women. The battle continues throughout the world and its time has certainly come.

Dr. Starkey: My hon. Friend confirms that the problem is extremely complex and that no country has yet managed to crack it.

Furthermore, all the figures I have quoted so far on the percentage of women applying for research funding and on their success rates relate only to that part of the Government science budget that is channelled through the research councils. However, that is only just over a fifth of Government spending on research and development. About £1.3 billion is allocated annually through the research councils and just over £1 billion by the Higher Education Funding Councils for England, Wales and Scotland to finance university infrastructure, but more than £3.5 billion or 63 per cent. of the Government's total science budget, is spent by other Departments including the Ministry of Defence, the rest of the Department of Trade and Industry—apart from the Office of Science and Technology—the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Department for Education and Employment and the Department for International Development. All those Departments award research funding by competitive tender, yet when I asked them in written questions to tell me the percentage of women among the researchers that they funded, they were unable to do so because they do not collect the data.

If the Government are serious in their commitment to ensure that they do not discriminate against women researchers—I believe that they are—they need to monitor all their science spending for equal opportunities, not merely the money within the OST budget. I hope that the Minister will be able to take up that point with his colleagues in the other Ministries and urge them to monitor gender balance in the same way as the OST.

I shall end with an allusion to my constituency. Last week, I visited a school on an estate in Milton Keynes where all the streets are named after famous engineers. It is called Energy Village and has many energy-efficient homes. When the head teacher was first appointed to the school, which is new, he noticed that the street names all commemorated famous male engineers. Therefore, he chose to name the school after Caroline Haslett, who was born in 1895 and became the first secretary of the Women's Engineering Society and the director of the Electrical Association for Women. Through the association, Caroline Haslett encouraged the use of electrical power in the home, believing that electricity was the real emancipator of women.

I applaud the efforts of that head teacher in choosing Caroline Haslett's name for his school to give a positive message to his pupils—girls and boys alike—that engineering is not the sole preserve of one sex. However, unless the reality of the barriers to women's progression in science are removed, girls will continue to choose more congenial career options and British industry will continue to be held back by a shortage of engineers and scientists. Making science and engineering more woman-friendly is not merely an issue for women, but one which we have to get right if we are to capitalise as a country on the opportunities of the new technologies.

1.47 pm

The Minister for Science, Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): First, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) for raising this subject, as well as all hon. Members who have stayed to take part or to listen. My hon. Friend speaks with more authority than most of us on these matters. We often ask for role models for women in science and she said, almost apologetically, that she had a former life as a scientist to which she might not return. As a scientist in here, her scientific training shines through in the quality of her contribution and long may she contribute to this House precisely on those terms.

I am tempted to be brief and to say, "Yes, I applaud and agree with every word my hon. Friend has said", and that the Government will take forward her proposals in a practical and direct way. I am grateful to her for her comments.

We must not continue to risk wasting the talents of more than half the population. If we do not allow women's talents to be fully developed, we shall jeopardise our future. There is an international problem, but we have much to do. Women are significantly under-represented in almost every area of research and employment in science, engineering and technology. In those areas, women work disproportionately in junior positions. There is little room at the top for women in science, and that must change. More practical action is required to increase participation.

Since we came into office, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade—a scientist herself—has actively pursued equality of opportunity and has attempted to increase the participation of women in science, engineering and technology, not least through the Department of Trade and Industry's development unit on the subject. She has also worked closely with bodies including the Engineering Council, which is making great efforts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West said that there are complex reasons for lack of participation. I was encouraged to read an article in The Independent by Susan Greenfield, the professor of pharmacology at the University of Oxford. She wrote:

"One of the problems of 'women in science' is that it is not just one problem. Rather, the term is a convenient umbrella for referring to a range of issues touching on women in late 20th-century society in all its complexity, and encompassing therefore economic imponderables, cultural values, biological imperatives and the public perception of science and scientists. There is no magic bullet through this tightly woven tapestry of feelings and facts."

There are complex reasons for the lack of participation, and we must tackle them.

The problem starts at an early age. Not enough young women are attracted into science, engineering and technology, particularly the physical sciences such as engineering, physics and information technology. If we are to change that, we must understand why girls tend to opt out of such subjects. We must explore that with the Department for Education and Employment.

Even when women choose science subjects at school and go on to higher education and research or careers in industry, further factors inhibit their progression, as my hon. Friend has said. Having chosen a career, women face barriers to progression; that, contrary to popular opinion, is true even of the biological sciences and medicine. My hon. Friend put it well when she said that we need to focus attention not only on women getting into science, but on women getting on in science. Many barriers are associated with the balance of work and home life, and those need to be addressed.

One disincentive to continuing an academic research career in the United Kingdom is the possibility of a fixed-term contract. Although that might bring advantages of flexibility for funders of research and employers, it can, if badly managed, put women off.

The development unit in my Department works with other Departments in trying to attract more girls towards science subjects and to encourage women into higher education. It considers means to improve women's career progression up the academic ladder. The campaign for Women in Science and Engineering—WISE—began in 1984 when only 7 per cent. of engineering graduates were women. That figure improved a little—to 14 per cent.—by 1998, but it remains far too low. The Engineering Council, the Women's Engineering Society, women in computing, physics, medicine and neurosciences and the European Union's women in technology group are all dedicated to increasing the participation of women.

WISE recently asked for funding for 1998–99 for an outlook project to provide an opportunity for girls aged 13 and 14 to obtain practical experience of engineering on a three-day programme at a further education college, including a visit to a company. That would be a sort of engineering workshop, and the DTI is providing £35,000 to allow 1,750 girls from 70 schools to participate. That is a small step, but we can build on it. The development unit's booklet, "$X^2$—the mystery of vanishing girls", was aimed at girls aged 13 and 14. A series of posters was published in September. Videos and websites are among small, practical ideas aimed at secondary schools as we try to use every means to ensure increased participation.

My hon. Friend raised important points about the difficulties women face as they try to progress in their careers in science once they reach the research stage, especially if it is academic research. She mentioned the Swedish study. Its findings were welcome, and we have taken prompt action to examine our research council's review system. We examined success rates for grants and fellowships for all research councils. A much larger exercise than the Swedish study examined the outcome of 114 applications, and we are trying to make sure that success rates for grants and fellowships are monitored annually so that we can keep a grip on the analysis.

My hon. Friend referred to our study's finding of no apparent difference in success rates for men and women. Although that is welcome, especially in view of the concern generated by the Swedish study, we cannot be complacent. We must recognise that our study is not necessarily the whole picture. We will go a step further by examining whether there are underlying gender differences in the proportion of potentially qualified candidates who apply for grants and fellowships—a study that should help us to begin to address seriously my hon. Friend's concerns. We need to get down to the level of examining competence, and to find out why such a small proportion of academically qualified women apply for fellowships. I assure my hon. Friend that the work that she has requested today will be undertaken. I am grateful for her exploration of gaps in the preliminary research.

It is important to develop policies for family-friendly employment. We can co-ordinate Government policies on employment and social security to fit in with that, and we must identify examples of good practice so that we can focus the employers' attention on ensuring that opportunities exist.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Might my hon. Friend embark on a study, perhaps through the European Union, to find out why there are more women in science and engineering in southern Europe? In Spain, about 30 per cent. of engineers are women, and it may be that lessons could be learnt from that.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for internationalising the point. She, my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West and I, among others, attended a conference in April at which note was taken of the comparative differences within the EU. I was struck by the German delegate who said Germany was like a developing country when it came to equal opportunities. That is true of all EU countries. We need to consider family-friendly policies, but without seeing families and children as the problem, because that would suggest, in turn, that women were the problem. There are deeper structural questions to address, and comparative work with our EU partners could prove helpful.

Role models are important. I have met young women doing high-level particle physics research at CERN in Geneva and running gas plants as top engineers in the north-east. We should draw attention to such examples so that they can inspire other women. I was delighted to hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South–West about the school named after Caroline Haslett. Many women have been involved in the development of science, but they are, sadly, absent from the record. I should name Dorothy Hodgkin, a Nobel prize winner for her work on crystallography, Jocelyn Burnell, who discovered pulsars, and Rosalind Franklin, the co-discoverer of DNA. Their names are lost in the male stories, and we should celebrate women in science rather more.

We are making strong efforts to increase representation on public bodies, councils and committees in science-related fields. Women's voices should be heard more strongly in policy and decision making. In 1992, women held 8 per cent. of places on research councils. The figure is up to 17 per cent. now, and the Government's target is 30 per cent. by 2000 with further improvement after that. That is achievable.

I have tried to stress that the problem is complex. Only 8 per cent. of all professors are women, but an even lower 3 per cent. of professors in science, engineering and technology are women. The shortage of women professors is not simply a result of women having children. Larger structural questions need to be addressed—

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor was asked—

Freedom of Information Bill

1. Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): When he intends to publish the proposed freedom of information Bill. [47908]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark): I am in the process of drawing up the draft Bill, taking into account representations following the public consultation and the views expressed in the report of the Select Committee on Public Administration. I intend to publish the draft Bill for pre-legislative discussion before the end of September.

Mr. Baker: I am pleased to hear that, but can the right hon. Gentleman directly confirm or deny whether senior members of the Government, including the Home Secretary and the Minister for every portfolio, have been trying to weaken the Bill and take out its sharp edge to secure their positions? Will the Bill be as radical as the White Paper produced earlier this year or will it be weaker?

Dr. Clark: The White Paper sets out the principles of the whole Government towards freedom of information. Clearly, as the Select Committee's report showed, there are many complex issues in the White Paper and the draft Bill. As one would expect, there has been healthy discussion of those issues.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Will my right hon. Friend—in whom I have every confidence, if that is not too sycophantic—ensure that the Bill is the strongest possible opening to information and that it is in the Queen's Speech for the next Session so that we can end the situation in which people claim that they have wholesale access to information and try to retail it at inordinate profit for themselves?

Dr. Clark: I can assure the House that we have an agreed timetable to publish the draft Bill by the end of September. There is nothing in that timetable that precludes its candidacy for inclusion in the Queen's Speech later this year.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): In addition to the legislative change on freedom of information mentioned by the previous two questioners, do we not also need a cultural change? Without both, will not greedy and loud-mouthed young men continue to seek information and contacts at extortionate prices?

Dr. Clark: I agree entirely with every sentiment expressed by the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that if we have radical freedom of information legislation, it will mean that the milieu in which such people purport to operate will be diminished.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): In reply to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker), my right hon. Friend referred to "healthy discussion". I wonder whether he was using those words with great care. Can we have an assurance that everyone is equally committed to taking this legislation forward in the way for which Labour party branches throughout the country have argued for the past 20 or 30 years? We believe that this is the litmus test of a Labour Government. Do we deliver on this agenda that everyone wants?

Dr. Clark: I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said; I choose all my words with care. Clearly, there is a healthy debate, but, at the end of the day, we are committed to the principles contained in our White Paper. I was certainly encouraged by the support that I received, not only from my hon. Friends on the Government Benches, but from Opposition Members, when we had a full discussion of the issue on Monday.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the Chancellor's openness on the matter. He will be aware that the Royal Society of Chemistry is keen on freedom of information because it is part of the scientific world; but will he bear in mind the society's concern that such freedom might be misused by others and that that issue might not be taken care of in the Bill?

Dr. Clark: We are aware of that sort of difficulty and that there is always a balance to be struck between privacy and personal freedom. We are also aware that there must be protection for genuine scientific research and we have built into the Bill the seven special exemptions that can be considered when deciding whether information should be withheld. If information were to be withheld, the information commissioner could make a judgment, based on the merits of the case, as to whether that decision was right. It is a robust piece of legislation, designed with the ordinary citizen—the ordinary men and women—of this country in mind.

Public Appointments

2. Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): What plans he has to encourage Government Departments to use the public appointments list. [47920]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): Departments seek nominations from a wide range of sources, of which the public appointments unit's list is one. Others include advertising, executive search, consultation with interested bodies and other departmental databases. Departments regularly consult the unit for names of candidates for specific appointments. Since April, the unit has suggested some 1,200 candidates for more than 150 posts and has been informed of 20 appointments. Others are still under consideration.

Mrs. Lait: I thank the Minister for that reply, but is he aware that the 20 appointments since April bring the grand total to 71 appointments of the hundreds made by Government Departments since the general election? Is he also aware that seven staff are employed in the operation? Does he regard it as an effective means of providing names to Government Departments, or does he agree that it is time either to beef it up, or to shut it down altogether?

Mr. Kilfoyle: The hon. Lady may recall that, when I was in opposition, I raised exactly the same questions about the public appointments unit, but, because the then Government insisted on secrecy, it was difficult to extract the very information to which she is now privy. I share her concern, but I have to tell her that the public appointments unit is devoted specifically to trying to increase the representation of women and people from ethnic minorities; and, although I accept that its performance appears to be in question, I would remind her that the decisions are made by individual Departments and not by the unit. The unit is trying purposefully to project as many names as possible into consideration for appointments, as they become available.

Millennium Compliance

4. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): What assessment he has made of the relative preparedness of Government Departments and agencies in respect of millennium compliance. [47922]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark): The results of the June quarterly review show that central Government are making good progress in achieving millennium compliance, although greater attention needs to be paid to embedded systems and to telecommunication systems. Departments have typically completed about 30 per cent. of the necessary correction work and 25 per cent. of their testing. On the whole, departmental plans have remained stable since the first review in March and all Departments now have target dates for completion of work on critical systems.

Fiona Mactaggart: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his continuing review of the matter and his openness about it. However, I should like to press a matter that I have raised with him before, which is using agencies, where appropriate agencies exist, to ensure the proper preparedness of different parts of the public service. I am especially concerned about the role that the Medical Devices Agency could play in providing a centralised test of different pieces of equipment used within the health service, so as to stop different parts of the health service and different health service trusts repeating each other's work. Will he give me an assurance on that?

Dr. Clark: My hon. Friend has raised this matter on a previous occasion and it is a pertinent point. The whole issue of the national health service has caused some concern in the House and, during our recent debate on it, I expressed my concern at the fact that there are still gaps in the national health service and local government—a view supported by the National Audit Office and the Audit Commission. Since that time, the NHS executive has completed its own review, which is more encouraging. It shows that satisfactory progress is being made in over 90 per cent. of NHS organisations. I am still concerned about the other 10 per cent. I shall draw the attention of the NHS executive to the specific point raised by my hon. Friend.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): Is it not the case that, on this unique issue, no one can really say—not even the Government—how well we shall be prepared to respond to the problems until the first midnight of the new millennium? Is it not essential that we have contingency plans prepared, put in place and tested well before the end of next year?

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman is, as always on this issue, absolutely correct. We shall probably not have to wait until 1 January 2000 because various other dates, such as 9 September 1999, will trigger difficulties. We need contingency plans in place and that is why the Government have established MISC4 and MISC4(P) to look at those issues and to try to ensure that there are contingency plans across both the private and the public sectors because one interrelates with the other.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey): Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to look again at something that I have suggested before, which is a practice on a Saturday or Sunday where we could take 10 per cent. of public services, wind the clocks forward and test the embedding technology? I wonder whether my right hon. Friend has evaluated that. Can he comment further?

Dr. Clark: We are looking at that proposal. It may not be possible to do that in every Department, but we believe that there may be opportunities in certain sections to try that experiment. It is something which we are trying to evaluate now.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): Is the Chancellor in a position to guarantee that at least the public utilities such as water, the sewerage system, electricity and so on will continue to work? If not, when will he be?

Dr. Clark: We are discussing those very issues in the Cabinet Committees dealing with the matter. We have papers by the week from the various Departments and the territorial Departments which explain how the public utility suppliers are trying to cope. We must consider the interrelationship between the public utility suppliers and the contingency plans that will be necessary because, if one fails, they will almost certainly all fail. We are taking this seriously and there are almost weekly meetings of Cabinet Ministers looking at the matter, and getting the best advice possible.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): The situation in the NHS is still worrying, with perhaps 10 per cent. of projects behind schedule. How will the Minister ensure that the people responsible are held to account, because accountability is an essential part of any meaningful target setting? Has the right hon. Gentleman persuaded the Prime Minister that, in the interests of accountability, he should remain as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster until the millennium so that he can be held to account?

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman raises a serious point about accountability, and nobody has a monopoly of knowledge in that sphere. I hope that every hon. Member will take it upon herself or himself to ensure that they are confident that their local health trust is following the course of action outlined in the excellent document by the Audit Commission entitled, "A Stitch in Time". We have set in place a template for the national organisation—the national health service—with its millennium project to try to deal with the outstanding issues. We also need action at local trust level. I urge hon. Members to assure themselves that their constituents are being satisfied and protected in this respect.

Smartcards

5. Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): What progress he has made in developing the use of smartcards to provide access to Government services and information. [47923]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark): Smartcards and other new technologies can radically change the way in which the Government do business. Examples such as supermarket loyalty cards are already transforming the levels of service and choice offered in the private sector. As we move from the old industrial society and its way of working to the new information age, the Government's relationship with our citizens is changing and we must lead and manage that change. I want a wired-up Government to provide high-quality, easy to use and flexible services to our citizens.

Mr. Healey: I thank my right hon. Friend for that encouraging but rather general response. I draw his attention to a specific smartcard project—the Endorse project, which was launched last month by the Government with Barclays bank to cut out form filling for the newly self-employed. Is the Minister aware that the project is being piloted in Rotherham, which is one of nine pilot areas, four of which are in South Yorkshire? Can he tell me when the pilot period is due to end and what plans he has to make sure that the lessons and benefits from the pilot are promoted across the country?

Dr. Clark: I was pleased to launch Barclays' Endorse, which followed a similar pilot project by NatWest and the Post Office, called "Business as usual". They make life easier for our citizens, who, until we introduced an electronic method of registering as self-employed, had to send to three Departments six separate forms, with the possibility of having to follow those with eight forms. The result was, not surprisingly, a failure rate of 40 per cent. We tackled that problem by allowing people to register electronically as self-employed, which means that they fill in one smart form on a personal computer, which is immediately electronically transmitted to all the relevant Government Departments. I am sure that the experiment will be a success, and I look forward to the days when there are 1,000 such terminals available to our citizens.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): What consideration has the right hon. Gentleman given to using smartcards for providing information to the authorities? For example, when shall we do away with the flimsy bit of paper that happens to be our driving licence and use a smartcard for that, or does the right hon. Gentleman live in fear of the civil liberties lobby?

Dr. Clark: The Government have made a decision not to introduce a national identity card, but we already have in hand the issue that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. A small smartcard driving licence is being tested in various parts of the country and, before long, will become universal. Like the hon. Gentleman, I look forward to the day when we use smartcards to provide Government services such as the renewal of television licences and payment of motor taxes. We would not have to go to the post office armed with a sheaf of papers, but simply go to a kiosk, use our smartcard and get a licence immediately. That is the future.

Forms

7. Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): What steps he is taking to (a) simplify and (b) condense Government forms that the general public have to fill in before having access to many Government services. [47925]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): Making it simpler and easier for people to access public services and cutting down forms and queues are at the heart of better government. Pilots of interactive on-line forms are part of the story, but so, too, is a move from telesales to teleservices: for example, using the telephone to help people at home to complete forms and to make better use of public services.

Mr. Beard: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware of the case of my constituent, Mrs. Ball, who was faced with a 32-page form when claiming disability living allowance for her son? She could fill in that form only with the aid of the local branch of Mencap. Now she is notable in the area for her achievement, and is inundated with requests for help from people who are as bemused and confused as she once was. Has any assessment been made of the waste of time in people going to tribunals unnecessarily or the personal hardship involved in delayed payments as a result of those complex forms being wrongly filled in? Does my hon. Friend accept that public support for benevolent policies is being destroyed by the ordeal to which people are subjected in gaining access to the entitlement that they have as citizens of this country?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I am aware of the problems encountered by Mrs. Ball, my hon. Friend's constituent, and I understand that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has written to express our regrets at her experience.

The Benefits Agency keeps all claim forms under regular review. The disability allowance and attendance allowance claim forms were redesigned recently—a new child-specific pack was introduced in August last year and a new adult pack in October last year. Disability organisations were involved in the development and design of the new forms. However, I understand my hon. Friend's concern. The characterisation of government in queues and forms is one aspect which the "Better Government" agenda will address later in the year.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Does the Minister not realise that the civil service is doing what it always does very well, which is to produce forms that fully meet its own standards? Can the civil service not take lessons from the private sector, the first lesson of which is that the customer is always right? The customer finds forms very complicated. Is it not possible to include more representations by the consumer in the planning of those forms?

Mr. Kilfoyle: The hon. Gentleman will have to forgive me if I disagree with his assertion that there is always something to be learned from the private sector.

Increasingly, the public service, pragmatically, is willing to learn from private sector practices, and it is always willing to re-evaluate its own procedures. As I said, the Benefits Agency does so, and we want to extend that type of good practice into all arms of government, central and local.

Millennium Compliance

8. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): If he will make a statement on the progress and cost of year 2000 compliance by Government Departments. [47926]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark): My statement in the House on 8 June 1998, Official Report, column 716 gave the results of the latest quarterly review. They show that central Government are so far making good progress in achieving millennium compliance. However, we are not complacent; the review raised a number of concerns, which I have taken up with the Departments concerned. The latest estimate of the costs of millennium compliance within central Government is £402 million.

The next quarterly return is due in September. As that will fall during the recess, I propose to write to all Members during the recess to report the results. I shall also arrange for all relevant information to be placed in the Libraries of the House and on the internet.

Mr. Bruce: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that answer, but can he confirm that the Government have not allocated any new money to Government Departments to tackle that problem? Can he also confirm that, despite the fact that, three months ago, the Prime Minister said that he would put new money into training 20,000 bug busters, not a single one has started a training course, let alone started work?

Dr. Clark: Every Department of central Government was aware of the cost implications of millennium compliance, and figures for those implications were built into the estimates that we inherited from the previous Administration. In his Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that £30 million was to be made available for the training of 20,000 bug busters. That process is on course. We have had discussions with the training agencies to ensure that the right course is made available to people. We are also discussing with small and medium companies how they can best release people for training, so that they can do their own millennium compliance. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: I should be obliged if conversations were not quite so loud. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I see that the House agrees with me. Thank you.

Electronic Information

9. Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): What steps he has taken to permit individuals to supply information electronically to Government. [47927]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): The Government have been working closely with the public and private sectors on identifying new ways to enable people to supply information electronically to Government.

Last December, we launched the "intelligent" form, which enabled people to register as self-employed at a bank. That model has now been extended by the launch of the Post Office-led "Open for Business" pilot, which enables people to register as self-employed in a post office, library, a community-based "telecottage" or local government office. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy has said, the Barclays bank Endorse project, which uses a smartcard-based digital signature service, enables registration on the internet to take place in people's homes.

Mr. Quinn: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that many people are phobic about information technology? If we go for a process of open government under which the citizen will be allowed to provide feedback, many people who are allergic to IT will need assistance and encouragement. What are his Department's plans to encourage that process?

Mr. Kilfoyle: In reality, many projects are being encouraged, not just by my Department but by Government, to raise the standard of IT literacy throughout the nation. There will be a parallel approach to the fulfilment of the information technology era. Hard copy forms of information and electronic forms will run contemporaneously. There will always be those who lag behind new developments.

Open Government

10. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): What recent representations he has received on his Department's open government proposals. [47928]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark): I recently received the report of the Select Committee on Public Administration in response to the White Paper, "Your Right to Know". I am studying that report and its 44 detailed recommendations.

Mr. Amess: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain how he can reconcile his Department's proposals for open government with the practice of arranging meetings between Ministers and the general public to discuss policies, when the only members of the public who are invited to such meetings are those who are soppy about the Labour party? How can he reconcile his proposals on open government with the practice of leaking sensitive material before it is reported to the House? Is that not taking openness a bit too far, and is not the truth about the Government that they are open to no one other than Labour party supporters?

Dr. Clark: I simply have no idea of what the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question was about. In answer to the second part of his question, we and the Government have made it quite clear that we deplore the leaking of all Government documents. In terms of the recent assertion about the leak of a defence document, the Prime Minister has announced that there will be a leak inquiry to ascertain how that came about.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): I welcome the Prime Minister's announcement of a leak inquiry into the appearance of a defence document before selected journalists. The Government's proposal on open government is to ensure that, under the process of democratic discussion, everyone—and not just the chosen few—is equally informed.

Dr. Clark: The right hon. Gentleman is right to draw the House's attention to the need for freedom of information legislation that will provide the hyphen between the Government and the people. I passionately believe that more freedom of information in the genuine and true sense will obviate the occurrence of young whippersnappers leaking and bragging to the press about how they can get access to Ministers and influence Government decisions.

11. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): What steps he has taken to make his Department more open. [47929]

Dr. David Clark: Openness is intrinsic to good government. In addition to my proposals for a radical and robust freedom of information Act, which will be the flagship for openness, much more is being done. We do not need to wait for the Act to provide our citizens with more and better information, as I have shown in my quarterly reports to Parliament on the year 2000 problems. Our proposals are to open up quangos and to ensure 50:50 representation on them for men and women. The Government have been open in providing information to their citizens on the internet, and we shall continue to do that.

Ann Clwyd: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his commitment to openness in government. I know from his strong freedom of information proposals that he believes that it is essential to our democracy to have that openness. I hope that he may long continue in his present post; despite the malign briefing against him, he has done an excellent job. However, some other Government Departments are not as committed to openness as his Department. For example, too many answers start with the words, "Because of disproportionate cost," and, despite the fact that we spend £32 million a year on Chevening scholarships, Departments are not prepared to say even to whom we award those scholarships. It is essential to a Government who are committed to openness in government that we have that freedom of information legislation in the next Queen's Speech.

Dr. Clark: This Government are committed to freedom of information legislation. We had the declaration in our manifesto and we shall deliver on that manifesto commitment. We believe that, if we are going to rebuild the trust between Government and the people, we must empower people by giving them information. That is precisely what our new Bill will do; that is precisely the new Bill that this Government will introduce.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [47949] Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 8 July.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Prime Minister aware that, in Southend-on-Sea, where Labour and Liberal Democrat councillors have just imposed savage increases on home help charges for the disabled and elderly, and are planning to close three old folks' homes—not because they are nasty, but because there is not enough money—there is huge anger at the fact that the Government have had no difficulty in finding an extra £1.5 million to increase the number of political advisers by 50 per cent? Does not the Prime Minister think that it would strengthen our democracy if he simply allowed civil servants—respected people—to tell people the truth, whether good or bad, rather than employ that huge and costly army of news twisters, who many of us think are an insult to democracy?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not know about the particular circumstances in Southend that the hon. Gentleman has raised—[Interruption.]—although I have to say to him and his colleagues who are shouting about it that, of course, as a result of keeping to tough spending limits in the first two years, we have had difficult financial decisions to make. But I hope that he realises that, as a result of what the Government have done since they came to office, we have put more money into the health service, into education and into social services. That is a huge difference between the Government whom he supported—more or less—and the Government whom I lead.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway): In view of the recent reports in The Observer, will the Prime Minister consider one constructive suggestion? The ministerial code should be amended to prohibit Ministers and officials from dealing with people who are lobbying on behalf of others, where those people have, within the past five years, been employed as aides or advisers to any Minister. Will he add, by way of a gloss, that the legitimate way in which to petition Parliament or the Government is either directly to Government offices, or through the agency—the legitimate and open agency—of elected Members of Parliament?

The Prime Minister: Of course Ministers or Members of Parliament will meet lobbying groups and organisations as part of their normal work, and there is nothing wrong with that; but I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that the concern that has been expressed—and I do take it seriously—does show, as I said yesterday, that we have to be extremely careful about any relations between lobbying firms and special advisers and those in Government. I have instructed the Cabinet Secretary, therefore, to revise the rules that we inherited that govern such contacts and to strengthen them in any way that he thinks fit. In particular, there can be no circumstances that ever justify either passing confidential or inside information to a lobbyist, or the granting of any improper preferential access to, or influence on, Government. These rules will be strengthened and they will be published. Anyone found breaching them will be out on his ear.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Why does not the Prime Minister tackle the culture of cronyism that he has created in his Government, instead of talking about rules that should already be observed across the Government? After the allegations in The Observer at the weekend, a national newspaper sacked one of its columnists, a lobbying company suspended one of its directors and another reprimanded one of its employees. The only organisation who have not acted against their employees or investigated their employees are the Government. When will the right hon. Gentleman act, rather than protecting the cronies with whom he has surrounded himself?

The Prime Minister: First, I welcome the right hon. Gentleman back. Secondly, I can tell him that we have investigated each allegation in The Observer in turn. I shall go through them for him. First, there was the supposed leak of a Select Committee report. We investigated that—no Minister was involved and no Members of Parliament were involved. A member of a lobbying firm simply took a press-embargoed copy. That should not have happened, but obviously it was not the Government's fault.

Secondly, there was the allegation of a leak of selective information in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Mansion House speech. There was no such leak; indeed, the information concerned was not even in the speech. Thirdly, the allegation about Mr. Liddle, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, was based on talk at a cocktail party at the Guildhall. A freelance journalist claiming to be an American business man said that he wanted to invest in Britain. He asked Mr. Liddle to help, and he perfectly properly agreed to do so. It is emphatically denied that, in doing so, he in any way offered to act on behalf of a lobbying company. The journalist claimed to have words suggesting that on tape, but it is now admitted that that claim was false and that no such tape exists.

We have investigated these matters very carefully. Instead of making general allegations, the right hon. Gentleman should make a specific allegation, provide the evidence for it and, of course, we would then investigate it.

Mr. Hague: I am grateful for the welcome back, but even with my sinuses I can smell the stench from these revelations. As for this so-called defence, of course some things did not involve Members of Parliament or Ministers—it is not MPs and Ministers who are running the affairs of this Government.

The central allegation about Mr. Liddle has not been disproved: it has been denied by Mr. Liddle. If it had involved an ordinary civil servant, investigations would now be under way and disciplinary action would be in prospect. Saying that people drank too much champagne on the night and could not remember what they had said would not be regarded as an adequate or convincing defence.

When will the right hon. Gentleman stop protecting the money-grabbing cronies with whom he has surrounded himself and start—[Interruption.]. They are indeed feather-bedding, pocket-lining, money-grabbing cronies. When will the right hon. Gentleman clean up the Government's act?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps I could return the right hon. Gentleman to the facts. The right hon. Gentleman alleges that if Mr. Liddle had been a civil servant he would have been suspended immediately. I have checked that with the head of the civil service and it is not correct—he would not have been suspended. Secondly, all the right hon. Gentleman's other allegations have been investigated and found to be false. I understand why he wants to suggest that this Government are the same as the Government of whom he was a member—[HON. MEMBERS: "Worse."] This case is not Jonathan Aitken; it is not Neil Hamilton; it is not cash for questions; and it is not Asil Nadir. Those allegations were made and proven, whereas not a single allegation in The Observer article is true.

Mr. Hague: Only people in the Prime Minister's inner circle would think that a fireside chat with someone with a hangover disproves the allegations. The problem is not just the allegations but the whole culture that he has now created—in which hon. Members can be hung out to dry; Ministers, such as the one sitting next to him, can be briefed against; and members of his inner circle are the untouchables. The right hon. Gentleman has created a culture of cronyism—in which the Paymaster General hangs on to his job because he has villas in high places, and in which Ministers do not even blush when they try to make the wife of his private pollster the deputy chairman of the BBC. Let the Prime Minister tell the House whether he even recognises that there is a problem of cronyism over which he now presides.

The Prime Minister: If I may return the right hon. Gentleman to the facts, just a moment ago he alleged that I had put someone connected with me forward for the BBC deputy chairmanship. I have had nothing whatever to do with those who have been put forward for the BBC deputy chairmanship. If he has any evidence to the contrary, perhaps he will produce it. All the other allegations are general ones. He is making general allegations because he knows that he cannot sustain a single specific one: it is a classic smear tactic.

The one allegation that the right hon. Gentleman has not made—perhaps he is about to make it—is that we leaked the strategic defence review. Such an allegation would not surprise me. We have instituted an inquiry into how the leak happened. The BBC correspondent Robin Oakley said that, at six o'clock yesterday, he was shown a copy of the document by a Conservative Front Bencher. If I find that anyone in the Ministry of Defence, or any other Ministry, was involved in leaking that document, I will dismiss him. Would the right hon. Gentleman do the same?

Mr. Hague: Only a Prime Minister in desperate trouble could believe that the leak of a Government document did not somehow originate with the Government. How ridiculous! He cannot admit that there is a problem of cronyism—which all the rest of the country can see—because the problem goes to the heart of new Labour, in which cronyism has taken the place of principle. In the words of the former aide to the Chancellor—who is chuntering on—the "Labour Government is always of two minds . . . On big issues especially, they don't know what they are thinking."

Does the Prime Minister not realise that government without principle quickly becomes government for sale—which is what is beginning to happen?

The Prime Minister: People will again note that the right hon. Gentleman has made no specific allegation or tried to substantiate one. All we have had is the usual windy rhetoric and general allegations. Until very recently, he and the Conservative party were trying to claim that we were responsible for the leak of the strategic defence review. I notice that he has not repeated that claim today, or said that he would take action against anyone involved in the leak.

As for saying that we do not get the big issues right, we have in the past few days published our proposals on the Child Support Agency—[HON. MEMBERS: "Leaked".] We have also published our proposals on the rough sleepers initiative, on numeracy and on the defence review—[HON. MEMBERS: "Leaked."] They were certainly not leaked by us—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: Those are all very serious issues, and the Government's policy to deal with them is correct. The right hon. Gentleman has nothing to say about those issues, because the Opposition have no policy criticism that they can sustain against the Government. He is reduced to making wide allegations with no particularity. He does that because he wants to try to prove that we are the same as the previous Government—but we are not, and we never will be.

Mr. Hague: Of course these are all serious issues and they should all have been brought to the House before they were brought to the media, as should every other Government announcement. This is a serious issue in which former aides of the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and the Minister without Portfolio—wherever he happens to be skulking at the moment—appear to have offered access to Government and Government information in return for a fee, and the Government have not been able to disprove it. That is an extremely serious matter and it is taken seriously by the people of this country. Will not the Prime Minister come to see in time that it was a defining moment in the record of the Government when people were able to see the Government for what they are—too many cronies and too few principles?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman gets no better with repetition. He keeps making great allegations of cronyism and corruption. He bandies around the words, but he will not make a specific charge and sustain it because every allegation made in The Observer has been investigated and found to be untrue. The reason that he carries on with all this rhetoric about the Government is that he and his party—as is noticed more in the country than anywhere else—have nothing whatever to say about the big policy issues of the day.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale): Given the Leader of the Opposition's sinuses, I will not ask him how he thinks Westminster city council smells. A report by Alan Langlands, chief executive of the National Health Service Executive, states that under the previous Administration, health authorities and emergency care services in the north-west were facing collapse. Since we have been in government, we have spent an extra £19 million on the South Cheshire health authority and an extra £9 million on North Cheshire to improve care in cancer treatment, to reduce waiting lists, to improve intensive care treatment for young people and to attack the winter crisis. How will my right hon. Friend ensure that under our Administration the health service in the north-west will never again face collapse?

The Prime Minister: By giving it the investment and the reform that it needs. Of course my hon. Friend is right. Since the election, we have put substantial extra sums of money into the health service over and above Conservative spending plans. Of course there was a defining moment a few days ago when the shadow Chancellor said that the Government were spending too much. That is the position of the Conservatives. Their attack on us in respect of public services is that we are spending too much, so let us never hear anything more from them about waiting lists or any other public service matter.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Whatever problems the Government have over the events of the past couple of days—they have some and I hope that they will tackle them—I know of no sight more stomach-churning than the Conservative party accusing others of sleaze. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House will come to order to hear the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ashdown: Surely the issue that should worry us today is not so much the job prospects of a couple of cadet new Labour insiders, but the jobs of tens of thousands of people across the country that are now placed in jeopardy as a result of the rising pound and rising interest rates. Does the Prime Minister not realise that he could take a decision today that would relieve the pain immediately: he could come off the fence on the single currency, set a target date—subject to a referendum—and give the economy, the country and industry the lead that they so desperately need?

The Prime Minister: As I think I have told the right hon. Gentleman before, the worst reason for making a decision to join the single currency would be some short-term advantage in the currency markets. That would not be sensible at all. The economic policy that the Government are pursuing is to make sure that we have monetary stability, which is why we gave the Bank of England independence to set interest rates, which have had to go up—they should have gone up before the election and they have had to go up since in order to squeeze out inflation. We will also ensure financial stability through curing the Budget deficit. That is the right long-term policy for the country. I have no doubt about that; and I have no doubt, either, that it is ultimately in the best interests of industry, although I understand the concern about the short-term problems that have resulted from the rising pound.

Mr. Ashdown: The Prime Minister has given that answer before. It did not wash then, and it does not wash now. If he took the decision that I have suggested, the pound would come down tomorrow, interest rates would come down next week, investment would keep coming into this country over the next decade, and Britain would have more influence in Europe right through into the next century. Why does he not realise that, on this occasion, long-term interest and short-term advantage coincide? He will have to take such action soon; why not take it now?

The Prime Minister: It is because I do not believe that short-term advantage and the long-term position coincide. If the pound were to be brought down artificially tomorrow, and if we, say, cut interest rates when the monetary conditions were not right to do so, the result would be inflation—the very problem that we had under the Conservative Government. If we do not take the action necessary to root out inflation, put the economy on a stable footing and ensure that the public finances are in order, we will be back to the days of 15 per cent. interest rates and the record repossessions and bankruptcies that occurred under the Conservatives. The policy mechanisms in place are precisely designed to avoid that.

A decision on the single currency must be taken in the national economic interest. Given the national economic interest, and as our economy has not converged with the economies of continental Europe, it would not be sensible at the moment to say that we would join.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): What do students with A-levels from Eton, Charterhouse, Wellington and Westminster schools do during their first year at St Andrews and Edinburgh universities? Does my right hon. Friend share my suspicions about the motivation of some of their parents, who happen to be members of another—hereditary—House and who keep on voting for public subsidies for that, no doubt, very interesting first year?

The Prime Minister: If I may deal with tuition fees, I suggest that people who have doubts read the speech of Lord Dearing—who, after all, chaired the committee that was set up by the Conservatives when in government—in which he backs the Government's case to maintain our position on Scottish tuition fees. He does so for the very sensible reason that, if we were to do what the Opposition are suggesting—although I believe them to be completely opportunist in so doing—we would end up having to find another £27 million. It would be far better to spend that money on improving university education.

Community Hospitals

Q2.[47950] Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): If he will make a statement on the Government's policy on community hospitals.

The Prime Minister: We certainly recognise the strength of feeling that people have for their local community hospitals. Community hospitals can play a role in the national health service, particularly offering a safe, clinically effective and efficient service for their areas. They must of course meet the same high quality standards and fairness and efficiency tests as any other hospital.

Mr. Burnett: I have just come from a meeting of many community hospital representatives, who are here because 27 community hospitals are either definitely to close or threatened with closure. How does the Prime Minister reconcile that fact with his oft-stated commitment to save the national health service?

The Prime Minister: The programmes of closure are proposed by local health authorities; there may be varying reasons for them. In certain areas, closures are proposed because health authorities genuinely believe in reorganising hospital provision. It is important to ensure that the reasons for any change in community hospital provision are genuinely concerned with the national health service and its interests. That does not mean that, if other provision is being made, every hospital closure must necessarily be wrong. That is not so in all 27 areas. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is to sit in on appeals against several of those cases. However, not every programme of reorganisation must be opposed.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): Does my right hon. Friend agree that after the closure of Edgware hospital by the previous Government, this Government have been making great strides in restoring services to the new Edgware community hospital, and that the new waiting list money will go a long way in helping that process? Is he also aware that after the rundown of the hospital by the previous Government, one of the problems is getting over to local people that there are services at Edgware hospital, and that it is alive and vibrant? Will he use his best endeavours to ensure that we can get that message over to the local community?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that my hon. Friend has just done that, and I back him up entirely. Edgware hospital provides a valuable service to local residents and will continue to do so. It is, of course, under this Government that the largest hospital building programme in the NHS is being put through. After years of delay, we are getting that hospital building programme under way, and five are already starting up.

Ministerial Visits

Q3.[47951] Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): What plans he has to pay an official visit to the St. Ives constituency.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. George: That is a pity. In my constituency, we are concerned about the NHS. When will the highly committed NHS staff of three of the four community hospitals in my constituency that I visited this weekend be told whether they have hospitals to work in and jobs to go to? Their jobs have been on the line since October last year, and the plans have been on the desk of the Secretary of State for ever and a day. When will they know whether they can join in the 50th anniversary celebrations of the NHS?

The Prime Minister: The plans have not been there for ever and a day. It is correct that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has to make his decision in due course. He will examine the proposals carefully to make sure that they represent the best way forward for health services in Cornwall. On underfunding, we accept that the NHS needs more investment. That is precisely why the comprehensive spending review is geared and designed to make sure that the health service has the resources it needs.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will welcome very much what the Government have done in Europe to try to make sure that Cornwall, with its special circumstances, is treated as an area in its own right for the purposes of regional aid. That is a different topic, but we are trying to do our best for the people of Cornwall and will carry on doing so.

Engagements

Q4.[47952] Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): How can the Prime Minister, as an elected Member of this House, be satisfied that he presides over a Government who, time after time, trail important policy announcements in the press before they are made properly to this House? Is he determined that, in future, policy statements will be made by unelected and unaccountable spin doctors, lobbyists and cronies?

The Prime Minister: In respect of the leak of the strategic defence review, I have made it clear that if anybody in government has been connected with that, they will be dismissed forthwith. The leak inquiry will try to get to the bottom of the matter, but I do not believe that anyone in government has been involved. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in saying that if the review has been leaked not by someone in my party but by someone on his side, that person should be dealt with by his leader.

Q5.[47953] Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Can the Prime Minister confirm that an undiluted, full-strength, 22-carat freedom of information Bill will be in the next Queen's Speech? Does he agree not only that that would redeem a key manifesto pledge, but that it would be the best way to stop lobbyists and other parliamentary parasites trading, because it would, by making Government information available to the many, not the few, devalue the very currency in which they trade?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend appreciates, I cannot start saying what will be in the Queen's Speech, but a freedom of information Act is a key part of our constitutional reform programme. We have set out proposals in the White Paper, and the next step is to publish the draft Bill for further consultation, as we shall in due course. It remains a key Government commitment.

Q6.[47954] Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Yesterday, a Labour peer—and former Labour Minister—described the measure whereby students from Northern Ireland, Wales and England would pay £1,000 more in fees than students from Scotland and the rest of the European Union as repugnant and as discrimination against our fellow countrymen. Will the Prime Minister explain why students from Manchester will have to pay £1,000 more than students from Milan and why students from Liverpool will have to pay £1,000 more than students from Lisbon? To get through the message that that is nonsense, will the students have to club together to hire a lobbyist to contact one of his cronies at No. 10?

The Prime Minister: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman paid any attention—I suspect that he did not—to what I said about Lord Dearing, who, as far as I am aware, is not known as a lobbyist. Lord Dearing has rightly pointed out that 354 students from other parts of the European Union are involved. If the proposals were limited to Scotland, the sum of money involved would be only £2 million. However, as Lord Dearing also pointed out, it would be wrong to suggest that students who do four-year courses in Scotland should be treated differently from those who do four-year courses in England—[HON. MEMBERS: "That is what you are doing."] We are not doing that; that is precisely the point. If we were, the cost would be £27 million.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that the £1,000 tuition fee will not be paid by the poorest third of students and that the next third will pay a reduced rate. The Conservative party proposals, however, would make all students, from whatever part of the United Kingdom, pay the full tuition fees. That would be wrong and would discriminate against those from low-income families.

Strategic Defence Review

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the outcome of the strategic defence review.

Today, I am publishing a White Paper setting out the conclusions of the review and a volume of detailed supporting essays. Copies are available in the Vote Office. Moreover, I have written, enclosing copies, to all hon. Members individually.

Before I deal with the review, may I first apologise to you, Madam Speaker, and to the House for the unauthorised and improper disclosure to some newspapers last night of the White Paper's contents? I am as angry and as outraged at this leak as any hon. Member—indeed, I hope that it will be condemned by hon. Members from both sides of the House.

I have today asked the Cabinet Secretary to authorise an immediate and thorough investigation into how the leak came about. The person or persons responsible will be dealt with severely. The leak represents a serious breach of an embargo designed to ensure that the detail of this major review was given first to the House of Commons, and I very much regret the fact that the House and Ministry of Defence employees heard first from the media. I take full responsibility for that, as my office demands, which is why I apologise to you, Madam Speaker, and to my parliamentary colleagues

The British people are rightly proud of their armed forces. They want—indeed, they expect—the Government to provide strong defence for their country. The strategic defence review does just that. It is the most radical and far-reaching reshaping and modernisation of our armed forces for a generation. It is unique in three key ways. First, it has been foreign policy led, not Treasury driven; secondly, it has been unprecedentedly open and inclusive; and thirdly, it has the whole-hearted support of all the service chiefs, for whose help I express my thanks.

The review will fundamentally reshape and modernise Britain's armed forces, sorting out the weaknesses, building on our strengths and providing a structure to deal with tomorrow's threats, not yesterday's enemies. Our forces will be more mobile, better manned, better supported and equipped, and better able to act as a force for good in the world, where we can and when we choose.

The world has changed out of all recognition since the end of the cold war. NATO remains the basis for defence and security, but, while the threat of major war in Europe is now a remote prospect, new threats confront us: terrorism; the international drugs trade; the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons; information warfare; ethnic rivalries; population pressures; and the break-up of existing states.

In the cold war, we needed large forces at home and on the continent to defend against the constant threat of massive attack from the Soviet Union, but now instability is the new enemy, and the need is increasingly to help to prevent, or to shape, crises further away, if necessary by deploying military forces rapidly before they get out of hand. In other words, we must now be prepared to go to the crisis, rather than have the crisis come to us.

The review has demonstrated that our forces are not properly adapted to the new environment. In today's world, we need to get our troops to trouble spots and crisis areas quickly and safely, and ensure they are properly supported when they get there. The review has highlighted the serious weaknesses that we inherited, most notably in heavy transport and in our hollowed-out and demoralised defence medical services.

At the same time, increased commitments have taken their toll on morale and on recruitment and retention, and have worsened the already very serious problem of undermanning in our forces. The review proposes major new investment and enhancements to improve our troops' ability to deploy more rapidly to trouble spots around the world.

We will acquire four additional roll-on, roll-off container ships and four large C-17 aircraft or their equivalent. To support and supply our troops once they reach the trouble spots, we will enhance the Army's supporting arms, so that, for the first time, they can undertake two operations simultaneously.

Because we have a solemn duty of care to our service men and women, whom we ask to put their lives at risk, we will make new money and personnel available to revitalise the defence medical services. In total, I am proposing an increase in the size of the Regular Army of 3,300: a change which will go a long way towards restoring vital parts of our armed forces that have been hollowed out.

Another key theme of the review has been a more integrated or joint-service approach to defence, to improve the operational effectiveness of our forces. We are introducing a series of radical changes, which include bringing together all our battlefield helicopters under a single command and expanding the responsibilities of the Chief of Joint Operations; a new joint defence centre to develop doctrine and other planning on a tri-service basis; and a four-star Chief of Defence Logistics, who will properly co-ordinate and standardise our three support services for the first time. I am pleased—I know that my pleasure will be shared widely in the House—to announce that the first such Chief will be Lieutenant General Sir Sam Cowan, who is currently the Army's Quartermaster General.

I am also responding in the review to an historic proposal by the First Sea Lord and the Chief of the Air Staff, by developing what will be known as Joint Force 2000, bringing together Royal Navy and Royal Air Force Harrier jets into a single organisation, able to operate equally effectively from aircraft carriers or land bases.

The most important of the joint initiatives is the creation of a new pool of joint rapid reaction forces, which will be the spearhead of our new modernised front line and will include all our high-readiness forces. Not only will they enable us to respond quickly and effectively to crises of all kinds and to build up larger forces should that be necessary, but—unlike today—we will be able to mount more than one Bosnia-type operation at a time.

The review also introduces important new front-line capabilities. We will create a sixth deployable brigade, which will increase the Army's flexibility and help tackle overstretch. The parachute role of the current airborne brigade will also be transferred to the airmobile brigade, which will become a new powerful and highly mobile air-manoeuvre brigade or air cavalry when the Apache attack helicopter enters service.

To meet our longer-term needs, I am delighted to be able to tell the House that we plan to replace our current small carriers from around 2012 with two larger, more versatile, carriers—in effect floating airfields capable of carrying a more powerful force, including a future carrier-borne aircraft to replace the Harrier—the cost of which will be spread over about 20 years.

I can also tell the House that the review confirms that the acquisition of 232 Eurofighters remains central to our long-term plans, providing a step change in the RAF's combat ability. Changes in the nature and scale of operations mean that we need two fewer submarines, three fewer destroyers and frigates and 36 fewer combat aircraft. However, those changes will not lead to cuts in the overall strength of our regular forces since the manpower released by the reductions will be used to fill gaps in front-line manning, thereby easing overstretch.

For our reserves, there will also be important enhancements to the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Air Force Reserve. I am determined that the Territorial Army should become more relevant, usable and integrated with the rest of our forces. Those who want it to languish in an outdated cold war role do the TA no service at all. Although its numbers will be trimmed to 40,000, it will be given a real heavyweight role in our nation's defences and called up more frequently in times of crisis. For that, we intend also that it should be better trained and properly equipped.

Unlike other recent reviews, this review is designed to put people first. That is why I am today announcing a significant new training and education initiative to boost recruitment and retention. All recruits will be given the opportunity to gain the six key skills needed by all in the workplace, and all personnel will be given the chance to achieve qualifications recognised by civilian employers.

In addition, there will be a major new programme—the learning forces initiative—to expand education and training opportunities for the armed forces through the new learning credits, which may be claimed during service careers and for some time afterwards. Those proposals will boost recruitment and retention by increasing the already considerable benefits of a service career, and benefit defence by developing the skills needed for modern warfare. The economy as a whole will also benefit as better qualified personnel return to the civilian employment market after their service career.

For our service families, we are setting up a task force to address the special problems that arise from their particularly mobile life style. For Britain's ex-service men and women, we are setting up a new veterans cell to provide an access point for guidance and advice.

Of course, it is vital that our armed forces are properly resourced, but if defence is to command the support of the nation, it must also be seen as good value for money. By 2001-02, in three years' time, we will be spending £747 million more than this year. In real terms, allowing for one-off asset sales, that will be a reduction of £685 million or about 3 per cent. of the defence budget. That compares with a reduction of more than 20 per cent. in real terms in the last seven years of the previous Government. We will do that primarily through increased efficiency, smarter procurement and better utilisation of our assets. Because the review represents a three-year settlement, we will be able to bring a new stability to our defence planning.

The Government believe that, in addition to caring for our people and defending our rights at home, we must also discharge our responsibilities in the world.

We must strengthen the effectiveness of the international community in peace support and humanitarian missions of all kinds, particularly through the United Nations. I can announce, therefore, that Britain will make a larger proportion of our front-line capabilities potentially available to the UN for peace support and humanitarian deployments, including all our rapidly deployable forces.

In a still uncertain and unstable world, we must be able to react quickly to crises as they develop, but we should aim to do more than that. We should aim to prevent conflict from arising in the first place. I intend to elevate conflict prevention—defence diplomacy, as I have called it—to be one of the eight core missions that will underpin our defence planning. That commitment will be backed up by a series of practical measures, including a new education and training initiative to help to develop and promote modern, democratically accountable forces around the world.

I turn now to the review's conclusions on our nuclear deterrent. The Government were elected on a promise that we would retain Trident. We have kept that promise, and we will continue to keep it. All of us want a safer world in which there is no place for nuclear weapons, but, while large nuclear arsenals and risks of proliferation remain, our minimum deterrent remains a necessary and continuing element of our security. We have, however, conducted a rigorous re-examination of our present deterrence requirements, and we have concluded that we can safely make further significant reductions from cold war levels. We will retain Trident as our sole nuclear system, but the single submarine on patrol at any one time will carry only 48 warheads. That compares with the previous Government's announced ceiling of 96 warheads. By reducing our overall stockpile to 200 operationally available warheads, we will have cut the explosive power of the deterrent by 70 per cent. since the end of the cold war.

At the same time, we will press ahead with arms control, and will introduce much greater openness on nuclear issues, including on our stocks of fissile material.

All in all, these are sensible measures, and I am sure that they will be widely welcomed. This truly radical review builds on the strengths and successes of our armed forces. It rectifies the weaknesses that we inherited, and it modernises our forces to deal with tomorrow's threats rather than yesterday's enemies. It places the skilled, brave and versatile people on whom our defence depends firmly at the centre of planning, and it gives them a clear sense of direction into the next century. Above all, it delivers the modern forces Britain needs for the modern world. It is a good deal for defence and a good deal for the country. I commend it to the House.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon): I endorse entirely the tribute paid by the Secretary of State to our armed forces and their families. They always acquit themselves with courage and distinction, and the whole country is rightly proud of them.

Let us be clear that the review was never a strategic defence review, but was always about cutting defence expenditure. The Secretary of State even began with a pre-emptive concession, offering the Treasury £500 million. He has ended up with cuts of more than £900 million a year. The Treasury has had its first instalment, and I must warn him that it will not be the last.

The cuts come as no surprise: Labour Governments always cut defence spending—[Interruption.] At least Labour Members have woken up and are making a lot more noise than they did when the Secretary of State made his statement. My hon. Friends and I noticed their ringing endorsement for his policy on Trident; I can assure him of at least our support on that.

The review was intended to take six months, but it has taken 14. For only 10 of those was it in the Ministry of Defence. The final four months saw the strength of our country's defences become a political football as the review was kicked around Whitehall between the Ministry of Defence, the Treasury and No. 10. No doubt a few focus groups were thrown in, too. What that has done to the morale of our armed forces can only be imagined.

Nor was it ever a foreign policy-led review. The Government have never published the foreign policy baseline as they promised—not even today. Even the panel of experts set up by the Government to advise them has never seen it. If the review had genuinely been foreign policy-led, it would have had to make some effort to match capabilities to commitments. There is no attempt in the White Paper to do that.

What has happened since 1 May last year to make the Secretary of State think that the world has become a safer place? All the evidence of the past year suggests exactly the opposite. Our commitment in Bosnia is clearly very long term. We nearly became involved in another Gulf war. A nuclear arms race has begun in Asia. The enlargement of NATO increases the level of our commitment to that organisation. I believe that we might still become involved in Kosovo. On top of that, there are dangers that no one can foresee, and it is not good enough to say that there are no threats just because we cannot foresee them. Who foresaw the Falklands or the Gulf crisis? Who, in the early 1930s, when defence spending was last at the level to which the Government plan to reduce it, foresaw the threat that subsequently engulfed the world? By their nature, such threats cannot be foreseen, but they must be provided against.

We welcome many of the proposals in the review and will support them. The Secretary of State concentrated on the few gains; I want to ask him about the many losses. The defence budget is to be reduced by £915 million a year under these proposals. Can he say what exactly that means for our armed services? Paragraph 89 of the White Paper says that we should be able to respond either to a major crisis such as the Gulf war or to undertake a lesser-scale deployment and a peacekeeping operation. Is he saying that we will not able to mount a major deployment such as the Gulf war as well as maintaining our operation in Bosnia? That is the implication of paragraph 89.

We welcome the various initiatives intended to make the lives of our service men and women and their families better and to improve conditions of service. There is one simple thing that the Secretary of State could to do this afternoon. He could respond to the repeated calls for more generous telephone allowances for our troops in Bosnia. It is a small matter for him, but a major matter for our troops, and he could solve it today.

The Navy is to lose two of its hunter killer submarines, three frigates and destroyers and three mine hunters. Those are significant reductions in capability. We will have fewer frigates and destroyers than France or Japan and about the same number as Italy. When will the cuts be implemented and which ships are involved? Can the Secretary of State confirm that the Falklands protection force will not in any way be diminished?

The Secretary of State has made much of the two planned aircraft carriers. They will, of course, add significantly to our ability to project force, but they will be very expensive and they are not planned to be in service until 2012, by which time Invincible will be 35 years old. Can he give a firm commitment to order those carriers? Conservative Members would be amazed if a Labour Government ever built and equipped them. They will be too expensive and will get killed off by the Treasury, first by delay and then cancellation.

Is the Secretary of State satisfied that our much-reduced surface fleet will be able to protect two carrier groups as well as HMS Ocean? Can he tell us something about the state of Project Horizon? It is widely known that it is in trouble, but the White Paper says that the new ships will replace our air defence destroyers in 2004. Can he confirm that that is the plan? The Navy is getting real cuts today for the possibility of two new carriers in 15 years' time. I confidently predict that the Government will never commission the new ships and that we will be left with a permanently weakened Navy.

We are delighted that the concepts of joint operations and rapid deployment are to be developed. Those ideas were started by us. We are also delighted that the Army is to get its full complement of Challenger 2 tanks. They were ordered by the previous Government, as was so much of the equipment now coming on stream, such as the Eurofighter and the Apache and Merlin helicopters. They will ensure that our forces have first-class equipment. Conservative Members doubt whether that would have been so had Labour been in power in the 1980s when those decisions were made.

We believe that cutting the Territorial Army by a third will prove to be one of the biggest mistakes of the review. Is it true that 172 TA centres will close? Which will they be, and when will they close? How much money will be saved by cuts to the TA?

The Paras have won the respect of the public and their fellow soldiers, to say nothing of our enemies. It is probably sensible to acknowledge the limited remaining role for brigade-sized drops, but, in making the change to the Paras' deployment, can the Secretary of State assure the House that the ethos and identity of the Paras will be retained as a discrete unit in the new brigade that they are to join?

The RAF is to lose 36 front-line aircraft: that is a significant and, we believe, dangerous reduction in our air power. We welcome the acquisition of the four C-17s, but is the Secretary of State confident that that will be enough? We were expecting him to order six. Can he tell us whether those planes are being leased or purchased; and, if leased, for how long? The future large aircraft project is apparently continuing, despite its well-known problems. Does he foresee a successful conclusion and to what timetable?

The White Paper is appallingly light on finance. It is absolutely impossible to understand how the annual totals are arrived at, or how capital receipts have been treated.

[Mr. John Maples]

Will the Secretary of State publish, in the very near future, detailed figures, so that the Select Committee can review them? He admits that the cut in the annual defence budget will amount to £915 million in real terms by the end of this Parliament, but does he agree that defence spending in the last year of the Conservative Government was £21.5 billion and that his plans for 2001–02 are for £23 billion, which represents a real-terms cut of £1.25 billion—considerably more than the £915 million that he is claiming?

There are many aspects of the White Paper that we shall support—indeed, many are simply the continuation of things that we had started or planned. However, there are far too many cuts—cuts in manpower and cuts in equipment. There will be fewer men, fewer planes and fewer ships to do more and more in an increasingly unstable and dangerous world. The Government's priorities are now clear and defence is not high on the list. We always suspected that the strategic defence review was a cover for cuts and today we have been proved correct.

Mr. Robertson: It is my pleasure to welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box for the first time as shadow Secretary of State for Defence. He has been put to a good and important job, although I cannot congratulate him on the quality of his argument. I suspect that he inherited that press release from somebody who was there before, rather than having made it up himself after giving due consideration to the White Paper that I gave him four and a half hours ago so that it would be possible for him to digest it.

It is a bit rich to be lectured by a former Conservative Treasury Minister about cuts in the defence budget. The hon. Gentleman was Economic Secretary to the Treasury between July 1990 and April 1992. The defence budget in the year 1991–92—one single year—was cut by a full 10 per cent. in real terms, yet he has the brass neck to come to the House of Commons and complain that I am going to reduce the defence budget by 3 per cent. over three years. The Government of whom he was a member cut defence expenditure in this country by 23.5 per cent. in real terms between 1990 and 1997, which amounts to 4 per cent. in real terms every year. The figure for the defence budget in 1997 was £6.5 billion lower than in 1990. Cumulative total cuts of some £25 billion of defence expenditure were made. I really think that we should take with a pinch of salt some of the hon. Gentleman's points.

The hon. Gentleman says that we have treated defence like a political football in the past year, but the very opposite is true. I wish that he had consulted his predecessor, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), because the right hon. Gentleman knows that the review has been unprecedentedly open and inclusive. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) attended some of the seminars that we organised and gave his point of view as part of that exercise. We have made sure that everybody had their say in the whole of the process, so that today the review is not simply the property of me as Secretary of State for Defence, or of the Ministry of Defence; I believe that it comes from all the inputs that we received over that time.

The hon. Gentleman made a point about the foreign policy baseline. I have provided for him in the White Paper the foreign policy priorities of the country and he will see a further outline in the supporting essays. Last October, I gave the House a clear outline of the Government's foreign policy objective and I followed that up with two major speeches; one at the Royal United Services Institute and the other at Chatham House. That is a weak debating point.

The hon. Gentleman said that we live in a much more dangerous and unpredictable world. Of course, we do. One of the problems that I have had to address when trying to ensure that our forces are fit to deal with that more dangerous world is to repair some of the weaknesses that I inherited. The hon. Gentleman will have noted that I was deliberately not critical of the previous Government, but those inherited weaknesses are there for everybody to see in defence medical services, logistics and heavy lift. We have had to rectify that.

Contrary to what the hon. Gentleman says, the outcome of the review means that there will be more regulars in the armed forces of this country. They will have better equipment and be better organised and they will be more relevant to dealing with the new dangers.

I gave the hon. Gentleman the White Paper and the supporting documents well in advance of my statement, so I am surprised that he asked about the force planning assumptions. It states clearly in the White Paper that our force planning assumption is based on being able to conduct a Bosnia peacekeeping operation and a Gulf operation simultaneously. That is what drives it. In the supporting papers, the hon. Gentleman will find even more documentary evidence of that.

The hon. Gentleman has obviously not read the supporting papers very thoroughly because he asked about telephone allowances. On page 9-6 of the supporting documents he will see that we say that telephone allowances will be increased as part of the review. We were responsive to what the armed forces had been telling us all along.

The number of frigates and destroyers will be reduced. It is interesting that, in the background piece of paper on which the hon. Gentleman was working last week, his researchers did not seem to know how many destroyers and frigates we had in the Royal Navy. The piece of paper that I have says that they thought we had 33 frigates and destroyers when, in fact, we have 35. It claims that the number will be reduced to 30 when, in fact, it will be 32. That is manageable in the current strategic circumstances and I stand behind it.

Our commitment to the Falklands is laid out in specific and graphic terms. The garrison will remain unaltered, and our commitment to the islands and their inhabitants remains and is on alert.

The hon. Gentleman made a point about aircraft carriers. Rather than deal with this substantial issue, which the Government have studied in detail, the hon. Gentleman chose to make a few cheap debating points. I said that we were planning to replace our three valuable and useful small carriers with two large carriers in 13 years' time. That is the commitment that we make in the review, and it is part and parcel of the capabilities that we think will be relevant for the future. As I have said, they will be paid for over a substantial time.

Major decisions will still be required about what aircraft they will carry and what role they will perform, but we believe that our intention makes sense.

The fleet configuration has been part of the defence review, and the Royal Navy is completely satisfied with it. The Royal Navy may be losing some frigates and destroyers, the number of attack submarines may eventually drop from 12 to 10 and it may have fewer than planned in the way of mine counter-measure vessels, but it will also have the enhanced amphibious capability which is so important and of which it is so proud. It will also have some missiles that will work on the vessels that it has today.

The hon. Gentleman made much of the reduction in numbers in the Territorial Army. The bulk of the Territorial Army is configured for a threat that has gone. We want to make the Territorial Army more relevant, more usable and more integrated into the regular forces because that is what it wants. We want the Territorial Army to be able to be called up and form units because it told us that that is what it wants. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will outline more of the details tomorrow, and we shall consult the Territorial Army about the footprint and contact point that is so important.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) congratulates us, or at least commends us, on the new deployment for the Parachute Regiment, which it will welcome. It will make it much more usable.

The Royal Air Force will lose some of its fast jets, but will gain 232 Eurofighters, which is one of the best multi-role aircraft that the country has probably ever seen. When it comes into service, it will add substantially to our RAF capabilities. We shall order C-17s or their equivalent because that is one of the capability holes that the previous Government left us. The future large aircraft will be a contender for the longer-term role.

The hon. Gentleman concludes that we have left the forces less strong than they have been, and that we have reduced manpower; but we have increased it. He claims that we have reduced the capability of the armed forces, when we have increased it. I know that he is new to the job, but the review has the backing, in public and in private, of the three service chiefs and the Chief of the Defence Staff. The review is right for Britain and its defence forces. That is why the hon. Gentleman is wrong and the forces are right.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): I very strongly welcome and support what my right hon. Friend has announced to the House. I congratulate him and other Ministers in the Department on making the right decisions on difficult issues.

I strongly welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement about the replacement of the aircraft carriers, which will be good news for my constituency. Will he spell out in more detail the time scale for that procurement objective? What further work will be put in place now to prepare for the replacement of the carrier programme? Will he say more about the Government's plans for our nuclear attack submarines? In particular, what decision have the Government made about ordering the additional two Astute class SSNs, which, as he will understand, formed part of the original decision last March under the previous Administration, who ordered three, with an option for two?

Mr. Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend very much for his understandably warm welcome for the review and its conclusions. As he is the Member for Barrow and Furness, which is the birthplace of HMS Invincible, I can understand his attachment to the concept and actuality of carriers. The time scale that I have made clear is an in-service date of 2012. That is the date which the Royal Navy believes to be sensible and achievable. Any acceleration was not viewed as practical.

On the new attack nuclear submarines, the existing plans remain as they are, and we are committed to taking delivery of the Astute class.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): I thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in allowing me sight of the White Paper some four and a half hours ago, which is about 50 per cent. longer than his right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I were allowed to study the contents of the Scott report.

I share the Secretary of State's indignation at the leaking of the White Paper. Whoever was responsible for that insulted not only the House of Commons but the men and women of all three services, whose lives and jobs may well be affected by the White Paper's conclusions.

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not be surprised if the response to his White Paper is relief, and not necessarily one of rapture, on the somewhat dubious ground that the reductions are not as severe as was originally feared.

I welcome the premium to be placed on flexibility, mobility and rapid deployment, the decision to restrict the number of Trident warheads, the confirmation of the commitment to Eurofighter and the emphasis on joint operations and planning. Will the Secretary of State explain why the White Paper of a Government who, rightly, want to play a leading role in Europe makes such scant reference to the opportunities for defence integration in Europe—a mere 22 lines or so on page 10? Will he tell the House what consultations took place with our European allies in the thinking that lay behind the White Paper? Will he also tell the House what account was taken of the current strategic concept review being carried out by NATO?

Finally, can the Secretary of State confirm that the expeditionary strategy that lies behind the White Paper will be pursued in the interests of the United Kingdom, and in accordance with our treaty and other obligations—as, for example, to the United Nations—but will not be based on an automatic assumption that the United Kingdom will, in all circumstances and in all parts of the world, underpin United States foreign policy?

Mr. Robertson: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his welcome for the key items in the review. I register his thanks for the time that was made available to him to read the report. I suffered 18 years in opposition, constantly complaining about the amount of time available to the Opposition to read documents before statements had to be made. I am very glad that, at the first major opportunity, I was able to do as I said for so many years; I believe that it makes for a better debate.

[Mr. Robertson]

This is a good review by any standards. The force structure was put together following the foreign policy baseline establishment, and the force structure reflects the country's foreign policy priorities, which I believe are generally agreed and appreciated. Only after that was done were the proposals presented to Government, and the resources discussed and debated.

The force structure that was recommended by Defence Ministers, with the full support of the chiefs of staff, was accepted by the Government in its entirety—that is a crucial point for people to register. I believe, and they believe, that the finances that are available for it, given the new configuration of forces and the targets for efficiency and for asset management, are demanding but achievable, and will still give us the ability to pack a punch in the world.

The hon. and learned Gentleman's criticisms were more moderate than those that we received from the Opposition Front Bench. It is strange how keen the Conservative Front-Bench defence team are to spend more public money, when the shadow Chancellor does not spare an opportunity, any day of the week, to say that the Government are slack on public expenditure. I wonder whether they would deliver in government what they are so keen to say today.

On Europe, we have been engaged in a permanent consultation with our allies about the strategic defence review. On Monday night, at Lancaster House, where I met the Defence Ministers of Germany, France, Sweden, Spain and Italy and outlined where our review had taken us, they welcomed it with considerable congratulation. I hope that when they read the review when they get it in the post tomorrow, they will find something there of interest and value. NATO colleagues have also been consulted as we have gone along, and the formulation of the strategic concept takes very much on board many of the ideas in the review.

We are not tied to any particular alliance or to any individual country, because Britain needs and demands a right to be able to act alone. However, we take our treaty commitments enormously seriously. We take our alliances seriously, and our deep and lasting continued friendship with the United States of America underpins a common view that we have about many of the problems in the world today.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I seek the co-operation of the House. There has been an opportunity for only three questioners in three quarters of an hour. There must now be very brief questions; I am sure that the Secretary of State will co-operate in his responses.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead): I welcome the outcome of the review and welcome the reduction in operational nuclear weapons, but I note that annual savings could be doubled if Britain concentrated on non-nuclear defence. I ask my right hon. Friend a single question: from this review, will the Government be in a position to get rid of nuclear weapons in the period following the next general election?

Mr. Robertson: If there is progress in multilateral negotiations, and if there is to be a balanced reduction in nuclear weapons leading to their elimination, we shall play our part in that, but today I have announced reductions in our nuclear forces. We shall maintain the minimum deterrent to which we committed ourselves before the general election—a commitment on the basis of which my hon. Friend and I were elected—but we have done so in circumstances where we have made a contribution to a process which, I hope, will eventually lead to a nuclear-free world.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): The House will have had considerable sympathy for the Secretary of State as he searched for something to say about the strategic defence review that we have not been able to read in the newspapers over the past four weeks. In terms of the leak, if the Ministry of Defence is so insecure, one wonders whether it can be entrusted with our country's security.

The right hon. Gentleman made a welcome announcement about increasing the establishment of the Army by 3,300, and he mentioned pay and conditions of service. Could he be specific about those? He will be aware that there was already a shortfall of 5,000 men in the infantry, and I cannot think of what he can announce in the SDR that will enable 8,300 more soldiers to be recruited and others to be retained.

Mr. Robertson: Let me deal with the leak. I am not prejudging the outcome of the inquiry or who leaked the document and how it was disseminated. Let us wait and see, and hope that everybody condemns it because it was wrong and whoever did it, if that person is found, will be treated appropriately. However, let us distinguish that leak, which was wrong and improper, from the widespread consultation through the year on all the issues on Britain's defence, for which I apologise not one bit.

I listened to the views of many sections of the community. The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) who is a distinguished former Secretary of State for Defence, came to me and offered his view and advice, as did Lord Younger of Leckie; Lord Carrington; Lord Healey; Sir Geoffrey Pattie; Pat Duffy; the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark); the former shadow Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for North–West Hampshire (Sir G. Young); and a host of others. We listened carefully to military and non-military views, and they were debated in the country as a whole. I am proud that although the review may not be a surprise today, it will be seen as common sense, the way forward on which we should all be able to unite because of that consultation process.

The hon. Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) mentioned the increase in Army numbers. That is welcome, and is in line with the Army's ideas. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces, like his predecessor, is making valiant efforts to turn round the recruitment position that we inherited. The Army was 5,500 short, but we think that we have turned the corner and that recruitment is making up the deficiency. Through the other enhancements, and especially through the learning forces initiative, it is up to us to make sure that we get the right people of the right quality for the future.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): May I begin by paying tribute to my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friends in his ministerial team? The strategic defence review is a tremendous achievement and will provide a secure future in a modern world. Does my right hon. Friend agree that a core mission of defence diplomacy for the United Kingdom's armed forces is essential to deal with the diverse uncertainties and crises of the present day world? Will he confirm that the review will provide the equipment and support that are needed by our armed forces for such a role, and that it will build on their excellent worldwide reputation as forces for good which can make a difference?

Mr. Robertson: I very much welcome my hon. Friend's support, which she has given not just today but throughout the exercise. As the Member of Parliament for Dunfermline, West and therefore for Rosyth dockyard, she will welcome the review's good news for that dockyard. She is right to pick up the defence diplomacy initiative and to ask for assurances. If we are to engage in serious military-to-military contacts that will lead to a reduction in tension and a greater increase in understanding, we must back our efforts with proper resources. That is why our defence attaché network will be strengthened and why there will be more resources for joint training and exercises with some of our allies, including some of our former opponents. That will make a much safer world, and certainly a safer continent.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on putting a brave face on what is obviously a difficult announcement, and on his courtesy in inviting me to give him advice on the review; I only wish that he had taken it. Having said that, I certainly welcome the development of a number of ideas that have been Ministry of Defence policy for some considerable time and are right—the development of jointery and the development of the rapid reaction forces have to make sense in the new world in which we live.

May I correct the right hon. Gentleman on one other point? As he will know, he has not made any reduction in the number of warheads because we never announced the number of warheads that we would have, for good reasons, and I am surprised that he has chosen to announce it today; we only ever announced the maximum that there could be.

I have had the opportunity of reading only The Daily Telegraph to find out what is actually in the review. The one thing that sticks out clearly, which is profoundly unwise in the present situation and which will link in to the problems of overstretch, undermanning, recruitment and morale, is the cuts in the TA. That is merely an initial comment, because I have not had a chance to study the statement, but there is one specific question and one point that I should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman. It is one thing to make reductions in our armed forces because there is a major change in the strategic situation, and then to fix at a level of defences which I believed was the minimum level that this country should have. There cannot be a justification to make further reductions on the ground that "You did it, so we can do it, too."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has just left. Will the Secretary of State assure the House, after all the worries of this review, which took longer than I know he wished, that, now the review is over and the expenditure levels are fixed, there will be no attempt whatever by the Treasury to make further cuts in the defence programme—and that he has had that undertaking?

Mr. Robertson: I valued the advice that the right hon. Gentleman gave me. I listened to the advice that was given to me by former Secretaries of State, former chiefs of the defence staff and former permanent secretaries, as I listened to many others involved in this exercise. Like him, I could not take on board everything that was said in terms of advice. I wonder how, when he looks back on his career and on the substantial cuts in defence expenditure that occurred around the time that he was in office, he cogitates on that. However, I welcomed what he said, and I am sure that he will recognise some of the views that resonate through the White Paper when he has a chance to read it.

In terms of the nuclear deterrent, the world has moved on. I sit on the Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council and the Permanent Joint Council of the NATO-Russia Founding Act with the Russian Defence Minister. We are building trust and relationships. We should be much more open and much more transparent, and the rules of the cold war should not necessarily bind us at times such as this. That is why we are opening our books, making it clear what we have and, by doing that, making absolutely certain that people know that the deterrent is still there, still credible and no one should mess with us as a consequence.

The right hon. Gentleman says that we are going to reduce further the level of our forces. We are not. The Regular Army, the regular forces of this country, will be increased by 3,300 as a result of this review. That is what is going to happen. I hope, therefore, that he will not rely on The Daily Telegraph, although, as it was working from a photocopy of the White Paper, it may have got it right.

We are increasing the strength and capability, and we have the satisfaction of the Chief of the Defence Staff as well as of the other chiefs in putting forward this force configuration. The right hon. Gentleman may think that we are unwise to cut the TA. I hope that he will look at the White Paper and see what we propose. We want to strengthen and underline the TA's importance, make it more usable and more integrated and give it a role for the future, not let it be stuck in the past, still in a cold war role.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on this strategic defence review, which has clearly been taken for strategic reasons and not, as the Opposition Front-Bench team has maintained, for financial reasons? I particularly welcome the joint operations, the rapid deployment that is mentioned in the document and, when thinking of my constituency, the Eurofighter confirmation. Is it possible for my right hon. Friend to say a word or two about the Procurement Executive at Abbey Wood in Filton, and what effect the review will have on it?

Mr. Robertson: I welcome my hon. Friend's question, which allows me to underline what he said—that this has not been a Treasury-led review. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made clear, the finances are fixed for three years. That will give the armed forces a much greater ability to plan ahead and much more stability than they have ever had in the year-by-year haggling that characterised public expenditure in the past. I can understand my hon. Friend's interest and, I am sure, satisfaction in the confirmation of the role and numbers of Eurofighters that we will be ordering.

There will be implications for the Procurement Executive in Bristol—a considerable reform of the procurement process, which will lead to better value being obtained for the equipment that we buy. However, it is right and proper that these changes should be subject to consultation with the Procurement Executive's employees before anything is announced in the House.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The objectives of greater mobility, flexibility, firepower and joint operations are admirable. However, as there are to be fewer flying squadrons, is there not a risk that morale will be further reduced and personnel may leave? In order to fill the 232 cockpit places for the Eurofighter, will the right hon. Gentleman consider allowing pilots to do commercial pilot courses at ground school during their flying training, so that if they leave the regular service they could join the auxiliary air force, thereby making good any shortfall in that way?

Mr. Robertson: The training initiative is already under way and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces has it under review. I assure the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) that morale in the Royal Air Force will not be affected, other than for the better, by this review and our vision for the future. The confirmation of the order for Eurofighters has been looked for and their role has been vindicated by the very deep analysis carried out in the review. I thought that the hon. Gentleman might have welcomed the decision to take over the lease on the C-17s or their equivalent. I am aware that he has a long-standing interest in that.

Morale in the forces has been badly affected in the past by hollowing out. That is especially true of morale in the RAF, which has led to an exodus of fast jet pilots. That will be relieved by a reduction in the number of fast jets but a continuation of the existing levels of manpower. It will relieve the overstretch that has been at the basis of falling morale.

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his foreign policy-led defence review. I especially welcome his comments not just on expensive pieces of military kit, but on our most valued asset—the men and women of our services and their families.

In the context of the review, does my right hon. Friend agree that the process has again highlighted the absolute lunacy of an independent Scotland, a separation of the forces and their payment and the creation of two foreign armies, two foreign navies and two foreign air forces, operating in two separate countries side by side on these islands?

Mr. Robertson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Nothing better highlights the fantasy world of the separatists in Scotland than the concept of a separate Scottish army, navy and air force—presumably with the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) as the commander-in-chief. Our armed forces contain a rather large proportion of high-quality Scots, and they are strengthened as a consequence of that.

The review is very good news for the armed forces in Scotland. It is good news for Rosyth dockyard; good news for Faslane; good news for the Nimrod replacement and Kinloss; good news for Leuchars; good news for the Edinburgh area with the Eurofighter contract; good news for the Army personnel centre and the other central functions of the MOD in Kentigern house in Glasgow; and good news for Scotland. Separation and ripping Scotland out of the United Kingdom would be profoundly bad news for Scotland and for the rest of the country.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Leaving aside the panic button that was obviously triggered by opinion polls in Scotland, may I tell the Secretary of State that—despite many hon. Members' urgency in finding answers to specific questions—the documents merit serious study and considered response? What are the geographical implications of reductions in Territorial Army numbers? There has been genuine concern in the highlands and islands of Scotland that, in a line from Fort William to Stonehaven, there may be no Territorial Army centre.

The Secretary of State also mentioned the issue of the special problems—such as mobility—faced by service families. Will there be a specific Ministry of Defence education budget to assist children who have to move from various settings and countries—sometimes at very short notice—or will the matter be negotiable with the Department for Education and Employment, the Scottish Office, the Welsh Office and local authorities? Parents and families are concerned about that matter.

Finally—very briefly—why are we only cutting in half the number of Trident nuclear warheads? Why do we not set a model example for the rest of the world, so that we can genuinely argue the case for non-proliferation?

Mr. Robertson: I do not know what position the hon. Lady will have in Alex's Scottish army—perhaps chief of the air staff. We shall see. She asked about the Territorial Army. The geographical distribution of the new, reinvigorated Territorial Army is a very important matter which should be the subject of consultation with the Territorial Army itself. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces is currently engaged in such consultation—which, rightly and properly, should take time to be completed.

The hon. Lady was right about education, and I hope that she will register both my comments and the White Paper's contents dealing with the matter. We shall establish a task force to deal specifically with the problems experienced by mobile families—who do not have first choice in choosing schools to provide the education that their children deserve, and who find it difficult to get on to doctors' waiting lists and almost impossible to get NHS dentistry.

Those problems are difficult ones because of the current structure of the health service and education service, which is why a specific task force will be established to deal with them. Although the problems may seem to be small issues within a vast strategic defence review, they are far greater than any strategic issue if one cannot get medical attention or one's children into school. We want to deal with those problems.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): With the interests of my 3,800 aerospace workers in mind, will my right hon. Friend say more about the heavy-lift future large aircraft? We want to build its wings—will it fly? Will the Astor project—I have a constituency interest in it—go forward? Will he say how many more months we shall wait to hear the fate of the 3rd battalion Royal Welch Fusiliers (Territorial Army)?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is a doughty champion of the interests of the aerospace workers in his constituency, and rarely wastes an opportunity to make his views on them clear to me. I am always glad to listen to him. I have made it clear that we have an interim need for heavy-lift transport, and the C-17 or an equivalent fits into that category. However, the future large aircraft project continues. We fully support it, and hope that it will provide an appropriate European heavy-lift aeroplane for the future. We have a commitment to the Astor programme, which goes ahead. My hon. Friend will receive news of the Territorial Army configuration once consultations have been completed.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): The Secretary of State will be aware that the proposal for the joint rapid reaction force expansion builds on the Conservative joint rapid deployment force; therefore, we welcome it. However, he will also be aware that I am extremely concerned about the future of the Parachute Regiment and airborne forces. Is it not the case that, as a result of a review, the cap badge and the red beret of the Parachute Regiment and the proud ethos of airborne forces is likely to be submerged into the new air manoeuvre brigade? Is he now able to respond to the point that I made in the House last week—that this welcome new brigade should be based in Aldershot in Hampshire rather than in East Anglia because the forces have to deploy from west of London not east of London?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman takes a healthy non-partisan view of defence which is very welcome. Although he did not say it, I am sure that he welcomes the thrust of the review. He says that we may well have taken some ideas from the previous Government's joint rapid deployment force, but even he will recognise that it was not easily deployable, so we have given it the capability to deploy and the rapidness that it did not have in the past. I am happy to continue with some of the better ideas of the previous Government and to give them the resources to make them work.

The hon. Gentleman is right to praise the Parachute Regiment, its proud tradition and record of fighting, but it is generally felt that its capability in parachuting should be built into something that makes more sense and is relevant to future circumstances. Its cap badge will be maintained, as will its traditions and, given those who run the Army at present, it is highly unlikely that there will be any attempt to change that. However, within the new air manoeuvre brigade, its relevance and purpose will undoubtedly be increased in future. No decision has been taken about where the brigade will be based, I hear what the hon. Gentleman says about Aldershot and I am sure that he expresses a dispassionate and objective view, but I have no doubt that other objective views will be expressed from other parts of the House, and we shall listen to them all.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement today, particularly the reference to the defence medical services? It was depressing to find that those in Bosnia doing the job on behalf of our reserves and regular forces were so damaged by the reorganisation of services by the previous Government. It is difficult enough to work in the medical services, as I know, and to do that job in dangerous and awful conditions is something which I consider unacceptable. I very much welcome the move to do something about it, and I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend who is a member of the Defence Select Committee and has seen at first hand many of our troops in operations. Like so many others, she has heard from them about the current demoralisation in the defence medical services. The previous Government made a serious mistake in the way in which they made economies. It is something which many people regret. I do not make much of it, in the interest of maintaining the consensus that we have built up, but it has to be rectified, and we are committed to that. If our deployed troops require and rely on anything during operations, it is the medical back-up; we have to re-create that and make sure that it is there.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I should be grateful if the Secretary of State could answer three or four quick questions about the White Paper, as I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members will have doubts about how £750 million will be saved. He spoke specifically about overstretch and undermanning. How does he square that with reducing the number of ships. Putting more men into ships, but having fewer ships will undoubtedly mean more deployment, possibly for longer. Where will the new aircraft carriers be kept? I should like to make a special plea for Portsmouth dockyard, which is custom made for it. Will he also explain to the tens of thousands of people in the Greater Portsmouth area who rely on the defence industry for jobs what there is in the White Paper that will give them some satisfaction that their jobs are safe and that the projects that they are currently working on will not be abandoned? I am heartened by the thought that there will be a further statement tomorrow. Finally, will he let us know what he plans to do with defence medical services, in particular the future of the Royal Haslar naval hospital?

Mr. Robertson: It is difficult to give short answers, Madam Speaker, if hon. Members ask five questions. May I first put the hon. Gentleman right? The savings in the defence budget will not be £750 million. We are talking about a 3 per cent. reduction in real terms in the defence budget by the end of three years—£685 million. We believe—and the MOD believes—that that can ensure that we still deliver the force package that we have announced. Undermanning in the Royal Navy will be helped by the reduction in the surface fleet. Unlike previous Governments—let them remain unnamed at the moment for the sake of peace—who reduced both the surface fleet and manpower, creating overstretch, we are leaving manpower levels as they are. The Navy believes that that will make a substantial difference to overstretch.

I note—no more than that—that the hon. Gentleman wants the new aircraft carriers to be based in Portsmouth. The happy news is that my constituency of Hamilton, South is absolutely landlocked. I am therefore completely objective in that regard. No doubt, there will be competing interests for that basing policy. It is just conceivable that

[Mr. Robertson]

I will not be the Defence Secretary around at the time who must make that decision. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I express shades of mortality rather than any sign of modesty.

The defence industry is in very safe hands. It is important to the country because of the jobs that it creates, the exports that it generates and the technology of which it is a part. The defence review underlines the importance of the British defence industry, which I spend much of my time helping when visiting foreign lands.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Does my right hon. Friend understand that the threat of a new nuclear arms race in southern Asia is worsened by Britain retreating to a position from which we defend our national right to use nuclear weapons but deny that same right to almost every other nation on earth? If so, does he accept that, in announcing that Britain is and will remain a nuclear weapons power, he has missed an unique opportunity to give a lead on nuclear disarmament, which could pull the world back from a nuclear brink that has suddenly and frighteningly become that much closer?

Mr. Robertson: Despite my new post, I watch the Scottish press carefully. I always thought that my hon. Friend believed in delivering what one promised. He and I were both elected on a manifesto that stated that we would retain Trident; we should keep our commitments. On the subject of new nuclear arms races, this Government ratified the comprehensive test ban treaty immediately they came to power. I hope that India and Pakistan will also do so. That would make a serious contribution to reducing the chances of proliferation and the dangers of testing.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): The Secretary of State will be aware that service men and women, from the most senior officers to the newest squaddie, will have been watching and listening to what he has said. Does he accept that what he has announced, which an artillery man might call a smokescreen barrage, cannot disguise huge cuts? Our service men and women will have noticed that he failed to answer the question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King). The Secretary of State has no undertaking that the cuts will end—otherwise, he would have told us. How can he possibly believe that recruitment, retention and overstretch will be helped by his announcement of huge, Treasury-driven cuts?

I welcome one or two points, particularly the strengthening of defence medical services, which the Secretary of State will know are important in my constituency. Does he recognise that his announcement on the cutting of fast jets now, with the promise of jam tomorrow when the Eurofighter arrives, will not help retain pilots? That is the economics of the madhouse; they will all have left long before the Eurofighter is available. Does he recognise that all he is promising is beyond visual range? Will he finally answer the question that I have been asking him and his Minister of State on behalf of my constituents for more than a year? Will he address the scandalous refusal to announce what there will be in the splendid buildings of the staff college in Camberley?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is right in one respect. Our forces across the world will be interested in the defence review and in what their Parliament has to say about it. Where he is wrong is in underestimating their intelligence when it comes to discriminating between what he is saying and what I am saying. They know what the past seven years have been like. They know of the 23 per cent. cuts and compulsory redundancies in the armed forces when they were on operations in Bosnia.

We are saying today that the regular armed forces of this country will be increased. The Army will be increased by 3,300, and all other services will be maintained at present levels. Our forces will be able to understand what is in the review, and they will see the contrast between it and what they have experienced. The hon. Gentleman was not listening when I made the point—following the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King)—that the financial deal in the White Paper is part of the comprehensive spending review and is guaranteed for the next three-year period. No Conservative Government gave a three-year forward commitment.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Camberley and what use might be made of that building. We will consider, with all the valuable buildings that are within my responsibility, the best and most appropriate way of dealing with those sometimes surplus assets, and whether they could be used in terms of the rationalisation of some of the defence estate.

Mr. Nick Ainger (West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire): I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the rest of the MOD team on the review. It is the first review I can recall where Wales has not been penalised in terms of job losses. During the final two terms of the Conservative Government, 2,000 defence jobs were cut in Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire.

May I ask specifically about the three armoured regiments that are planned to return from Germany with their 2,500 personnel? Has a decision been made on where those three regiments will be based and trained? If no decision has been made, may I recommend that my right hon. Friend look closely at basing them and providing training at the Castlemartin tank range in my constituency?

Mr. Robertson: I am taking careful note—I am sure that my officials will be as well—of all bids for the new configurations, which I know will be generally welcomed. No decisions have yet been taken about where the regiments coming back from Germany will be based. We will look carefully at the assets, to ensure that the right decisions are taken in terms of the military and the public purse. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw a contrast between the experience of those in the armed forces and what is promised in the review today. The defence review was designed as a vision of the future that would unite as many different elements in the country as possible, so that defence would cease to be the political football that it has sometimes been in the past. I believe that it does that, and that it is good for the country.

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire): As the right hon. Gentleman continues to deny that the Treasury had anything to do with the review, he is, I suppose, unable to accept the congratulations that some of us would want to offer him and his colleagues on having fought extremely well against the predators of the Treasury and having coming out with cuts which are much smaller than many of us feared. I am sorry that he cannot accept those congratulations, which are offered sincerely.

May I particularly welcome the appointment of a new Chief of Defence Logistics? I hope that the Secretary of State will instruct him to finish the job of managing defence centrally, which was started all those years ago by Mountbatten and has been frustrated from time to time by single-service rivalries and turf protection. If he can solve that problem and bring together all the defence logistics, he will have done us a great service.

I wish to make a point about the Territorial Army. In this country, the services, in their professionalism, are gradually getting further and further away from the people. The closing of Territorial Army centres and the taking out of the defence world of members of the civilian community will accelerate that. Will he look at that problem, because if the services are divorced from their civilian counterparts, we will get an unstable and unsatisfactory situation, which we have not had in this country since the war?

Mr. Robertson: If I had had a battle with the Treasury, I would have been happy to accept the congratulations of the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the President of the Board of Trade have all had an interest in the White Paper, and we have had a reasonable discussion.

As I said—and it should not be underestimated—the package that was designed in the Ministry of Defence by the Chiefs of Defence Staff, the Ministers and others who gave their input to the process was untouched by Government. A civilised discussion then took place with the Treasury, and a package was agreed. None the less, I accept the hon. Gentleman's congratulations on the size of the package and pass them on to my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the Chief of Defence Logistics; we believe that it will result in better co-ordination of a key component in ensuring that the right forces can be delivered at the right time. I know that General Sir Sam Cowan's appointment as the first chief has been generally welcomed; there is probably no better man to fit that position and to begin with energy doing the job that the hon. Gentleman describes.

I recognise that very small armed forces, which are proudly treasured by the British people, can become disconnected from their local communities and lose visibility. The TA plays a part—but not the only part—in ensuring that there is contact. That will be one of the key criteria by which we judge the TA's final shape when it is reconfigured, reinvigorated and made more appropriate to the future.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Recent events in Iraq, India and Pakistan have raised awareness of the terrible risks of nuclear proliferation. Does my right hon. Friend believe that the initial cuts in British nuclear weapons that he has announced will enable Britain to take a strong lead both in discouraging proliferation and in reviving the process of multinational disarmament?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. We need to move with some urgency towards a safer world, in which there are fewer of these weapons. We believe that we should maintain a credible nuclear deterrent, but that that can be done at lower levels. We also believe that we can be more open about what we have. The review will achieve that, which is good news for those who serve in our deterrent patrols and will, I believe, be welcomed in the country and, indeed, in the wider world.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Does the Secretary of State agree that, on the crucial medical services, the White Paper is strong on generalisations, which I welcome, but silent on points of detail? Is that not surprising, as a report was completed some months ago on the secondary care agency? Will he confirm that he will build on the core of the Royal Naval hospital at Haslar and the medical college at HMS Dolphin, retaining them as a centre of the enlarged medical services?

Mr. Robertson: Rebuilding the defence medical services and the morale that has disappeared will not be easy, but we are committing money and people to ensure that it happens. I cannot say what the final shape will be. Haslar and the local national health service trust are having on-going discussions. I want urgently to consider how best we can fulfil our commitment, use properly the money that we have set aside and ensure that one of the key capabilities of our armed forces is given the priority that people believe it should have.

Gillian Merron (Lincoln): May I pay particular tribute to the review's acknowledgement of the worth of our service people and its practical commitment to improving their lives through better personnel services, education and training and the task force for the family? Will my right hon. Friend tell my constituents when a decision is likely to be reached on the future of RAF Scampton in Lincolnshire?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right to point to the key role that people have in the review and in the armed forces as a whole. I am told that it is a cliché to say that people are our key asset, and I suppose that it is; it is repeated by those who have done them a disservice as well as by those who have done them a service. However, it is a fact of life. People make our defences the envy of the world; their capability and skills are highly important. She mentions the Royal Air Force, of which the same is true; the fast jets do not fly without skilled people to man them, and we give those people due priority.

We will announce in due course the implications of the review for individual circumstances, which are complex at this stage, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will be relieved as a consequence.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for including me in the consultation process, and I am naturally gratified that some of the recommendations that I, among others, made have found their way into the document. He did not, however, properly answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples): will the carriers in fact be built? They are the only factor that justifies the word "strategic" in relation to the review, which is otherwise a list of fairly intelligent cuts and an exercise in saving money.

[Mr. Alan Clark]

How will the Secretary of State protect himself against the fact that, as soon as the Treasury realises how much equipment and expense will be involved in maintaining a dual-carrier task force—the review is short on detail—it will torpedo the carriers, leaving only the debris of the three services that have been pillaged to pay for them?

Mr. Robertson: I thought, when I made the announcement, that I would have the right hon. Gentleman's support, as I know of his abiding interest in the subject. Every capability in the Ministry of Defence has been examined thoroughly in the review. The balance in the document and in the supporting documents—he may care to read them—leads to clear conclusions about how we should best configure our forces to meet the uncertainties of the new world. That is why we decided to plan for two new carriers to replace the current three.

The costs of the carriers and the aircraft to go on them—decisions are still further down the line—will be considerable, but they will be spread over a long period in both preparation and delivery. It is no intention of the Government to make a proposal and then walk away from it. We are saying in the review what we believe will be right for our country's future and what should be delivered.

Mrs. Anne McGuire (Stirling): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on an inclusive and open process, culminating in the television programme, which was undoubtedly the talk of the steamie throughout Scotland. As a member of the armed forces parliamentary scheme, it struck me as faintly bizarre that we have invested tens of thousands of pounds in technicians who have no transferable pieces of paper to take them into civilian life, and officers who can drive boats and ships across the world but are not qualified to drive a CalMac ferry across the Minch. I welcome the learning forces initiative. Does my right hon. Friend have a time scale in mind for its implementation?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is my own representative in Parliament, and a very fine one, too. I welcome her question. The transferable qualifications that we have proposed that all recruits and existing personnel should aim for are a key component of the review, to help to ensure that we recruit and retain the best people. The learning forces initiative is designed to be implemented as quickly as possible.

I know that my hon. Friend is in the armed forces parliamentary scheme with the Royal Navy, and perhaps I may take the opportunity provided by her question to make a small announcement about the review's implications for our frigates. As the White Paper makes clear, the emphasis is moving away from large-scale maritime warfare and open-ocean operations, and as we have concluded that our force of attack submarines will be reduced from 12 to 10, there will be implications for frigates.

HMS Splendid will pay off in 2003, when she was due for refit. HMS Spartan will have a refit in Rosyth, starting in 1999, but will pay off in 2006, a little earlier than previously planned. Five type 22 frigates based in Devonport will be paid off: in 1999, HMS Boxer, HMS Beaver and HMS London; HMS Brave will be paid off in 2000; and HMS Coventry in 2001, as two new type 23s are brought in. HMS Birmingham—a type 42 destroyer—will pay off as planned in 1999, to be replaced by a new type 23 frigate. It is right that the House should receive that news, not any outside audience.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I must conclude questions on the statement—[Interruption.] Order. Some Members are exasperated that they have been rising for a long time, but have not been called and I sympathise. At 4.15 pm, I said that progress was not to my satisfaction, but hon. Members ignored what I said and continued to put many questions to the Secretary of State, as well as making long statements. To a large extent, the House must discipline itself. I have done my utmost to call hon. Members with direct responsibility for defence establishments in their areas. If there is a debate on the White Paper, I shall see to it that those hon. Members who have taken an inordinate length of time asking questions today do not get priority.

Points of Order

5 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It arises from yesterday's debate, in which the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) sought to intervene on my speech. I initially resisted her intervention. However, I had named the right hon. Lady and intended to give way to her after I had completed that part of my speech. I apologise to the House for any unintended discourtesy on my part. I must reassure the House that I accept unequivocally that it is right and courteous to give way to right hon. and hon. Members whom one has named in a speech and I thank you, Madam Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to advise the House that I intended no discourtesy to it.

Madam Speaker: Thank you.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I accept the hon. Gentleman's apology. Perhaps he should have allowed me the opportunity to right that wrong accusation, but I accept his apology and his endorsement of the convention.

Madam Speaker: I appreciate that. Thank you.

Empty Homes (Value Added Tax)

5.1 pm

Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to reduce Value Added Tax paid on the renovation of long standing empty homes.

The Bill would take a large knife and cut the waste of empty homes, which litter our towns, cities and countryside. Ours is a small island straining to provide enough decent housing for all its inhabitants. With the countryside under threat from development and inner cities in need of regeneration, we have a bewildering and contradictory situation that allows the building of new houses on green-field sites to be exempt from value added tax, yet penalises those refurbishing, converting or saving homes by charging them VAT at the full rate at 17.5 per cent. The Bill would provide a greater incentive to the building industry to bring empty homes back into use by reducing the level of VAT paid on their refurbishment. In doing so, it would help to create a more sustainable house-building policy.

In England and Wales, more than 800,000 homes are empty, and the great bulk of them are in the private sector. When publishing the White Paper, "Planning for the Communities of the Future", my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions announced that the target for building homes on previously developed land would increase from 50 to 60 per cent., which was a welcome move. As we frame a new housing policy, it is vital that we consider how to sustain existing property. Wasted homes that are lying idle could make a significant contribution to the Government's inherited figure of 4.4 million homes being needed—or however many we end up believing we need.

Lowering VAT to 5 per cent. on the renovation and refurbishment of homes that have been empty for more than a year would make that significant contribution to providing for the nation's housing. The Government have stated that they are committed to producing an agenda for sustainable development and, in doing so, have undertaken to consider moving taxation to environmental bads from environmental goods. We saw evidence of that in the vehicle fuel escalator and the reducing of burdens on home energy-saving materials in the recent Budget. Most environmental groups are convinced that the use of empty homes would not only provide a contribution to housing the nation, but save the existing fabric of buildings and reduce toxic greenhouse emissions associated with the manufacture and transportation of materials.

Much has been done to bring empty properties back into use, but it has been led principally by local authorities, often in partnership with housing associations. I was responsible for introducing an empty property strategy on my local council. Within 18 months, we had refurbished 100 empty homes, but the cost had to be transferred to tenants through higher rents. High rents can prove a barrier or a disincentive to low-income families, or to those who want to move from welfare to work. If my Bill had been in place, my council could have renovated 15 more properties. The same is true of many excellent local authority initiatives up and down the country. However, the matter cannot be left to local councils, because most empty properties are in the private sector.

There is proper concern about how we define an empty property in need of refurbishment. My Bill would not provide a loophole for anyone who left home on holiday, returned via a do-it-yourself store and sought a reduction in value added tax. The Bill addresses the 250,000 empty homes of long standing, on which councils all over the country have full information because of the details that they are required to provide from their council tax work. Councils are well placed to issue exemption certificates, as local authority bodies have said. A mechanism is in place for the avoidance of fraud.

The next question is whether the Bill's proposals are achievable under European law. The Government have successfully negotiated a cut in VAT on fuel. They had to work hard for that, and cutting VAT again would require time-consuming and difficult negotiations. However, a modest, sustainable and sensible policy would be better than the ill-conceived and contradictory existing policy that allows barns to be converted and millionaire mansions to be built on green-field sites for social reasons, free of VAT, while local councils have to stump up the full whack when they bring a two-up, two-down terraced house back into use for a family on low pay. The policy is the wrong way round.

I concede that there would be an initial loss of revenue. However, we should not lose sight of the savings that my Bill would bring. Increasing work on empty homes will increase the VAT yield. More work for the construction industry means more national insurance and tax contributions. Lower rents will cut benefit bills, and grants to housing associations could also be reduced.

My Bill does not go far enough. I am constrained by the rules on Bills from promoting all that I would like. I want the Government to create a level playing field for the refurbishment of long-standing empty homes and the building of new homes on green-field sites by harmonising VAT at 5 per cent.—a move which was supported by more than 60 hon. Members on both sides of the House in early-day motion 1467. Harmonisation would yield £200 million a year for the Treasury if 176,000 houses were built. That truly would be a sustainable policy.

The Bill is supported by the Campaign for the Protection of Rural England, the Civic Trust and the Empty Homes Agency, which has done much work and which deserves tribute. Moreover, the Bill has been recommended to the Government by their own advisory panel on sustainable development.

Reducing VAT on refurbishment of long-standing empty properties to 5 per cent. is an important first step towards dealing with the waste that bedevils our community. We inherited an appalling legacy in social housing, with council house repairs running at £20 billion. The Government made a good start by releasing council house receipts, but many families still live in appalling bed-and-breakfast accommodation, which is bad for their health, bad for their children's education and an indictment of society. The indictment is all the greater when houses are waiting for renovation and builders want to do the work.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jonathan Shaw, Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Bill Rammell, Dr. Brian Iddon, Mr. David Chaytor, Mrs. Helen Brinton, Jane Griffiths, Mr. Martin Salter, Mr. Derek Wyatt, Mr. Vernon Coaker and Mr. Brian Sedgemore.

EMPTY HOMES (VALUE ADDED TAX)

Mr. Jonathan Shaw accordingly presented a Bill to reduce Value Added Tax paid on the renovation of long standing empty homes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 6 November, and to be printed [Bill 223].

Orders of the Day

Competition Bill [Lords]

Ordered,

That the Competition Bill [Lords], as amended, be considered in the following Order, namely, Amendments relating to Clauses 1 to 3, Clauses 17 to 19, Schedules 1 to 4, Clauses 4 to 16, Schedule 5, Clauses 20 to 24, Schedule 6, Clauses 25 to 45, Schedule 7, Clauses 46 to 49, Schedule 8, Clauses 50 and 51, Schedule 9, Clauses 52 to 54, Schedule 10, Clause 55, Schedule 11, Clauses 56 to 74, Schedules 12 to 14, Clauses 75 and 76, New Clauses, New Schedules.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Clause 3

EXCLUDED AGREEMENTS

5.10 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 42, at end insert

'or—

(e) resale price maintenance for over-the-counter medicines'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss new clause 4—Exempted goods—

'( ) The Chapter I prohibition does not apply to an agreement relating to the resale price of goods of a class which are the subject of an order made under section 14 of the Resale Prices Act 1976 (exemption of goods by the court).'.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful for this opportunity to speak on amendment No. 2 and comment on the rather good new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), which directly bears on the same problem.

In many of the debates on the Bill, the Opposition have pointed out that one of its unfortunate consequences—which I trust was unforeseen by those who drafted it—will be the closure of many smaller pharmacies. We have continually argued that the Bill makes it more likely that resale price maintenance will have to go. We have had confirmation of that view and various explanations from Ministers in Committee. Ministers would like the nation to believe that the threat comes from Brussels rather than from their actions and legislation. However, we will seek to show that pharmacies are threatened by the Bill and the Government, as well as by the possible threat from Brussels to which Ministers like to refer.

There are some agreed matters in this debate. It is agreed that, if resale price maintenance is abolished, some pharmacies will close. Indeed, Ministers have suggested that hundreds will close. It is common ground for about 170 Labour Members and for Opposition Members that that would be extremely damaging.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Where are they?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend asks where all those Labour Members are. It would be good to have them here expressing concern about their local pharmacies. However, the Whip on duty, who is now going through contortions trying to show that he has a sense of humour, has done a good job of ensuring that there will be no dissent and no expression of opinion or strong views by Labour Members in defence of the pharmacies that they know will close.

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Nigel Griffiths): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can tell us why the Community Pharmacy Action Group does not support the amendments.

Mr. Redwood: I trust that the Minister will restrain his impatience a little, because it will give me great pleasure later in my analysis to take the House through the position of the Community Pharmacy Action Group and its advisers, Lawson Lucas Mendelsohn.

It is agreed that there is a substantial threat of closure, and that it comes from the abolition of resale price maintenance. It is also agreed, I think, that we can go this far in asserting agreement—that some combination of possible Brussels investigation and this legislation will cause the end of resale price maintenance.

The Minister will doubtless say, as he did in Committee, that there is an investigation under the existing system, but he should remember that there have been investigations before. The most recent concluded that the arrangements were in the public interest. If the Bill did not change the law, it would be possible for the retail pharmacies to win their case under existing law and arrangements as they did before, and continue thereafter to benefit from the advantages that resale price maintenance brings them.

It may help the House to remember why RPM is important to pharmacies, and why there are sensible alternatives for customers who rate price above service. This is important, because the typical local or rural pharmacy provides service and advice. That is often expensive. The number of customers may be limited, but they appreciate the whole service—not just the ability to purchase the goods once the right one has been identified. To sustain the considerable costs of this service, there is a system of recommended and maintained prices which enable pharmacies to recoup the costs of providing the full service and advice through a slightly higher margin than would otherwise be the case.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that retail price maintenance would become insignificant if the professional services provided by pharmacists were properly rewarded? Should not the President of the Board of Trade talk to her Cabinet colleagues about getting the Department of Health to pay properly on time, rather than keeping chemists waiting 90 days to pay bills?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman makes an excellent suggestion. It is a pity that the President of the Board of Trade is not present to hear that advice. I trust that her Minister of State or the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs will pass it on. I do not wish to repeat the allegation made outside this House that she is insignificant. She holds an important office of state, and I hope that she will consider that kind suggestion from her allies in government, the Liberals. I associate the official Opposition with the idea that the NHS should pay its bills on time. That would help the cash flow of many small and larger pharmacies.

Pharmacies need something more than the NHS paying its bills on time. They have traditionally enjoyed the protection of slightly higher prices, which provide them with extra money. That has been found to be in the public interest under the law that the Government are trying to replace.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): Given the right hon. Gentleman's comments about the presence of my right hon. and Friends and the powerful case that he is making for community pharmacies, has he wondered where the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) is this afternoon? As the chairman of the Asda supermarket chain, he launched the complaint against resale price maintenance with the restrictive trade practices court. Why is he not here to debate these important matters?

Mr. Redwood: It shows my hon. Friend's strong sense of conflict of interest that he does not wish to be here to make the business case that is firmly held by Asda. He knows that the official Opposition strongly disagree on this occasion with Asda, fine company though it is. We will vote in favour of support for retail pharmacies. I am not a spokesman for my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman). He is wisely not here tonight because he has other important business.

Although the case is now being taken forward by the executive management of Asda and not by my hon. Friend, his absence shows how sensitive he is on this important point. I should have thought that Labour Members would want to give him credit for that, rather than trying to coax him into making a statement that they would doubtless misconstrue against him.

Dr. Ladyman: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his continued patience. I understand the conflict of interest that has been created. Does he have any information about which Lobby the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells will join this evening?

Mr. Redwood: I have already made it clear that I do not speak on this occasion for my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells. I speak for the Opposition, and I am making our position clear. I suggest that we move on to more weighty matters that relate to the future of many of retail pharmacies. [Laughter.]

Many Labour Members think it is amusing and that the only interesting thing is the position of my my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells, who is a fine Member of this House. They should concentrate on what worries their constituents, who are not asking about my hon. Friend's position. They are asking what, if anything, the Government will do to help community pharmacies. Will they tonight, by their inaction and vague statements, sign the death warrant of hundreds of small pharmacies, as I think they will; or will they listen to the urging of the Opposition, and, for a change, do something that might help those businesses?

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: The right hon. Gentleman promised the House that he would answer the question I put to him: why is the Community Pharmacy Action Group not supporting the amendment? It is because it supports us.

Mr. Redwood: Life is not that simple. I must again ask the Minister to contain his impatience. His hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) has been interrupting on less important matters, and I have been extending to him the courtesy of answering his point. The Minister makes a more important point that is worthy of a longer reply, which I shall give at the right point in my argument; but it is right that I first explain the general position: the threat of closures, the sort of services that the pharmacies offer, and why they are important in local communities.

If someone, even in one of those local communities, thinks that price is far more important than service and the branded medicine, that person can travel to the nearest large supermarket and take advantage of the excellent goods sold in, for example, the supermarket that used to be run by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells. There, and in other, rival and equally competitive, supermarkets—I do not wish to recommend any particular supermarket—can be found cheaper medicines, equivalent to the branded goods, sold on price.

We are not trying to stifle choice in the marketplace, or to prevent people from buying cheap medicines if price is important to them, but we think that, in this unique situation—we do not recommend similar measures for other industries—it is worth preserving the system of RPM that has served local communities so well in the past and could do so in future.

The House will want to know how we propose to achieve that. There are two mechanisms on offer, in amendment No. 2 and in new clause 4. The amendment tabled in my name on behalf of the official Opposition does the job in a straightforward way, providing that, if the competition authorities wished to change their minds on the issue, Ministers would have to come back to the House to amend the legislation.

It is an old technique and a democratic one. I know that such things are going out of fashion with the Government, but I recommend it to the House, as it would ensure that the matter would be under democratic control and properly debated. The amendment provides a lock on the door, unless and until a majority party in future wished to change the arrangements. It works simply, by adding to the list of exemptions in clause 3, which sets out the main prohibition regime and exemptions to it.

"resale price maintenance for over-the-counter medicines"

If the House finds the amendment a little too dramatic, because it would clearly do the job, there is an alternative in the form of new clause 4, standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire. If the Government chose to accept that instead of the really strong version, it would enable the Government to continue to exempt those goods

"which are the subject of an order made under section 14 of the Resale Prices Act 1976".

The new clause would preserve the exemption all the time that the court exemption is in existence; and the court would still have to satisfy itself about the particular case. That, too, would receive the blessing of the official Opposition, if that is the best that the Government are prepared to accept in order to get themselves out of the hole of their own making.

Ministers argued in Committee—as doubtless the Minister will argue tonight—that there is no point in taking such action in British law, because Brussels is determined to end the system of RPM, and that we must allow Brussels to have its way. However, instead of leaving it to Brussels to do that, Ministers say that the issue must be examined by the courts here: if the courts find in favour of the current practice, it will go, albeit over some longer period; and if the courts find against it, the courts will impose their own timetable for its removal. It is not much fun for the retail pharmacies fighting the case before the court to know that, either way, they will lose, but there may be some debate about how quickly the system is phased out.

I find it quite extraordinary that the Government take such a view of Brussels as they have done on this subject. In the fine soundbites to which we are often treated, we are told that the Government intend to be influential in Brussels. We are told that, by having made so many concessions to Brussels—on the social chapter and the treaty of Amsterdam, to name but two occasions—they are now in an extremely good position to get all sorts of free gifts back from Brussels.

Therefore, we ask the Minister to put up on this matter, and take a trip to Brussels. So generous am I in this respect that I should be happy to see public expenditure rise by the price of a return air fare to Brussels, if only the Minister could promise me that he would use that trip to insist on a better answer for the British retail pharmacy sector from Brussels.

The Minister must by now have had enough dealings with Brussels to know that, in Brussels, matters are often more in the nature of a negotiation than of a legal construct. Although they have legal form under treaties and court procedures, in practice many matters are settled, not in the normal judicial way as we would understand it, but behind closed doors by bargains between politicians and/or senior officials.

The matter before us is clearly a case in which the Government could use their influence—if they have any—to try to get Brussels to agree that RPM for retail pharmacies in this country is in the public interest, as was found under the previous Government, and that Brussels should recognise that, and not be too crass in its application of competition law.

Dr. Ladyman: Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify his remarks? Is he telling the House that he would prefer, and that we and our community pharmacies should put our trust in a deal struck behind closed doors with civil servants in Brussels, rather than in a British court, the restrictive practices court, and the current arrangements?

Mr. Redwood: No—the hon. Gentleman is being uncharacteristically slow-witted. I have made it clear that I want British parliamentary democracy to settle the issue. As proof that the Government have influence in Brussels—I do not believe they do, but I am always willing to be proved wrong—I want them to go there and tell Brussels to get its tanks off the lawns of our retail pharmacies.

That is a simple proposition, and I am explaining, for the benefit of the Minister, how Brussels works. I am not saying that I approve of that system; I am saying that that is the system, that it is the one within which the Government must work, and that, on this occasion, they should do so in the interests of British democracy—so that we can settle the matter here—and the interests of our constituents, who would clearly like the RPM system to be maintained.

I believe that the Government's influence in Brussels would be greatly strengthened if they accepted either amendment No. 2 or new clause 4—the position would be clearest if the official Opposition's amendment were accepted. They could go to Brussels and say, "That is the will of the whole House of Commons," because not only would they carry with them tonight all the Opposition Members, as far as I know, but they would have all the Government Members' votes, if the Minister asked the Whip to get people to stand on their heads again and vote more in line with their conscience.

The whole House of Commons could be united for once, in defence of a good public service and a good British interest. Surely that would have some sway with those in Brussels when trying to judge both the political mood in this country and how much rope they would have to change our minds for us. Making the amendment would give a strong signal, and I recommend it strongly to the Government.

We know that the United Kingdom authorities are investigating, and I dare say the Minister will say that that cannot be stopped, but there is more chance of that investigation coming to the right conclusion from the pharmacies' point of view if the House clearly expresses its views.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I am not going to argue that that investigation cannot be stopped. I suspect that it could be stopped if the vice-chairman of the Conservative party were persuaded to withdraw the complaint that he lodged on behalf of his company. Will the right hon. Gentleman support me in making such a request?

Mr. Redwood: I am suggesting that the complaint could be stopped by changing the law, which is what is on offer this evening. I have no doubt that I would not be able to persuade the Asda company, which has moved on from the days when my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells was in sole charge and has new executive management, to drop its complaint. The executive board members would meet and say, no, they want to pursue the complaint, because it is in their business interests so to do.

I do not object to that, because I believe in a free society in which people can pursue their legitimate interests. All I ask is that we know where people are coming from, just as the House asks hon. Members to reveal whether they are coming from a particular position in cases where people should be aware of their interest.

I am saying that, on this occasion, we can change the process if we wish by primary legislation. We could do so tonight and that would send a clear signal to the investigating authorities or it could even overturn the investigation itself. The Government have the power to do something if they wish. That is all I am trying to establish at this stage in my argument.

5.30 pm

I shall now deal with the issue that has been the passion of the Under-Secretary—the attitude of the Community Pharmacy Action Group. As he has asked about it, perhaps the House will give me leave to go into some detail about the different positions that it has adopted during the passage of the legislation.

When the Community Pharmacy Action Group first alighted on the issue, it considered it carefully and drafted a comprehensive paper on the changes it thought were needed to the Bill in order to protect the interests of its members. It wrote to Mr. Mark Hickson of the Competition Bill team at the Department of Trade and Industry—I believe that that letter has been circulated to all interested Members.

The action group stated that it was campaigning for the continuance of resale price maintenance on over-the-counter medicines. It said that its response

"seeks to make the case for the retention of RPM on OTC medicines and proposes amendments to the draft Bill that we believe will be necessary if the present agreement is to have any chance of surviving . . . we have made it clear in the submission that our preferred option would be the inclusion in the new Competition Bill of a specific exemption for the present agreement based on contemporary public interest grounds. We have sought to be constructive and hope that you will incorporate this in the final version of the Bill."

I agree with that advice.

I think that the action group was sensible, and I told it so when I was in touch. The group did not tell me or my staff at the time that it was working in conjunction with LLM, the lobby firm. I dealt directly with the action group, and the telephone number that I had was the telephone number of the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. The letterhead made it clear that the Community Pharmacy Action Group was extremely well supported, and that it consisted of the Royal Pharmaceutical Society, the National Pharmaceutical Association, the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee, the Scottish Pharmaceutical General Council, the Company Chemists Association, the Proprietary Articles Trade Association, the British Association of Pharmaceutical Wholesalers, the Proprietary Association of Great Britain, and the Co-operative Pharmacy Technical Panel. The action group led me to believe that it spoke for all those bodies, which in turn spoke for all their members. I believed that it was an extremely wide-ranging and broadly based alliance. I and my office continued to be in touch with the action group through the Royal Pharmaceutical Society.

Today, I received a letter dated 6 July which changed the line that the action group was recommending in some respects, although not as much as the Under-Secretary is suggesting. For example, it says that it is continuing to oppose the action of the European Community on all this. The letter says:

"I have seen the letter from the Commission, and the Community Pharmacy Action Group is appalled at this threat of legal action"— that is, from the Commission.

"The EU appears to be seeking, whether of its own motion or at the request of the OFT is unknown, to interfere in the UK's internal market. The effect of the threat from the Commission is that we have been presented with a choice: fight in the UK courts or in Europe."

The letter goes on to say that it firmly believes that resale price maintenance serves the British public well, particularly those who depend on the local chemist. The action group does not believe that Europe has a role in deciding its future, and would prefer UK to European jurisdiction. At the end of the letter, it says, rather surprisingly, that the action group no longer supports or seeks further amendments to the Bill.

I decided to telephone the action group today to seek clarification on that amazing change of heart from the strong and sensible position that was adopted as long ago as September, and which had continued throughout the Committee stage of the Bill. I was surprised to find that the telephone number under the letterhead of the Community Pharmacy Action Group was that of LLM.

When I asked to speak to the chairman of the action group, I was told that he was not there, but that I could talk to the account executive who was handling the case. I was happy to do so. However, the account executive became rather shy, and said that, since it was me, perhaps it would be better if I continued talking to the chairman with whom I had dealt in the past. As soon as I put down the telephone from the account executive at LLM, I received a telephone call from the chairman, Mr. David Sharpe, trying to explain the change of heart.

I have serious questions for the Under-Secretary in the light of these extraordinary exchanges. I should like to know whether the meetings with the President of the Board of Trade and the Under-Secretary were arranged by LLM. Was LLM present at the meetings.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): The Under-Secretary is not listening.

Mr. Redwood: I do not mind whether or not he is listening. He has some questions to answer and, one way or another, he will have to answer them, for the House and for the benefit of the nation.

Was LLM present at the meetings? Did the Under-Secretary have private meetings or telephone calls with LLM, and did he tell LLM that it would be helpful to get that group of small pharmacies to back off from pursuing what is obviously an embarrassing amendment for the Government? I do not know whether that happened, but we have a right to know whether there were any such conversations or private meetings or telephone calls between the Under-Secretary and LLM on this issue without the client, the Community Pharmacy Action Group, being present.

We should like to know whether there was any sort of deal. We see in the newspapers that lobbyists believe that one can do deals with the Government. Was there a deal? If so, can we please know its terms, so that we can judge whether it was a good deal?

Dr. Ladyman: I wonder what point the right hon. Gentleman is making. Is there not a fraction of possibility that the action group, which has been represented all along by people supporting its interests and helping it to present its case, has considered the facts and concluded that the Government are right and have been right all along? Could it be that the group believes that the Government have been advising it correctly throughout, and has now decided to support the Government's position?

Mr. Redwood: That is a theoretical possibility, but there are many other more interesting ones that are considerably more likely, and I shall explain why.

There is an inaccuracy in the comments of the hon. Member for South Thanet. Mrs. Sharpe, the wife of the chairman of the group, confirmed on the telephone to me this afternoon that she and Mr. Sharp had never informed me or my staff that LLM was involved in the case. I was not aware that that was the position. I prefer to see people directly. I do not like the intermediary of a lobbyist.

I take the view that we are all paid to represent good causes in the House, and that we are the natural channels for a good case. A good case should go directly to the Minister and persuade him, or it should come through me and my hon. Friends or through the constituency Member, so that we can make our judgments about whether it is a good case, which we wish to back without remuneration, or whether it is not a good case, which should be politely referred to someone else, or that those involved should be told that we are not in agreement. That is the purpose of the House. We must make sure that people can get redress for legitimate grievances. I do not like to feel that I have been in any way misled about who is acting for different people, and what sort of game is being played.

I want to get back to the Government's involvement. We need to know how much the Government knew and how they were able to persuade either the advisers or the Community Pharmacy Action Group, or both, that this was not the appropriate way to proceed.

The letter from the action group, and my subsequent discussions with it, have made it clear that something changed, and that it came to believe that Brussels would pursue this case even if the United Kingdom protected the position in legislation. That is not a new fact. I have known that that was a possibility for months, ever since I began handling this Bill. I believe that the Under-Secretary made that clear in his defence of the Government's position in Committee.

The Under-Secretary has not suddenly come to the view that Brussels might take this up independently. It has been a well-known threat for a long time. All my planning to help the community pharmacies, which I wish to do, has been predicated on the fact that Brussels could interfere. I have constantly urged the Government to take Brussels seriously, and to go there to try to sort it out.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: The letter to which the right hon. Gentleman refers specifically says that the author, David Sharp, has seen the letter from the Commission. That is the letter of 8 May, which I believe changed things. Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the letter because it has been available?

Mr. Redwood: That letter certainly did not change my view because, since last year, when I first examined the Bill, I have of course been aware that Brussels might well pursue the case separately, or that there could be separate complaints to Brussels.

I thought that the aim of the Bill was to sort out double jeopardy. We have been telling Ministers that it will be very difficult to do so, and, as the Under-Secretary will remember, I have been urging the Government to go to Brussels expressly to sort out that point. It is clear from his attitude tonight that he has not done so. He is not about to say, "The right hon. Gentleman is wasting his breath, because I have solved the problem. I have been to Brussels, and there is agreement that Britain should be able to settle this issue in the interests of retail pharmacists by maintaining resale price maintenance."

The Government have given us fine words, saying that they support small pharmacists, as do the rest of us, that RPM would help, and that some pharmacists will close if it is not maintained. However, they say to the pharmacists, "Pity us, because wicked Brussels will sort out the problem in a way that we do not want, so you should back off and not embarrass us in the House by backing amendments that would solve your problem."

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be interesting to know also what conversations between the Minister, his colleagues and the Commission preceded the emission of the letter from the Commission? It would be interesting to know precisely what requests were or were not made to the Commission, formally or informally, for assistance to get the Government off the hook by issuing such a letter, which was, as my right hon. Friend has pointed out, always a possibility. Should not the Minister give us a travelogue to make it clear exactly what contact he had?

Mr. Redwood: As always, my hon. Friend has put his finger on an extremely important point. It is possible that the Under-Secretary went to Brussels and implied that it would be very helpful to Britain if such a letter were written, because it would get him off the hook and avoid a potential large Government Back-Bench rebellion. He clearly has a vested interest in trying to explain to his hon. Friends and the nation that he has no power to do anything, that he is only the Minister and cannot be expected to sort out the problem, and that it is all the fault of Brussels. Now that he has a letter, he is able, directly or with the help of friends—perhaps another part of the magic crony circle is at work—to get decent people to back off because the Government are misinforming them about the true state of play of the relative powers of the House and Brussels.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I want the Minister to have the full question put to him. Although my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) was very forensic, he did not mention that, when deals are done for the Department of Trade and Industry in Brussels or anywhere else, they are normally conducted by people from the Treasury or No. 10, or possibly by "Tony's cronies". We ought to know exactly who, if anybody, has been to the Commission to ask about these matters.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and he has enlarged the question in a way that will further embarrass the Government.

We should like to know more about the web of influence and lobbyism that seems to have been working. Perhaps we have here the first case of cash for no influence. This might be the first case of a group being asked to pay money to a lobby group only to be told that it should obey the Government and not influence them for the better. I feel rather sorry for those who thought that their interests were being looked after, who now find that that is not being done properly in the way that they would expect. We need to know rather more about their change of heart.

Suffice it to say that Her Majesty's Opposition—and, I trust, other Opposition Members—wish to give proper support to community pharmacists. This is a problem which the Government could solve by using British law if they wanted to. Ministers should go to Brussels and argue the case for our businesses and the services in our communities, instead of using Brussels in an attempt to stifle a Back-Bench rebellion that would be very embarrassing for them.

The Government should understand that community pharmacies in this country, as Health Ministers recognise, provide an extremely important service, which is now at risk, not just because of Brussels, but because of the Government's actions and inactions. There are many questions that the Under-Secretary should answer before we finish the debate.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): This argument is not new. There is no division in the House about the wish to help retail pharmacies and maintain them in their role, which is invaluable to the communities they serve. At issue are the two approaches to safeguarding their position.

The approach outlined by the Government is to let the appeal to the Office of Fair Trading continue because, if it is successful, the Bill will allow the agreement to be maintained for five years. The appeal is highly likely to be successful, given that the Office of Fair Trading has previously adjudicated on the agreement and found it to be in the public interest. The proposed line would protect retail pharmacies' position for about five years, during which they could adjust to the new climate imposed by Brussels and the Bill.

5.45 pm

The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), however, proposes to hard-wire into the Bill perpetual protection for resale price maintenance for retail pharmacies. He tabled the amendment knowing that it is in breach of, or counter to, the principles of the legislation—articles 85 and 86—with which the Bill harmonises UK law. It is known also that the only outcome of pursuing the right hon. Gentleman's approach is that, if it were successful, Brussels would take over, investigate and, very likely, decide that resale price maintenance should be stopped. The pharmaceutical industry would then be in far greater jeopardy than if the Government's course were followed.

We came to the nub of the issue in the right hon. Gentleman's winding up. He is challenging the Government to go to Brussels and demand that the law is changed, knowing very well what the answer would be. What marks out the true obsessive is that, whatever the issue, he returns to the point of obsession, which in the right hon. Gentleman's case is Europe. We realise the true nature of the Opposition: the amendment has nothing to do with helping retail pharmacies; it is an attempt, yet again, to stage a confrontation with Europe to demonstrate the likely infringement of the sovereignty of British law. We have heard that case before and it is being rehearsed in exactly the same form tonight.

At issue is an attempt to dupe the retail pharmacies.

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Gentleman explain what is wrong with the idea of Ministers going to Brussels to try to achieve a sensible exemption for a British industry that will otherwise be damaged?

Mr. Beard: What is wrong is that the right hon. Gentleman knows that that is inconsistent with the Brussels legislation under which the Bill falls. The Bill tries to harmonise British legislation with that of Brussels so that—this is the precise point that the right hon. Gentleman made earlier—companies will not face double jeopardy and the uncertainties and expense of two legislative regimes. The right hon. Gentleman knows that, and all the legal advice that he has been given must have told him that, yet he persists with his amendment, knowing that it could lead only to a confrontation that cannot be won.

Retail pharmacies would be damaged by the amendment, and if they adopted the right hon. Gentleman as a friend they would have a false friend. However, they are more sensible, which is why they sent the right hon. Gentleman the letter he read out earlier. They will not be duped by this attempt to use them to stage a stunt that goes against Brussels and highlights the issue of European legislation and British sovereignty. I am thankful that the pharmaceutical industry has more sense than to listen to Opposition Members.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to support amendment No. 2 and to speak to new clause 4, which stands in my name.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) was right to emphasise the desirability of basing one's arguments, in the first instance, on what may be learned by talking to community pharmacists. As members of the Committee know, I was at pains to talk to staff of community pharmacies in my constituency and I instanced one in particular, in the village of Gamlingay.

The pharmacy in Gamlingay fully illustrates the predicament of community pharmacies. They often have a limited catchment area that does not give them a very high rate of return, but instrumental in that rate of return is the mark-up they are able to achieve on over-the-counter medicines, given their difficulty—to which the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) rightly drew attention—in securing an adequate rate of return on the provision of prescription medicines and the valuable advice service that pharmacists provide.

In the example I offered, the pharmacist gave 15 consultations a day. Each of those 15 consultations would have resulted in a general practice consultation but for the presence of a pharmacist. It is the only opportunity many people in the village have to access to a local pharmacy. The suggested alternative of a visit to a large, multiple superstore is not available within seven or eight miles.

There is every reason, therefore, to support community pharmacies. I understand from our debate in Committee that support for community pharmacies is not confined to the Opposition; Labour Members' support is evident. I shall not detain the House by quoting them, but Second Reading speeches by the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) and others gave particular support to community pharmacies.

The question is whether, in Committee, and especially in relation to the schedule introduced by the Under-Secretary to provide for new transitional provisions, the Government have provided the protection the House seeks for community pharmacies and for resale price maintenance on over-the-counter medicines in the long run. I say "in the long run" because it seems to me that when the other place made amendments and they were, initially, considered by the Committee, what was proposed presented a problem.

At that stage, the case before the restrictive trade practices court would have been stayed and there would have been an accusation to be made to the Commission. This is at the heart of the problem. There would have been an accusation to be made to the Commission that the case had not been considered on its merits, including the public interest and general public health interests additional to the competition considerations; that the legislation had simply obviated—circumvented—proper consideration of those issues; and that, therefore, the Commission should take it upon itself to consider the issues.

For that reason, it was probably right for the amendments made in another place to be overturned in Committee and to be substituted by measures designed to give direct effect in the Bill to the House's intention to support resale price maintenance on over-the-counter medicines. However, the Government have gone about it in a way that has limitations, which were clear in Committee. Although the Government rest upon the question of the court considering the issue, if the court considers the issue and concludes that resale price maintenance does not act against the public interest, a protection is built into the Bill—a protection, through transitional provisions, for five years. However, there is no provision in the schedule to extend the transitional period further.

That brings us back to the letter that the Under-Secretary was at pains to speak about, and on which my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham rightly responded. The letter from the Community Pharmacy Action Group illustrates the point. The CPAG has been presented with two unpalatable options. The more unpalatable of the two is that the court goes ahead and comes to a conclusion without Government support for community pharmacies before the court—or, indeed, without the Government going to the Commission and saying, "You should rest on the court's decision". On the other hand, the action group is told, "Do not press the amendments; do not look for anything else; do not embarrass the Government on Report. Say that the Government have done what is required, and you will get Government support"—presumably by way of evidence, or whatever, before the restrictive trade practices court—"and you will subsequently benefit from the five-year transitional provision."

I say that with the evidence that, in the letter referred to, Mr. David Sharpe, chairman of the CPAG, says:

> "On the understanding that the Government will continue to support retaining the network of community pharmacies, we will not seek further amendments to the Bill".

When the Under-Secretary replies to the debate, will he tell us the meaning of the phrase,

> "On the understanding that the Government will continue to support retaining the network of community pharmacies"?

That is the key question.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. Does he agree that the Under-Secretary would be more convincing if he published the letter or evidence that he sent to Brussels in defence of our pharmacists before he received the letter giving him a rather dusty answer, and if he published the evidence that he intends to give the court, also defending our pharmacies?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. I hope that the Under-Secretary takes up that challenge; it would be very enlightening if he did.

However, the response from the Commission—the Under-Secretary may interrupt me if I am wrong—referred to on 8 May, is essentially about whether the Commission would intervene if the legislation were amended, as happened in another place, to stay proceedings before the restrictive trade practices court. That is not the question before us now, which is: will the Commission seek to intervene if the House legislates on the basis of resting on the decision of the restrictive trade practices court?

The view that the Under-Secretary expressed in Committee was pretty clear on that point. He said:

"I reached the conclusion . . . that the Commission is looking to the restrictive practices court to examine the evidence and to make a ruling."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 23 June 1998; c. 608.]

That is in the context of a conclusion reached by Richard Whish, an eminent competition lawyer, that the Commission is capable of taking into account general public health interests in its examination of a case under article 85 of the treaty on European Union. The proposition seems to be, therefore, that the Commission would be able to rest upon the public interest test applied by the restrictive trade practices court and, on that basis, not pursue an article 85 investigation if that court concluded that RPM was not acting against the public interest.

That brings us back to amendment No. 2 and new clause 4. They differ from what the Government propose in the following important respect. The Government are proposing that community pharmacies should be protected for five years. I do not understand it to be the intention of the House that community pharmacies should be given a stay of execution. My understanding of the debate, including the contributions made on Second Reading and in Committee by Labour Members, was that we had concluded that, subject to an examination of the evidence by the court, there was a belief in the House that the process of resale price maintenance on over-the-counter medicines acted in the public interest—that it was not necessarily anti-competitive in any case, but that, in addition, it was justified on general public interest grounds. We had concluded that, if we moved to an article 85-style or chapter 1 prohibition-style investigation, the narrower gateway—moving from a public interest examination to a simply competition examination without taking broader public interest criteria into account in this instance—might well lead to a narrower conclusion that was prejudicial to community pharmacies. We concluded that that was undesirable. The House therefore wished to move toward protection for community pharmacies and to vest that in the legislation.

The Government are offering only five years' protection, but the wish of the House is to go further. Devices are available to achieve that: amendment No. 2 and new clause 4 would be perfectly adequate for the purpose. The proposition before the House is that we should not limit the protection of community pharmacies by a stay of execution but should rest on the court's decision that RPM on over-the-counter medicines is not against the public interest. I hope that the Government will respond positively to the amendment and the new clause.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): I shall expand on the points that were made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard). The amendment's stated aim, which was outlined by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is to protect community pharmacies. It is interesting to note that there seems to be a slight split in the Tory party in that there are alternative proposals, but I shall pass over that. As I understand it, the amendment also aims to ensure that resale price maintenance continues for ever. As my hon. Friend said, it has several aims. One is to distract attention from the unfortunate fact that in a former life the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) initiated the attack on RPM.

Until the Bill started its passage through Parliament, the Tories took no action to protect pharmacies. An early-day motion has been widely cited, but that is a two-edged sword because I understand that although only three Conservative Members signed it, the Conservative party now says that it is wonderful and does not go far enough.

The reason for the smokescreen was evident in the speech made by the right hon. Member for Wokingham: the amendment is an opportunity for yet further Euro-bashing. The constant talk about Brussels is revealing. It is as if Europe is over there in Brussels and not a community of which we are a part. To speak about Europe as if it were separate is ridiculous and demonstrates a certain mind set. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his ingenuity in dragging the issue of lobbying into the debate.

Mr. Redwood: Amendment No. 2 does not seek anything in perpetuity. Parliament can change its mind and change legislation at the drop of a hat if there is a will to do that, and that freedom is in my amendment. New clause 4, which my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) has tabled, would allow the court to come to a different judgment at some future time. There is no split between us, and we are aware that we would need Labour votes to pass either. We offer Labour Members a choice and we would be happy with either. The hon. Lady spoke about the early-day motion. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I voted for its wording on Second Reading—and we should have liked Labour Members to join us on that.

Dr. Starkey: I accept the correction: of course Parliament can undo what it has done and, to that extent, nothing need continue for ever. I dissent from the right hon. Gentleman's analysis of the effect of the amendment and the new clause. They would expose RPM to abolition by the Commission within years, whereas the Government proposals give at least five years of protection.

Another point that has arisen in the debate was also made in Committee. The Opposition have made great play about being the protectors of community pharmacies, but they have slightly narrowed the definition of such pharmacies. Judging from how they speak about them, they have been recruited to their rather spurious notion of country life and occur only in the countryside. I appreciate that such pharmacies are incredibly important to rural communities, but they are also important to urban communities, and the dichotomy between supermarkets and independent pharmacies is not quite as strong as the Opposition make out.

[Dr. Starkey]

In my constituency, some small pharmacies are independent and others are branches of a large national chain. There is also an excellent pharmacy inside a Tesco supermarket. It is extremely active in co-operating with local GPs and has run health education campaigns on asthma, diabetes, antenatal care and emergency contraception services.

There is no argument between us about the need for an extensive network of pharmacies in all communities; I merely ask the Opposition to accept that community pharmacies are not simply small independent ones. Pharmacies serve all sorts of communities and include those in large supermarkets as well as the independents. I look forward to the Government's plans to ensure that all pharmacists, whether they are independent, in community pharmacies or in shops or supermarkets, are used more effectively. However, I do not think that such a debate should form part of the discussion on this part of the Bill.

The Opposition are engaging in a cynical exercise. Under the guise of the protection of community pharmacies, they are addressing an entirely academic point. They know that their amendment would provoke the end of RPM, although they say that they are trying to protect it.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): I shall not reiterate what has been said because I agree with much on both sides of the argument. We all support community pharmacists, large or small, urban or rural, and we want them to be able to function with some security. The people who use them should have access to them not just for the next five years, but beyond. The proposals that we are debating will lead to a lack of security. If resale price maintenance fails the public interest test, that could be the end of many community pharmacists. The alternative is a five-year stay of execution.

We would have more sympathy for the Government's proposals if, during the five years, they offered an opportunity to look at ways in which to fund pharmacists and provide them with security. However, after five years, pharmacists will be left to the marketplace, and that would not provide the security that they seek or leave the communities that they serve with the feeling that such pharmacies will remain.

If the five-year transition period were used positively to prepare plans for the funding of pharmacists, that might enable us to support the proposal. Pharmacists in my constituency feel that convenient access to medicines for people who have been to their doctors is a vital part of primary health care. It is an anomaly of the health care system that that one part is not included in health care operations. That is because we regard pharmacists as small chemists and take the view that resale price maintenance is the best and only way to fund them. Many pharmacists feel that their qualifications and experience, and the valued support that they provide to GPs by way of health education and even diagnosis are worth more than just the protection of RPM on over-the-counter medicines. They should be considered as part of primary health care.

Resale price maintenance has served pharmacists and their communities well. We will support the amendment because it would ensure, at least in the short term, the continuance of RPM and, therefore, the protection of pharmacists. RPM will be under constant commercial attack, and those challenges may be the pathfinders for many more. Such insecurity may prompt some pharmacists to give up. Pharmacists who are thinking of retiring in the not-too-distant future may be feeling fearful about their ability to sell their businesses. Pharmacists who have received their qualifications and are looking for new opportunities may feel distinctly uncomfortable about taking on positions in small chemist shops that may be under threat in only a few years.

That insecurity is the reason for this debate. Although the Minister has provided good protection for a short period of years, if it is needed, he has not looked in the long term—at the long-term provision of pharmacists and access to them, which is at the heart of what we are looking for. On this occasion, we support the Opposition amendment.

Mr. Redwood: I hope that the Liberal Democrat party will make it clear how it wishes to help the pharmacists, if it does not wish to support either the amendment or new clause tonight. We think that they are the best way in which to do it.

Mr. Breed: I did say that we would support the Opposition's amendment as I was about to sit down.

Mr. Letwin: I want to discuss the substantive issue—community pharmacies—and move to an issue of much wider significance, which arose from the exchange between my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs, where matters have reached a serious pitch.

In common, I suspect, with many hon. Members on both sides of the House and certainly with many of the Liberal Democrat Members who are present, I represent a seat that is perhaps the archetype of the problem. It is inconceivable that there should be available in the smaller towns of West Dorset sufficiently elaborate national health service provision to meet all the needs of the ordinary citizen, who is often unable to move around easily because of necessarily limited rural transport. The Government's persistent attack on rural transport by car through short-sighted actions with environmental aims has limited it even more. It is of the essence that such citizens in West Dorset should have available to them what has been available to them for a long time, and will, if the amendment is passed, continue to be available to them—access to a rural pharmacy. That will not continue to be available for much longer if the amendment is not passed.

Our pharmacies in West Dorset depend on the amendment. I speak not speculatively, but on the basis of intensive discussions with each of the principal rural pharmacies in each of the smaller towns in my constituency, of which there are not very many; it is possible to cover them all because their number is small. The number of villages is, of course, great and, again, that is an archetype. There are some 55 larger villages in West Dorset, each clustered around the towns. They, too, depend on the rural pharmacist. In discussions with rural pharmacists—in many cases, I have gone to the trouble of asking them specific questions about their turnover, margins and current profitability—it has become clear that their existence depends on resale price maintenance or some equivalent.

I thought that the interjection of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham during the remarks of the hon. Member for South–East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), who spoke for the Liberal Democrats, was highly pertinent. It is possible to imagine—it has always been possible to imagine—that the Government would seek to introduce alternative means of supporting rural pharmacies. There may even be, theoretically, preferable alternate means of supporting such pharmacies.

I have a worry, which I suspect is shared by many hon. Members who represent seats such as mine, which is not a theoretical worry; it is substantive, practical and based on a knowledge that I suspect all hon. Members have of how Government and, in particular, the Treasury, under any Administration, work. If grants, subsidies or special arrangements are introduced to support a particular cause when there is a ferment about that cause—this would be one such case, potentially—they are always a soft target for any Chief Secretary to the Treasury when he comes in the spending round to look at what might be eliminated.

For all the dangers that the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall pointed out, resale price maintenance has at least persisted for a long time and is difficult to dislodge, because it requires action in the courts and may take time. At least that system is not as likely to suffer from the vicissitudes of the attentions of a Chief Secretary which, alas, can quickly be brought to bear on any grant system.

6.15 pm

Essentially, if the amendment is not passed, the access of many of my constituents to what is effectively the only source of help and advice available to them other than GPs, many of whom they find it difficult to reach on many occasions, will depend on the hope that the Government will introduce an as yet unknown mechanism—there is no certainty that they will do so—and that no future Chief Secretary will remove the mechanism.

There is a ready remedy, which is to extend the provision of NHS services in rural areas. That takes us way outside the scope of the amendment and anything, I suspect, that the Government are willing to guarantee. The costs of doing that vastly exceed the economic cost of resale price maintenance in this sector.

That point is of great interest. I was, alas, unable to continue as a member of the Committee during the stages when these matters were considered, but I have had the opportunity to read the official record. I find to my intense surprise that the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs has not brought forward any analysis of the economic cost of continuing with resale price maintenance for rural pharmacies. There is a good reason why he has not. It is extremely difficult to identify a significant economic cost in that case.

If one looks at the cost of providing alternative NHS services, the economic and, in particular, fiscal gain of having these pharmacies is fairly easy to ascertain. A cost-benefit analysis of the amendment, so to speak, could easily identify the costs of not having the amendment, but trying to identify the benefits of not having the amendment—the economic gain to the country from abolishing RPM—is quite a task.

Alas, we discovered at a much earlier stage in the proceedings of the Committee that the President of the Board of Trade had conducted a compliance cost assessment that was probably wrong by some magnitude. Therefore, it is not surprising that the Minister has been reluctant to conduct any economic analysis in this particular case, but, if he had done, he would probably have found that the figures would have worked against him.

This is a remarkable case. We have a system, which is theoretically imperfect, but nevertheless produces what I think is by universal accord a practically beneficial result, with probably a low economic cost—it has certainly not been ascertained—almost certainly a high fiscal gain and hence an economic gain. There is no certainty about any replacement and there is an extreme danger that, if there were to be a replacement, it would come under attack from a future Chief Secretary.

That chain of argument suggests that there is a strong reason for seeking to retain the ability for this industry to engage in resale price maintenance. That is the substance of the matter. In rising, my main intention was not to address that issue.

Mr. Lansley: Before my hon. Friend moves on to a separate argument, does he agree that, in this respect, it is not so much the compliance cost assessment that is the mechanism through which the Government should assess what the costs and benefits of proceeding through legislation are, but the regulatory appraisal? While he was speaking, I have taken the opportunity to look at the regulatory appraisal and it is silent on the issue of the economic costs and benefits that might result from the abolition of a number of pharmacies as a result of the Bill.

Mr. Letwin: It was one of the abiding sadnesses of being removed from the Committee that I was no longer able to benefit from the shafts of wisdom that my hon. Friend so often cast on aspects of the Bill. He is right to remind me that it is not the compliance cost assessment, but the regulatory appraisal that should have contained the information. To say that the regulatory appraisal is silent on this issue is, in the now immortal words of Mr. Draper, the understatement of the century. The regulatory appraisal is silent on almost every issue. It is a document of such extreme gnomic quality that it is rather like the holy Roman empire, which was neither holy nor Roman nor an empire. The regulatory appraisal is to do neither with regulation nor with appraisal; it is a piece of paper. However, it would have been possible for the Under-Secretary to produce a serious analysis in Committee, had he wished to do so. I have no doubt that he did not do so because he would not have liked the results.

Mr. Redwood: Will my hon. Friend also think about the plight of the retail pharmacist? He will also need reassurance from the Government that the complicated arrangements to remunerate him for his NHS work will not fall foul of the Bill. Presumably, the Government will have to make use of the public policy provision or the general economic service provisions to exempt retail pharmacists. Would not it be helpful to the pharmacists to be reassured at least about one of their strands of income? Otherwise, they might find that all their income was under threat from the Bill.

Mr. Letwin: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. He will recall, as I do very poignantly, that both the

[Mr. Letwin]

Under-Secretary and the Minister were wholly unable to deliver to the Committee the slightest remnant of a definition of general economic service that would illuminate the question whether that point would actually apply. Manifestly, there are serious issues about whether the Bill will allow provisions to be made to support rural pharmacies. That has wider implications because it is not just rural pharmacies or even pharmacies generally with which we are concerned; it is the general principle of whether a Competition Bill ought simply to take into account the narrow focus of industrial economics, or whether some kind of social cost or social benefit—especially when there are fiscal consequences—should be taken into account.

I come now to the major topic that I want to discuss. I am afraid that I shall make a very grave accusation. I hope that it can be rebutted; I hope that the Under-Secretary will produce evidence to show that I am wrong. No one would be happier than I to withdraw my accusation, in an open and fulsome way, if it turns out that it is false. My accusation has to do with the character of government. It is raised, in particular, by the response to this amendment and by the interchange between my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham and the Under-Secretary earlier.

I begin with a question. What was the treaty base upon which the Commission was operating when it produced the letter to which the Under-Secretary referred? I stand open to correction. The hon. Gentleman has vast legal resources at his command, while mine are negligible. It may be that I am, therefore, wholly misled, but I imagine that the treaty base was article 85—subject to the Under-Secretary's correction. I should be grateful if he would save me and himself from further embarrassment, and intervene at any stage of my argument if he feels that something that I am saying is incorrect.

Article 85 is very clear, unlike its transposition into English law in the Bill, which is very unclear. It states in its first clause:

"The following shall be prohibited as incompatible with the common market: all agreements between undertakings, decisions by associations of undertakings and concerted practices"—

I have not the slightest doubt that resale price maintenance falls into those categories—

"which may affect trade between Member States."

Alas, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you were not the Chairman of our Committee. Those who were present during our sittings will remember that on many occasions during the deliberations of the Committee—and I find on reading the Official Report that this persisted beyond the time when I ceased to be a member—points were made about the contrast between the specific clause and its transposition into UK law in the Bill. We frequently pointed out the clarity of the statement in article 85 and the fact that it made it clear that the Commission, in applying the article, was to restrict itself to those sorts of action that affected interstate trade. We drew attention to the difference between that and the lack of clarity about the Commission's scope for action within the United Kingdom.

"which may affect trade between Member States"

The Under-Secretary and the Minister had ample opportunity to challenge us on that point in Committee. They had ample opportunity to say that they or their legal advisers thought that we were misinterpreting article 85. In short, they had ample opportunity to tell us that article 85 was not restricted to interstate trade. However, I would have found it odd if they had said that because if we look back through the legislative history of article 85 to the early writings of Monnet and Schuman on the origins of the competition sections of the treaty of Rome, it is clear that in the minds of those who formed the treaty, it should restrict itself—admirably to my mind, and, I suspect, that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham—to interstate trade.

Mr. Redwood: The two Ministers, both by their silence throughout my hon. Friend's remarks and by what they said in Committee, have to accept that the treaty is about interstate trade. That is why we are debating a law for Britain to deal with intrastate trade. The treaty does not directly act on intrastate trade—if it did, we would not need all this rigmarole tonight and we could just let Brussels get on with it.

Mr. Letwin: One of the annoyances of dealing with a Bill on which my right hon. Friend leads is that he is inevitably one and a half steps ahead of me. He precisely anticipates the next leg of my argument. It is not simply that we would have been surprised if the Under-Secretary or the Minister had told us that article 85 applied more widely than to interstate trade—had they done so, we would have told them that the Bill was not required as it would not be necessary to have the prohibition if it already existed and applied to intrastate trade. Therefore, it must be the case that Ministers accept that article 85 does not provide a treaty base for intervention by the Commission in matters such as resale price maintenance, unless the Commission can satisfy itself that the practice concerned

"may affect trade between Member States."

This is where I have to make a grave accusation. If the Commission were to satisfy itself that resale price maintenance in pharmacies—and I think in particular of rural pharmacies—in this country might affect "trade between Member States", the Commission would have to be on some sort of elaborate hallucinogenic drug. I cannot think of a single reason why RPM, desirable or undesirable as hon. Members may think it to be, between the suppliers and a pharmacy in, for example, Beaminster in my constituency,

"may affect trade between Member States."

I cannot imagine that the pharmacist in Beaminster spends much time shopping around for arbitrage possibilities in buying his supplies from a wide range of European suppliers. I cannot suppose that he much affects the balance of trade between member states. It would require the most extraordinarily tenuous logic for the Commission to have argued to itself convincingly—or to be able to argue to anyone else convincingly—that RMP, in this particular case,

"may affect trade between Member States."

The Under-Secretary has already had, and will again have in his reply, the opportunity to challenge each leg of my argument. I hope that he will tell me that I am wrong about article 85 being the supposed treaty base. I hope that if he cannot tell us that, he will tell me that I am wrong to suppose that there is no good argument for supposing that such resale price maintenance

"may affect trade between Member States".

However, if he cannot say either of those things, we have to ask why the Commission wrote that letter.

I genuinely believe—again I make it abundantly clear that, if I am wrong, I should be happy to be disproved by evidence to the contrary—that the Commission wrote the letter because someone in the United Kingdom Government, acting via the agencies of the UK Government in Brussels—presumably the UK permanent representative in Brussels—made it known by formal or informal means to the Commission that it would be helpful to the UK Government if the Commission wrote that letter and told, or suggested or half-hinted to, the Commission that it did not too much matter whether there was a treaty base for the letter and that, in the meanwhile, a letter might solve a parliamentary problem. Moreover, it may have been suggested that if the letter did solve that problem, there would, regardless, be UK legislation preventing such resale price maintenance. Therefore, the Commission, having written the letter, would never be subject to legal challenge, as the letter would never become an effective one. I repeat that I should be happy to have those assertions disproved. However, if proved, they are very grave.

6.30 pm

Mr. Redwood: I fear that my hon. Friend may be on to something, that there is a pattern and that the Government may be hoping to avoid embarrassment—and not only in this case. Has he thought about the recent allegations on the "Panorama" programme—that Mercedes and Volkswagen are arranging their prices in the United Kingdom in an anti-competitive manner? Is he aware that the Government have said that they want nothing to do with that, but would rather that Brussels investigated the whole matter on their behalf? Is it not another case in which Ministers seem to wish not to take responsibility for anything in United Kingdom competition competence?

Mr. Letwin: I agree with my right hon. Friend that it may be part of a pattern. It is a bad pattern if it is an overt one. It is bad because the United Kingdom Government should not rely on the Commission to take action on matters in which—for UK policy reasons, especially when the Government agree with the action—the Government not only have the capacity to act, but should be acting. My right hon. Friend's example of the automobile industry is pertinent.

I regret to say that, in this debate, we may be dealing with something that is far worse and far more insidious—a covert attempt to have the Commission do the Government's work. Moreover, it would be a covert attempt by the Government to have the Commission do a piece of political work for them. If that is what has happened, it would be an attempt by the Government to have the Commission spare the Government a political embarrassment because of a division within the Labour party's own ranks. That is not a way in which it would be reasonable or decent for the Government to use the Commission.

Mr. Beard: Does the hon. Gentleman have a shred of evidence for that conspiracy theory?

Mr. Letwin: I have been at pains—I do not want to be irresponsible—to point out that every leg of my argument is something that I believe may be the case, but is open to rebuttal. I have suggested to the Minister that, by intervention or in reply, he can rebut any part of the argument. If he does so, I shall fulsomely withdraw. I am making an allegation for which I realise I currently have no proof. However, the Minister has so far been notably silent. I hope that, in his reply, he will challenge one or another part of the argument. I make the accusation not recklessly, but because I cannot myself find another explanation for a letter that seems to be based on so thin a treaty basis.

Mr. Beard: Is not the nature of reckless allegation such that it has absolutely no evidence behind it?

Mr. Letwin: No, it is not. It is the purpose of Parliament to expose arguments and to have answers. I think that it is a reasonable proceeding for an hon. Member conscientiously to make an argument that would have a devastating effect if it were true, to pose it for the Minister and to allow the Minister there and then to refute it. It would, of course, not be reasonable for me to repeat the allegation if the Minister had disproved it. However, the allegation has to be answered.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is generous in giving way again. If he was wrong, should not Ministers have leapt to their feet and produced evidence that they have been trying to lobby Brussels in the right direction rather than the wrong one?

Mr. Letwin: Again, my right hon. Friend takes me to the next leg of my argument. It will not be enough for the Government to establish that they did not engage in the piece of shady dealing that I am alleging that they might have engaged in and that I am asking the Minister to disprove. They will have to show that they tried to avoid production of the letter, because it is ill-based on treaty—unless they can show that the Commission is not basing it on article 85. If the letter is ill-based, and if many hon. Members agree that it would have a bad effect on an important part of our social fabric, which they do, it behoves the United Kingdom Government to argue the case against the letter, and then to take their own domestic action.

Mr. Lansley: I am following my hon. Friend's comments with interest, and realise that he is arguing from circumstantial evidence. Will he add to that circumstantial evidence the fact that the Minister parades a letter—which he says is dated 8 May—that was, presumably fortuitously or coincidentally, received by Ministers before Second Reading, on 11 May? Therefore, the proposition that the letter was related to the Government's pursuit of the legislation's passage is not an idle point, but is backed by circumstantial evidence.

Mr. Letwin: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that the circumstantial evidence is, if not compelling, quite considerable. His point about the timing makes it all the greater.

The problem goes one stage deeper. We are dealing not merely with the possibility—I admit it to be a possibility rather than a certainty—that the Government covertly prayed in aid the Commission to issue a letter on a frail treaty basis that, if it were true, would have undermined the whole of the Government's logic in their Bill. The Government have also brought pressure to bear through a lobbyist, who is intimately—as we now fortuitously discover—connected with the Government, upon a group of people who should, at least in my view, be representing those whom they purport to represent and who should be making that argument.

We have reached the point at which there is a connection between the first and second legs of my remarks. If the case for maintenance of RPM were not so very strong substantively, one could well understand that representatives of rural pharmacies might have been in two minds on the subject and might have been wavering between results. One could also understand those representatives taking their own view on the matter. One might also understand that they might have been influenced by a letter, however frail, from the Commission.

However, when a substantive case for retention of RPM for rural pharmacies is not only in itself so strong but—as so many hon. Members on both sides of the House know—is also felt to be so strong by very many or, I speculate, almost all, of those whom that body is meant to be representing; when the letter in question is based on a treaty basis that is so frail; and when the Government must have known how frail the basis was—or they would not have introduced the Bill in its current form, as they would have had to take the view that article 85 had a scope wider than merely interstate trade—one is driven to the conclusion that it must have been by heavy-armed tactics that the Government used the offices of that lobbyist to persuade that group of representatives to change their minds in the light of the letter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the beginning of my rather—I regret to say—over-lengthy speech, I said to your predecessor in the Chair that I had a grave accusation to make. I have made it in good faith—[Interruption.] I have made it in utterly good faith. I believe that it probably is true. It may not be true—I have admitted that, and I admit it now. It now falls to the Minister, in replying to this debate, to go through the logic—as I did not see him do in most of the Committee stage—of the allegation, to take it seriously, and to show that I have got wrong one of my propositions. Have I got it wrong that the treaty basis of the letter from the Commission is article 85?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. As the hon. Gentleman said, I have just taken the Chair. However, I should draw it to his attention that we are considering narrow amendments. The hon. Gentleman appears to be referring to a treaty. Can he explain what that treaty has to do with the two amendments before us?

Mr. Letwin: I was not interrupted by your predecessor, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I explained the relevance of the treaty at the beginning of my speech. So as not to try your patience, let me briefly repeat the logic of my argument; it is very straightforward. The amendment seeks to protect resale price maintenance, which was being advocated by a particular group. That group has withdrawn part of its advocacy of that on the basis of a letter from the Commission to which the Minister has referred. The letter is meant to have some treaty basis, which I believe is article 85. I have been asserting that the Minister concocted the letter from the Commission in order to change the attitude of that group to resale price maintenance—and hence the necessity of the amendment. That is the structure of my argument.

In conclusion, I repeat that if any leg of my argument is false, it falls to the Minister to show it. It is for him to show that article 85 is not the treaty base, that I have misinterpreted its scope or effect, or that the Commission genuinely acted on its own initiative and is at fault because he can show that he tried to get the letter withdrawn.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: It is, indeed, unusual to hear the Opposition filibustering on their own amendment, but the amendment relates to a subject that is particularly embarrassing to them. It is a subject that they ignored for years—the plight of community pharmacists. Indeed, when the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) was in the Cabinet, 178 pharmacists ceased trading.

The Opposition have had no long-standing dialogue with community pharmacists, and, in speaking to the amendment and the new clause, cannot command their support. They asked us about representations and I shall be happy to deal with that, along with the treaty basis for what is happening. The right hon. Member for Wokingham made no representations to the Director General of Fair Trading about the complaint. In 1996, when the Commission was liaising with the Office of Fair Trading in respect of the Asda complaint, the right hon. Gentleman was too busy with the downfall of his own Government to make any representations to Brussels. I understand that he has made no representations on the matter, either to the Office of Fair Trading or to the Commission, during the passage of the Bill or previously. We will take no lessons from the Opposition about commitments to community pharmacists.

As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade told the House:

> "My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has made it clear how important community pharmacies are to his vision of health in the next century."—[Official Report, 11 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 34.]

The amendment and the new clause put at risk all the representations made to the OFT and the Commission.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham does not care whether amendment No. 2, which is, after all, a political stunt, puts at risk all that community pharmacists have been fighting for. It would disapply the prohibition and effectively pre-empt the findings of the restrictive practices court. It is carelessly drafted in that it does not distinguish between retail price maintenance agreements in the over-the-counter medicine sector which are exempt under section 14 of the Resale Prices Act 1976 and all other retail price maintenance agreements. New clause 4 refers to agreements that have been exempted from section 14. Both proposals would have the effect of stopping proceedings in the United Kingdom and handing them over to Brussels—coming from the right hon. Member for Wokingham, that is a paradox.

The Commission has made it perfectly clear that article 85 is directly applicable in the United Kingdom, irrespective of the Bill. On several occasions in Committee, Opposition Members highlighted the fact that an agreement of conduct must have an appreciable effect on trade between member states if articles 85 and 86 are to apply. They went on to argue—as they have this evening—that that requirement somehow makes the competition test for the application of the domestic prohibition different from that for the application of article 85. The right hon. Member for Wokingham nods in agreement, but that view is mistaken.

The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) asked whether he was wrong and I can confirm that he is wrong on that and most of the other matters that he raised.

6.45 pm

Mr. Letwin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Griffiths: I shall give way in a moment, with great pleasure.

The requirement that the application of article 85 would affect interstate trade is a jurisdictional hurdle. It does not affect the meaning of the prohibition itself in the sense of determining whether or not an agreement is anti-competitive. Nor does it affect the meaning of the prohibition in determining whether conduct is abusive of a dominant position.

Mr. Letwin: The Minister has made some quite remarkable statements. First, he has admitted that article 85 is the treaty base. Secondly, does he agree that if article 85 has the scope that he claims for it, the reason for the clause that creates a prohibition under English law is nullified? He has undermined the whole purpose of his own legislation.

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman had left the Standing Committee at that stage, as he put his career before chemists. He also sought to spare the Opposition the embarrassment of the publication in the 1980s that he and the right hon. Member for Wokingham produced on financing the health service. Their report is germane to today's debate on community pharmacists, as it advocated a pill tax. They wanted to ensure that the prescriptions that are the life-blood of so many chemists were operated, if not for profit, at least by charging enough to ensure that demand matched supply. So the hon. Gentleman's history is certainly not in support of community pharmacists—which is why Opposition Members have shown absolutely no interest in the issue for so long.

Mr. Letwin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Griffiths: I shall make some progress, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman before I sit down.

It is important to be aware that the proposals would stop proceedings in the United Kingdom. The Commission has made it clear—not just to the Government but to the Director General of Fair Trading, with whom it has been liaising for more than two years on the matter—that if that happened, it would have to take action. It did so under the previous Administration, without a finger being lifted by Ministers or Conservative Back Benchers at the time to support community pharmacists. I can confirm, as I have it here, that a letter from the Commission was sent to the Director General of Fair Trading. I am sure that it is part of one of a number of dialogues over the past two years since Asda lodged its complaint in 1995.

Amendment No.2 would have dire consequences. The Commission has made it clear that if the restrictive practices court were not looking at the issue, it would take lock, stock and barrel the evidence that the Office of Fair Trading has collected over a long time. Let us look at just how long it can take for the Commission to act. A recent investigation into the Italian tobacco sector took around two years. The decision on Volkswagen took around three years. That means that the present arrangements could unravel alarmingly quickly for community pharmacists.

The Bill provides a five-year transitional period if the court decides that there should be an exemption for over-the-counter medicines. I urge my hon. Friends to reject the amendment and the new clause.

Mr. Lansley: The Minister will know that the letter from the Commission on 8 May related to whether proceedings before the court were stayed under the previous amendment tabled in another place. When the court's proceedings continue, will the Commission investigate and intervene on RPM on over-the-counter medicines if the chapter I prohibition in this country is not applied but the court's decision is sustained?

Mr. Griffiths: The Commission has made it very clear that, if the court comes to a decision that the community pharmacies deem favourable—the same decision at which it arrived, having weighed up the evidence, the last time that it considered the matter—and if due processes have been followed, it should be satisfied. That is an important point. We went into this matter in some detail in Committee.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Mr. Griffiths: I shall not let the hon. Gentleman detain the House further, given that his questions as a member of the Committee that considered the Bill were answered.

The do-nothings when they were in government are lecturing us about doing something. Owing to the inadequacies of Opposition Members' explanations in favour of the amendment and the new clause and the patent lack of support from the Community Pharmacy Action Group, I urge the House to reject the amendments.

Mr. Letwin: I hope that the Minister will answer this question. If he is saying that article 85 extends into activities that do not affect interstate trade, how can the prohibition clause that he is enacting be necessary?

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman was honest enough to say to the House that he might be wrong. He is completely and utterly wrong in this matter. I wonder whether his lack of a grasp of these issues was the reason why he was moved off the Committee.

There is no support for the amendments. Indeed, I have a card—I suspect that the right hon. Member for Wokingham does not have one—from David Sharpe of the Community Pharmacy Action Group, thanking me for my support for community pharmacies. The number that I rang this morning was that of the group's legal adviser, Sue Sharpe. We have support for our policy; no one supports the Opposition's amendment and new clause.

Mr. Redwood: What a dreadful statement from the Minister. He ended with a strange statement that no one supports the amendments. We are shortly to show that quite a few Members support them. Many people outside the House want a solution to the problem, and the Government have left them without one.

I shall deal briefly with the Minister's attempt at a response. He said that I have made no representations to Brussels or to British competition authorities. I have made endless representations through debates on this Bill. As the shadow spokesman responsible for such matters, I believe that the right way in which to make representations is through the House, when parliamentary opportunity presents itself. I know that the Government do not like the House—but we do. This is a proper way in which to proceed.

The Minister said that a certain number of pharmacies closed while I was in the Cabinet, and that that proves that the outgoing Government did not care. It is not possible to prevent some pharmacies closing for commercial reasons. We are debating not whether the Minister can prevent commercial closures—I am sure that he will not be able to do so—but whether he can prevent deliberate closures on top of those that will be forced through as a result of the Bill and his inability to sort things out in Brussels. He has not confirmed the figures that have been bandied about in the trade, suggesting that perhaps 3,000 pharmacies will close as a result of the legislation and of the Brussels decision that he fears.

The Minister asked why I have not made representations to Brussels. There is no need to do so at the moment because, at the moment, the issue can and should be sorted out here, in the United Kingdom—either at the restrictive practices court or in the House by suitable amendment to legislation.

The Minister and I agree on one thing: community pharmacies will be very important to health care and health services in the next century. That makes the Government's attitude even more stunning. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) said, pharmacies provide a very important service in smaller market towns and the suburbs. If they are removed or destroyed by the Government, Brussels or some combination of the two, considerably more cost will fall directly on the health service as it struggles to replace the services.

Neither my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset nor I come easily to defending practices which, in all other industries and areas, we are happy to see go—and which, at times, we have helped to go. Normally, we prefer open, competitive markets, where prices and services are determined in the marketplace by people spending their money as they see fit. We make an exception for this issue. I urge the House, knowing, as it does, that both my hon. Friend and I nearly always come down on the side of free markets and complete choice, to think very carefully before rejecting the amendment. I stressed to the House—and shall do so again—that we are satisfied of two things: first, that there is quite enough price choice in the market for those who think that price is the most crucial aspect. Secondly, such community services are important and would be much more expensive to provide at the taxpayer's expense if they are demolished as a result of this ill-considered legislation.

I shall pass over the Minister calling our actions a political stunt; that is not worthy of him or of the Government whom he serves. We are seriously arguing a case for many small businesses in our communities that need some help and are looking to the Government for it—the Government whom they thought might represent them.

I agree with the Minister that the effect of the amendment would be to stop proceedings in the court. That is the point; the idea of the amendment is to settle the matter following democratic debate in the House of Commons. We could always return to it if we had second thoughts, if the commercial and service argument had moved on.

Mr. Lansley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the Government object to the amendment on the ground that it would stop proceedings in the court and would lead to intervention by the Commission, they could take the route of new clause 4, which would not stop proceedings in the court?

Mr. Redwood: Indeed; I am grateful to my hon. Friend for clarifying that point. That was my understanding of his new clause. The Minister seems to have a different view of it.

I gave the Minister due notice in Committee of the problems with Brussels and how I, on behalf of many people, expected the Government to go to Brussels to try to get a better deal for our pharmacies and to sort the matter out for them. I did not want the House to be left with Hobson's choice—either accepting my amendment then worrying about what Brussels might do as a results of our actions, or not being able to do anything at all to help community pharmacies. The inaction of the Minister and his colleagues places us in such a position.

If the Minister had taken my advice in Committee, he would by now have had productive discussions in Brussels. He would have explained that the practice has not driven a coach and horses through Brussels competition law during our membership of the Community. He would have explained that the practice matters to people in Britain—and that, for once, he could swing the will of the whole Parliament in favour of keeping our community pharmacies. He could surely have pleaded for some special treatment—an exemption, an agreement that the practice was in the public interest, not against it. Evidence from the previous Restrictive Trade Practices Act case in Britain and the previous RTPA finding were already available.

There was a most extraordinary dialogue on the Government Benches on the legal position of article 85 and direct action under the treaty. Of course my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset is right: the idea of the treaty, as set out by the founding fathers and in the debates when we joined the European Community, was to regulate competition between states and between firms in different member states. There was no presumption at all that the organisation also had to interfere in intrastate trading.

We wish to make clear that we believe that the measure is an extension of jurisdiction from Brussels and that it is about intrastate trade. The Minister needs to propose new legislation because the European Community should not have that power to start with. There is, as has been said, a jurisdictional hurdle, which we are addressing. The Government have got it wrong, and have misinterpreted the matter. They should not allow Brussels to intervene in this case and they should accept our amendment. We urge the House tonight to do something decent for the retail pharmacies and for health care in our country. The only way to do that now is to accept the Opposition amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 18

ABUSE OF DOMINANT POSITION

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 48, in page 10, line 38, at end insert—

'(2A) For the purposes of this section "market" means a market the whole or part of which is in the United Kingdom but in relation to the abuse of a dominant position in a market which extends beyond the United Kingdom the prohibition imposed by subsection (1) shall not be regarded as infringed unless that abuse occurs in the United Kingdom.'.

Clause 18 outlines the chapter II prohibition on an abuse of dominant position in a market, which is one of the two key prohibitions contained in the Bill. In Committee, we did not debate an amendment that had the same purpose as amendment No. 48, but we discussed some of the related issues—indeed, I tabled the amendment in the light of some of our discussions.

In the execution of the prohibition, it is obviously necessary to define a market, but that is done neither in clause 18 nor elsewhere in the Bill. The draft guidance issued by the Director General of Fair Trading makes it clear, in paragraph 2.12, that a market definition comprises two dimensions:

"a product and a geographic area".

It cites the example of the Commission's consideration of a complaint about ice cream cabinets in Ireland. The Commission defined as the relevant market

"impulse ice cream in Ireland"— that contains a product and a geographic definition.

7.15 pm

In paragraph 4.9, the director general makes it clear that, where there are significant imports of a product, the relevant market is international. The contrary is not necessarily implied where there is a lack of imports; the example cited is that of the bus market in Germany, on which the Commission decided that, although imports were low, there were no significant barriers to entry to the market, so that one could substitute domestic German providers with imports. Again, the definition of the market was held to be international.

In paragraph 6.7, the director general states:

"If the market is international, market shares should be calculated to cover the whole geographic market."

That makes it clear that he intends, under the Bill, to use a definition of a market that, if the evidence demanded, extended beyond the United Kingdom.

Similarly, in Committee, the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs, responding to some of my remarks, said:

"I entirely agree with the point made by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire that the relevant, geographic market should not be limited to the United Kingdom."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 4 June 1998; c. 235.]

The intention, which seems to be shared by the Government and the Opposition, is that the relevant market should extend beyond the United Kingdom.

How will the market be defined under clause 18? I tabled the amendment not to provide a substitute for the Government's intentions, but to fulfil them. One of the problems of earlier competition legislation was that, from time to time, the market was construed too narrowly. A market that was considered for public interest purposes may have been a regional market inside the United Kingdom, even though that regional market was capable of substitution from beyond its boundaries. It is important to look beyond the boundaries not only of any region but of the United Kingdom itself.

Subsection (3) says that a dominant position

"means a dominant position within the United Kingdom".

That is the problem, because it is the only place in the clause where "market" is arguably defined. The director general and the Minister may believe that they can look beyond the United Kingdom to define the relevant market, but I am not sure that the clause allows that to happen. Taking account of such markets may be open to challenge.

It is possible that, on the question of dominance, the boundaries will move back within the United Kingdom, so that the director general's decision will be made in relation not to the relevant market but to some subsection of that market. It is important to avoid that.

The amendment would allow the definition of "market" to extend beyond the United Kingdom, when the evidence requires that, and would avoid the problem of extraterritoriality by showing straightforwardly that, for the prohibition to come into effect, the abuse of the dominance would have to occur within the United Kingdom. It would helpfully create a clear hierarchy.

For example, someone could be dominant in the market for ice cream cabinets in the whole of Ireland, but the dominance could occur only in the Republic, and not in Northern Ireland. The market would include Northern Ireland, but if the abuse occurred only in the Republic, it would not be subject to the prohibition.

I commend the amendment to the Minister as a positive attempt to give appropriate effect to the Government's intentions.

Mr. Redwood: The Opposition support the amendment. We have found many examples of poor, misleading or inadequate drafting in the Bill. In this case, we have produced a form of words to clarify the meaning for the sake of business. Our general worry about the Bill is that it is badly drafted and loose, and will be a lawyers' charter, enabling many lawyers to do well and many businesses to do badly, because of the enormous fees that will be demanded. The amendment would clarify the meaning and give business greater certainty.

We think—as did Ministers in Committee—that penalties should be limited to a fine on the turnover in the affected market in the United Kingdom in which the offence has occurred. That is part of our process of trying to refine the legislation and make it a bit more realistic.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): I agree with the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) that the clause is an extremely important part of the Bill. I reject the view of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), expressed in his usual manner, that our drafting has been poor and misleading. That is entirely without foundation.

We made it entirely clear in the other place and in Committee that our intention was that the Committee stage should be used to assess and improve the Bill. That is not an admission of poor or misleading drafting; it is evidence of a co-operative, partnership approach with those who will be directly affected by the provisions. The right hon. Gentleman's comment was entirely unacceptable and, inadvertently I assume, damaged the case of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire.

It is clear that, in the modern commercial world and, indeed, in the single market in the European Union, many economic markets will extend beyond the United Kingdom. That may be true for a wide range of goods and services, from banking and financial services to air transport, the sale of aeroplanes, computer software, engineering products—the list is almost endless.

We entirely agree that the relevant geographic market should not be limited to the UK under the Bill, but that is already the effect of the Bill as drafted, and we believe that the amendment is unnecessary. In fact, amendments designed to clarify the drafting of the clause on exactly this point were accepted in another place.

In moving those amendments, my noble Friend Lord Simon of Highbury stated clearly that their purpose was to ensure that subsection (3) would not be read as limiting the relevant geographic market for assessing dominance to the United Kingdom. Clearly, there will be many circumstances in which the relevant market includes, but is wider than, the United Kingdom. The drafting of the clause does not cut across that in any way. We see no reason to revise the drafting.

The issue is important, and I accept that the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire raises it because he genuinely wants confirmation and clarification, so I should like to explain in a little more detail why we do not think that the amendment is needed.

Any analysis of whether there has been an abuse must start with an analysis of the relevant market in terms of both the relevant products and the relevant geographical area. Under the Bill, the relevant market will have to be determined according to the economic circumstances in the case concerned, as it would be in applying articles 85 and 86. The Director General of Fair Trading will issue advice and information to provide further guidance on that point. He has already published a draft of his guidance on market definition for consultation. I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's remarks are sent to him so that they can become part of the consultation process.

Subsection (1) requires that there must be dominance in a market. Subsection (3) provides that that dominance must exist within the United Kingdom or any part of it. There is a two-stage process. Once the relevant market has been identified, it must be established whether the undertaking is dominant in the UK or a part of it. It is plainly right that both those elements should be present. We are not interested here in dominance that exists elsewhere, but does not extend to the United Kingdom. The clause does not require that the market that must be considered when the prohibition is being applied must be entirely contained within the United Kingdom.

Should the courts consider that the meaning of the clause is ambiguous or obscure in that respect, they will be entitled to consider the statements that Lord Simon made in another place, and those that I have made here. That follows the decision in the case of Pepper v. Hart that reference can be made to statements in Hansard in certain circumstances to clarify the meaning of legislation. However, we do not believe that there is any ambiguity in the current drafting or that the amendment would represent an improvement.

I hope that those detailed comments will assist the hon. Gentleman and that he will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister for responding so positively and sympathetically to the amendment. I confess that I am still uncertain whether in practice when a court is asked, presumably by way of judicial review, to consider the phrase, "dominant position" in this context, meaning within the United Kingdom, it will look for the legislative means by which the director was empowered to consider the relevant market as subsisting beyond the United Kingdom or to consider dominance within the United Kingdom as a self-contained matter. I take the point that if such matters are not set out in the legislation, the courts can consider them on a Pepper v. Hart basis. On that basis, and given the Minister's comments, I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 10, leave out lines 40 and 41 and insert

'"dominant position" means a position of economic strength which enables an undertaking to act independently of competition, customers and ultimately consumers within the United Kingdom; and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment No. 8, in page 10, leave out lines 40 and 41 and insert

'"dominant position" means—

(a) in relation to the national newspaper market, a substantial degree of market power, and

(b) in relation to all other markets, a dominant position within the United Kingdom; and'.

New clause 1—National newspapers—

'.—(1) This section shall apply if a monopoly situation exists, within the meaning of section 6 of the Fair Trading Act 1973, in relation to the supply of—

(a) national newspapers; or

(b) national newspapers of any description

And where this section applies, it applies to any person or persons in favour of whom that monopoly situation exists, within the meaning of section 49 (2)(b) of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

(2) Any conduct on the part of any person to whom this section applies shall be prohibited if—

(a) it constitutes an anti-competitive practice, and

(b) it may reduce the diversity and independence of the national newspaper press in the United Kingdom.

(3) For the purposes of this section, an anti-competitive practice is a course of conduct which has, or is intended to have, or is likely to have the effect of restricting, distorting or preventing competition.

(4) The prohibition imposed by subsection (2) is referred to in this Act as the press diversity prohibition.'.

7.30 pm

Mr. Radice: I must remind the Minister and hon. Members what was said on this subject on Second Reading. Many hon. Members, including myself, believe that there is a prima facie case showing predatory pricing by The Times in the broadsheet market. In the past five years, the newspaper has consistently been priced below cost—often considerably below. At the moment, one has to pay only 30p for a copy.

Apparently, that is a special offer for the world cup, or so we are told by the editor. That is not merely a marketing ploy, but a deliberate predatory pricing strategy, the purpose of which is not only to win extra readers but to put The Independent out of business and attract at least some of its readers, so that The Times can get closer to its objective of overhauling The Daily Telegraph.

I said that there was a prima facie case, because we cannot prove it until we have all the facts and figures. It is up to the Office of Fair Trading to prove it. At the moment, the pricing practices of The Times are being investigated by the OFT, although that is under the existing and not the new law.

I am not claiming that other newspapers do not employ some types of predatory pricing, although I would argue that, in most cases, it is a reaction to what The Times has done. Such predatory behaviour is dangerous for the newspaper market. If one paper is knocked out, the market will be less diverse. The practice has an impact on other newspapers in the broadsheet market as most feel the need to react to the actions of The Times, which takes money out of the market, which means that there is less profit and less money to spend on journalists and improving the quality of the newspaper.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman said that the price of The Times was below cost. What are the costs of The Times?

Mr. Radice: If the right hon. Gentleman knows, he knows more than I do. There have been a number of estimates, but The Times has told us that it is making considerable losses, so I assume that the price is below cost. It is widely thought to be, and that is precisely the purpose of the investigation. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would know that, and I am surprised at his intervention.

Dr. Ladyman: When The Times was previously investigated, the question upon which the case hinged was not whether it had a dominant position, which was being abused. It was understood that the newspaper could be investigated and that it had satisfied that criterion. It was let off the hook because it could not be proved that it was selling below cost. My hon. Friend's amendment would reduce the threshold at which it is necessary to prove dominance, but that was never the question. How will it help with the need to prove that The Times is selling below cost?

Mr. Radice: I will come to that. My hon. Friend is an expert on the matter, having been a member of the Standing Committee.

Dr. Ladyman: I would hardly say that I am an expert. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) was a member of the Committee, and I would not call him an expert.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): It is not the purpose to have experts in Committee.

Mr. Radice: It makes it more difficult.

I was about to point out that such below-cost pricing makes it more difficult for new newspapers to enter the market, because they have to pay the extra cost of pricing below their costs, which is bad for competition.

The question for us—it also relates to the other amendments in the group—is whether the Bill will enable the Office of Fair Trading to deal effectively with predatory pricing in the newspaper industry. The Lords did not believe that it would: hence clause 19, which was taken out of the Bill in Committee and which dealt with that industry. The Government's case, which they made on Second Reading—they did not make it strongly in the Lords, which is probably why there was such a special clause—was set out by the President of the Board of Trade. I have also read the excellent statement by the Minister of State in Committee. Their case was that the Bill would introduce a tough regime on predatory pricing.

Clause 18 sets out certain conducts, including predatory pricing, which would amount to an abuse of dominant position, and clause 60 sets out various ways in which the principles of European legislation—perhaps this is the point of the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman)—are to be introduced into British law. Those principles are laid down by treaty and by the European Court of Justice. Any decision of that court must be taken into account by the Office of Fair Trading and British courts, which also have to take into account any relevant decision or statement by the Commission. As I understand it, that means that we have to consider cases in Europe.

One famous case was that of Tetra Pak in 1994, which I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet knows all about. It said that, if pricing by a dominant firm was below the average variable cost of production, predation should be presumed, and the proof of intent was not required. It also defined "dominant position". One problem is that The Times has only 28 per cent. of the market, and one could argue that that is not a dominant position. However, the Commissioners have made it clear that a dominant position is one in which a firm can act independently of competition, and that it does not specifically relate to market share, so that is a stronger position than we have at present.

Dr. Ladyman: The case to which my hon. Friend refers, which covers freedom to act independently, is that of United Brands v. the Commission, which includes almost identical language to that in his amendment, which makes it superfluous, because that language will be in the Competition Bill as it stands and as the Government propose it to be.

Mr. Radice: If my hon. Friend would listen to my argument before he knocks me down, I should be most grateful.

Mr. Redwood: He already has.

Mr. Radice: We shall see. He thinks so. He is acting in a predatory manner.

Dr. Ladyman: Not, unfortunately, from a dominant position.

Mr. Radice: No, from a sitting position.

My hon. Friend argues that the Bill as it stands provides a powerful mechanism for dealing with predatory pricing. I said on Second Reading that I was impressed by that case, and that I would consider it seriously. I said that I would take the best legal advice. Having spoken to a considerable number of lawyers, I find that, like economists, they have different opinions. There has been some support for the Government's interpretation of the Bill, but also some dissent. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) is aware of the advice of Richard Fowler QC, the lawyer used by The Independent. Some may say that one can hire one's lawyer to suit the case, but I do not make that point.

Mr. Chidgey: I note the hon. Gentleman's feeling that The Independent has a particular line to pursue, but does he agree that an eminent QC's opinion is an independent opinion? There would be no other point in seeking it.

Mr. Radice: Let me cite Mr. Fowler. He said that it is unlikely to be possible to establish a relative dominant position as that concept is defined in Community jurisprudence. He is concerned that that will not do the job. Lord Borrie, a person respected by the whole House, shares that view.

I want to strengthen the Bill by adding to it the words of the President of the Board of Trade and the Minister of State. There are conflicting views of what the Bill will do, and my amendment would make the position more certain by saying that a

"'dominant position' means a position of economic strength which enables an undertaking to act independently of competition, customers and ultimately consumers within the United Kingdom".

That is a good description of the dominant position of The Times, which is able to use the profits of the Sunday Times, and perhaps other undertakings owned by the Murdoch empire, to persist in a policy that it could not otherwise afford.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I understand what my hon. Friend is getting at, but I do not understand why he did not go along with amendment No. 8, which is more specific to the newspaper industry. It makes the point that, in buying peas or Tetra Paks, one does not need much choice. However, buying ideas, which is what newspapers are about, is another matter.

Mr. Radice: I am sympathetic to amendment No. 8, but one would have to define "substantial", and that would lead to a circular argument, because there is no definition—certainly there is none in the Bill—of that word. Amendment No. 8 would throw us back to European legislation. I am sympathetic to my hon. Friend's idea, and I consider that we are trying to do the same thing, but I think that my way is perhaps better, despite the criticisms offered by my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet.

Dr. Ladyman rose—

7.45 pm

Mr. Radice: Does he want to criticise me a third time?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend seems to minimise the impact of European legislation on the Bill. Clause 60 makes that legislation central to the Bill, so that all European jurisprudence can be used. As my hon. Friend's amendment contains the same wording as European case law, what is its purpose?

Mr. Radice: My purpose is to put the position beyond peradventure. I am interested in listening to the Minister, and to my hon. Friend, and I may well be persuaded by them, but I want to try to tease out a strong definition that can be used in the courts.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway): May I helpfully suggest an answer that my hon. Friend might have given? European case law as adumbrated in the Bill by clause 60 may change, and that is one reason for enshrining the principle in our own legislation, to set it in stone.

Mr. Radice: I am most grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. I sense another helpful intervention.

Mr. Winnick: If Mr. Murdoch had a vote tonight, he would certainly vote against the amendment and new clause 1. The Murdoch empire and the media do not want to see them carried.

Mr. Radice: They might even vote against the Bill.

Mr. Winnick: More so against the amendment.

Mr. Radice: Probably.

I have covered my amendment, which is about predatory pricing and a dominant position in the national newspaper market. It is not about the Murdoch press, or about the fact that The Times is no longer a paper of record. It is not about the fact that The Sun is sometimes disgracefully xenophobic. Nor is it about the fact that News International has perhaps too big a share of the United Kingdom newspaper market. This is not the place in which to express my concern about how an unelected Australian-American media owner interferes, through The Sun, in British politics. [HON. MEMBERS: "Go on."] I am having a good try, but I might be ruled out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not debating the amendment with his immediate circle of hon. Friends, but addressing the whole House. Let me say to some of his hon. Friends that they must be quiet, as they are being unfair to the rest of the House.

Mr. Radice: Lord Beaverbrook once said, "What I want is power: kiss 'em one day, kick 'em the next." Rudyard Kipling, whose words were later quoted by his cousin Stanley Baldwin, said:

"Power without responsibility—the prerogative of the harlot throughout the ages."

Those words still apply. I shall not ask the Minister for his views on them or on their relevance today.

Mr. Ian McCartney: For the record, the last gentleman that tried to kiss me one day and kick me the next, spent 12 months at Her Majesty's pleasure.

Mr. Radice: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his robust attitude. I ask him either to accept my amendment, or to reassure me that the Bill will enable us to take tough action against predatory pricing wherever it occurs, including in the newspaper industry.

Mr. Chidgey: Most hon. Members know that, during the Bill's passage, we have had several opportunities to debate the issues before us. It stands out from our deliberations in Committee and on Second Reading that Ministers have been accused several times—not by me, I hasten to add—of altering course and changing their position. At times, they have argued that an action should be ruled out in the interests of avoiding putting undue burdens on business. At other times, they have said that action is unnecessary.

The one thing in which the Government have been constant throughout our proceedings is opposing any additional safeguards on predatory behaviour in the national newspaper business. The Government's position is surprising, because, when Labour was in opposition, it was boisterous and vigorous in promising action. It is surprising that, in office, it appears less interested in that promise; some might say that it has betrayed it. The Government seem determined that no one should have the opportunity to help them with it. That is the nub of this debate.

I want to discuss some of the issues raised in Committee, and some of the objections that Ministers made to amendments in Committee, particularly in respect of new clause 1 and amendment No. 8, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and which I have signed, which would take us some way forward.

There is a need for a clause specific to the newspaper press. I strongly believe that competition law should contain specific and stricter, provisions on the press. Ministers have argued that it is wrong in principle to have different prohibitions in different sectors, but perhaps they forget that schedules 2 to 4 are devoted to excluding certain sectors from the Bill altogether. There is an inconsistency there.

With the press, diversity of provision, and hence of expression of comment, are necessities in their own right. That need goes beyond the need for competition in the supply of goods and services. Competition is a means to an economic end, but a diverse press is an end in itself. Where the diversity of the press is concerned, competition law must go further than it does for ordinary goods and services.

That need has always been recognised in mergers policy. I think that sections 57 and 62 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 are devoted entirely to establishing stricter criteria to apply to newspaper mergers alone. The Government should recognise that the same need exists in other areas of competition law—notably the control of anti-competitive conduct, which is the subject of the Bill. That is the gap that new clause 1 and amendment No. 8 seek to fill.

Is the chapter II prohibition sufficient in the case of predatory behaviour in the newspaper business? Ministers have argued that it is enough to rely on the Bill as it stands. They point to clause 18, which prohibits the abuse of a dominant position, to clause 60, which imports European jurisprudence into the interpretation of that prohibition, and to European case law on predatory pricing.

I agree with the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) that those claims have been exploded by the recent opinion of leading counsel, in particular that of Mr. Richard Fowler, QC. He has shown that European jurisprudence sets a very high threshold before dominance can be established. That is unsustainable when the diversity of the press is at issue. Such diversity could easily be threatened by anti-competitive conduct long before a newspaper reached the point of dominance set out in the jurisprudence.

Ministers also argue that clause 18 will make predatory pricing easier to establish than it is under present competition legislation. They point again to European case law, which says that predation should be presumed whenever prices are below the average variable cost of production. Mr. Fowler has again made it clear that, for newspapers, with their reliance on advertising revenue, that precedent would not run. Another ministerial reassurance is thus undermined, if not negated.

Dr. Ladyman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: I could see the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm mounting. In a spirit of generosity, I am delighted to give way.

Dr. Ladyman: Far be it from me to suggest that the learned gentleman whom the hon. Gentleman quotes was talking poppycock, but he claims that in Europe there is a high threshold for establishing a dominant position. It is clear from what the Commissioners have said that, under some circumstances, they would regard a 20 per cent. market share as dominance. Does the hon. Gentleman seriously suggest that less than 20 per cent. should still be considered dominant?

Mr. Chidgey: I am somewhat confused by that question. I think that the hon. Gentleman referred to me as learned, or perhaps it was to someone else. He accused a leading counsel with an international reputation of talking poppycock. I cannot comment on that, but the opinion is on the record. It differs from the Government's legal opinion, but where there is conflicting legal opinion, there is a problem with legislation. If he contains his enthusiasm while I continue my remarks, I think that I shall be able to demonstrate why that is important.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: We have a new face in the Chamber. What a pity the hon. Gentleman was not here for the opening remarks. Nevertheless, I shall be generous and allow him to contribute.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman's generosity is clearly not matched by his courtesy. My point supports what he said. He will be pleased to learn that not only leading counsel but European case law supports his argument and not that of the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman).

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful for that point. I quickly withdraw any discourtesy. I was perhaps momentarily excited; it was meant merely as part of the usual cut and thrust of our friendly behaviour in the Chamber, particularly at this hour.

I contend that counsel's advice is clear. The comfort that Ministers have held out on the adequacy of clause 18 is illusory. It will leave untouched a range of anti-competitive practices that could threaten the diversity of the press. Those threats will remain unless the House enacts specific safeguards against them.

It has been argued that it is wrong to use legislation to target a particular case—an issue addressed several times in Committee. Ministers argued that legislation should provide a general framework, and should not be used to target individual abuses by individual companies or even against individual companies. That is clearly right. A vital aspect of press diversity is that the market should be open to newcomers.

The amendments are couched sufficiently generally not to prejudge the facts of any particular case. Findings of fact are for the relevant enforcement authorities, not the legislators. The purpose of the amendments is to establish a general safeguard for press diversity and make it a new and free-standing responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading, and, as necessary, the new Competition Commission.

I am concerned about how the Minister may respond on new clause 1. I trust that the House will welcome its provisions. Its purpose is to stand in place of, and improve on, the clause 19 that was added to the Bill in another place before it reached Committee here and the Government were able to remove it through their votes there.

New clause 1 would prohibit any anti-competitive practice that threatens to reduce the diversity of the national newspaper press, but only if the author of that practice enjoys a monopoly situation. Both "anti-competitive practice" and "monopoly situation" have existing statutory definitions, in the Competition Act 1980 and the Fair Trading Act 1973 respectively. Therefore, their meaning will already be familiar to the business community affected by the Bill.

Let me deal with the question of dominant position and monopoly situations. On Second Reading and in Committee, Ministers criticised the original clause 19, because, it was claimed, it relied on a special definition of a dominant position, including any "substantial degree of market power".

Ministers claimed that the clause was too wide, because, they said, practically any established newspaper will hold substantial market power.

The new clause meets that criticism by confining its reach to monopoly situations as defined in the Fair Trading Act, which entails a market share of 25 per cent., which is common knowledge. The scope of the new clause is thus confined within existing strategy limits. Surely nobody would argue that practically any established national newspaper company will hold a market share of 25 per cent.

8 pm

Turning to the definition of the abuse that will be prohibited, the old clause 19 was also criticised by Ministers because it prohibited any conduct, within certain limits, which might reduce the diversity of the national newspaper press. It was thought that the clause would throw the baby out with the bath water, because it applied, or could be seen to apply, to any conduct, legitimate or illegitimate, that might reduce the diversity of the national newspaper press; it could even condemn good journalism. However, in new clause 1, anti-competitive practices are defined in the same way as in section 2 of the Competition Act 1980, which I believes overcomes the problem.

Let me now turn to advertising revenues of newspapers. Much has been of the costs of producing The Times, and the accounting procedures of News International. In our debate on the old clause 19, we focused on its reference to "selling prices", which was thought to imply that a low cover price could be an abuse regardless of advertising revenues. Obviously, that argument on its own is unsustainable, because no one would be able to support a principle that prohibited the publication of free sheets. Therefore, the issue is not selling price, but overall costs.

The new clause meets that criticism by eliminating all reference to selling price; instead, it deals only with anti-competitive practices that threaten to reduce the diversity of the national newspaper press. It would be for the competition authorities—the Director General of Fair Trading and the new Competition Commission—to identify such anti-competitive practices, according to their practised judgment. If accepted, the new clause would leave them entirely free to consider advertising revenues in whatever way they thought right.

Ministers should recognise and acknowledge that all their objections have been heard, heeded and fully catered for in new clause 1. The new clause now applies only where there is a monopoly situation, and only to actions that constitute an anti-competitive practice. It prohibits such practices when they may reduce the diversity of the national newspaper press. Surely nobody could doubt the justification for that.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I rise to speak to amendment No. 8, which stands in my name and those of several colleagues, including the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey).

Let me say out the outset that I welcome the Bill. It contains many desirable measures and I shall have no difficulty voting for it on Third Reading. However, the acid test is the one that I mentioned on Second Reading, during an intervention on the Secretary of State: whether the Bill deals with predatory pricing in the national newspaper market, which is the worst example of predatory pricing and abuse of the market and is all the more serious because, unlike predatory pricing in other sectors, it has implications for the democratic process. The Bill as drafted does not pass that test; therefore, the purpose of my amendment is to bring predatory pricing in the newspaper industry within its scope.

The issue is one in which my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) and I have taken a serious interest. It will be evident from the signatures of seven Select Committee Chairmen to amendment No. 8 and that of the distinguished Chairman of the Liaison Committee to amendment No. 1 that our concern is widely shared. We have not tabled the amendments lightly. We have talked to the Secretary of State, who has listened courteously to our concerns, to Lord Borrie and to representatives of the industry—including the editor of The Times and the chairman of News International—and we have taken advice from experts.

I had an open mind on Second Reading, after the effect of clause 60 was belatedly explained to us, but I have been impressed by two things: first, that Lord Borrie, a former Director General of Fair Trading, is of the opinion that the Bill as drafted will not catch what is going on in the newspaper industry and, secondly, the opinion of Richard Fowler QC, who shares that view. They are both of the view that the Bill will be ineffective against the five-year war of attrition conducted by News International against its rivals, which is the fundamental reason why I tabled the amendment.

The background to the problem has been outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham. For the past five years, News International has been selling The Times and occasionally The Sun for far less than the cost of production. That is not a temporary promotional activity; it has been going on for five years. It is dragging down other newspapers: for example, The Daily Telegraph and the Daily Mirror have felt obliged to respond in order to compete. It is having an extremely damaging effect on our national newspaper market, especially the broadsheet market.

Be under no illusions, The Times is making huge losses. When the chairman of News International came to see my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham and me, we asked him how much it had cost the company so far. Although he was the chairman, he did not appear to know the exact figure, but "under £75 million" was the figure he mentioned. It is unclear whether that comes from the profits of The Sunday Times or from other parts of the empire. Subsequent to our meeting, I wrote to the chairman asking whether the profits of The Sunday Times over the same period exceed the subsidy to The Times and, if so, by how much. Mr. Hinton replied:

"We do not break out the profit and loss of The Times and Sunday Times separately" so there is no way of telling.

News International argues that the increase in advertising revenue resulting from the increase in sales of The Times should be taken into account, and I agree—that is a perfectly reasonable point—but I am assuming that the £75 million loss Mr. Hinton talked about already takes account of that. The figure is in addition to any increase in advertising revenue. Let us not be distracted: it is clear that News International's war of attrition could be sustained only by a corporation with huge resources.

Those are the facts so far as we are able to discover them. The result is that hundreds of millions of pounds, much of which might otherwise have been invested, has been drained out of the national newspaper industry. The Independent, which I accept has other problems, has been forced to the brink of extinction. It is bogus to describe what has been going on as normal promotional activity—it is not normal; no other national newspaper engages in such sustained price cutting. If the purpose was to make The Times the market leader, the strategy has not succeeded; nor has it succeeded, after five years, in making the newspaper profitable, even when advertising revenue is taken into account. However, it is no defence to say that the strategy has not worked. As to whether the strategy has worked and what was the goal of the strategy, the jury is still out. It could go on for years with consequences on which we can only speculate. Who knows where it will end?

There is another possibility—a different interpretation from the one that News International would like us to believe is the purpose of its activity—and that is to inflict damage on or to sink rivals. Mr. Murdoch has said in public that by the early part of the next century there will be only three national daily newspapers left—The Times, The Sun and the Daily Mail. He did not say whether that was a desirable target or an inevitable and regrettable fact of life. Whatever view one takes, were it to come to pass—I hope that it will not—it would mean that the British public would be left with a choice of lie machines, either the Harmsworth or the Murdoch lie machine. I do not want that day to arrive.

Happily, there is no shortage of ex-Murdoch executives. A fax may arrive from Los Angeles or New York and they are here today and gone tomorrow. Who knows, that fate may yet overtake one or two of those who are giving us the lavish assurances about how this is just a normal promotional activity. If that fate does overtake them, perhaps they will be in a position to be more frank with us about what it is all about.

As I have said, even now there is no shortage of ex-Murdoch executives. One such person told me that he was in the presence of the man and heard him ask, "How do we sink The Daily Star?" As he said, Murdoch does not need to do that. It is almost an irrelevance to his interests, but he cannot resist the challenge. That is a little glimpse of his mind set.

Another former senior executive of News International has been overheard talking in similar terms about how to sink The Mirror. The strategy has certainly inflicted some damage on that paper over the years.

I do not want to get bogged down by arguing about the purpose of all this. If it is any help, for the purposes of argument, I am willing to assume that Mr. Murdoch's motives are purely honourable and commercial. I want to concentrate on the effect. It is deeply damaging to our democracy to limit or threaten to limit the diversity of our national press.

So far there have been three investigations by the Office of Fair Trading and a fourth is under way. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham said, since it is taking place under the existing competition regime, we should not have any high hopes of it. That is the background.

As my hon. Friend ably explained, amendment No. 1 makes explicit what is at present implicit. It is welcome, but, in my view, it is not sufficient to solve the problem. As the Bill stands, it is necessary to demonstrate that there is an abuse and that the abuser has a dominant position in the market. New clause 1, tabled by the Liberal Democrats, attempts to address both those points by lowering the test for national newspapers. I believe that it is not difficult to prove an abuse. After five years, it is surely no longer possible to argue that News International is engaged in a temporary promotional activity. I have concentrated on lowering the test of dominance in relation to national newspapers. That is the purpose of amendment No. 8.

European law is based on cases where a company such as Tetra Pak, having 80 or 90 per cent. of the market, seeks by means of artificially low pricing to squeeze rivals out of the remaining 10 or 20 per cent. It is true that the Commission has indicated that it might be willing to look at cases where the alleged abuser has a much lower percentage of the market, but, in those circumstances, market dominance is a hurdle which will prove difficult to cross in the national newspaper industry.

Depending on which definition one takes, News International has somewhere between 28 and 33 per cent. of the market. I was interested to hear the chairman of News International say on the "Today" programme that News International has only 19 per cent. of the market. That is evidence of how much reliance we can place on News International figures because, as I have said, the true figure is somewhere between 28 and 33 per cent.

[Mr. Chris Mullin]

Lord Borrie and Mr. Fowler, an expert on competition law, take the view that market dominance is a hurdle which will prove difficult to cross in the national newspaper industry. In an opinion commissioned by The Independent, Mr. Fowler says:

"whether the relevant market is defined as broadsheet newspapers or national newspapers generally, it is unlikely in my opinion that the position of The Times, or of News International, would meet the European Court of Justice tests for dominance."

So, we could sit back and say that nothing can be done about predatory pricing until one of the abusers—it is likely to be Murdoch—has, by fair means or foul, obtained a 50, 60 or 70 per cent. share of our national newspaper market.

What Government would dare to take on a corporation with that percentage of the market? Heaven knows, it is difficult enough to get anyone in high places to think sensibly about Murdoch when he has only one third of the market. Instead of waiting for a bad situation to get worse, I am seeking to rectify the matter now. My amendment does that by lowering the test for national newspapers from dominance to "a substantial degree of market power".

8.15 pm

The Government have two principal objections to my proposal. First, they say that they are not in the business of singling out Rupert Murdoch or any other proprietor. My amendment does not do that. It seeks to outlaw predatory pricing among national newspapers regardless of the identity of the proprietor. As we have seen, The Daily Telegraph and The Mirror would also be affected. Any newspaper corporation that attempts to subvert the market by predatory pricing would be caught by my amendment. Mr. Murdoch's name crops up more than most because he is the greatest living practitioner of predatory pricing. I am sorry about that, but it is an unavoidable fact of life. My amendment makes no mention of Mr. Murdoch or News International. It would apply across the market.

Secondly, the Government object to singling out national newspapers. That is the key issue—it is the core difference between us. It is a difference of principle and we should not shy away from it. I am grateful to Ministers for not arguing that my amendment is technically defective—it is not. We are discussing a straight issue of principle and my argument is simple.

The free flow of information is the life blood of democracy. A diverse media is a precondition of democracy. Any practice that, by accident or design, is likely seriously to limit newspaper diversity therefore threatens democracy. That is why newspapers are a special case. As the hon. Member for Eastleigh said, previous Governments have accepted that in relation to merger policy and other aspects of competition law. Clauses 57 to 62 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 are devoted to establishing stricter criteria for newspaper mergers. That Act was passed by a Conservative Government.

It is disappointing to see so few Conservative Members today. I saw a poll which suggested that 95 per cent. of Conservative Members thought that the Government were too close to Murdoch. If they really thought that and were concerned about it—

Mr. Radice: They want to be close to Murdoch.

Mr. Mullin: My hon. Friend is right; it is jealousy. I had hoped that one or two Conservative Members would come to the House to express their concern on this issue. Alas, that is not the case.

In case anybody thinks that the Government have changed their mind, I can say that that is not so. In the consultation document that preceded the Bill, the President of the Board of Trade said:

"We do not propose to use the Bill to amend the Fair Trading Act newspaper merger provisions. The original rationale for these provisions was that increasing concentration of newspaper ownership could threaten freedom and variety of expression in the press. We consider this rationale remains valid."

Those are the words of the President of the Board of Trade within the past 12 months. In other words, when it suits them, the Government accept that newspapers are a special case.

I could not put it better myself. However hard I try, I am unable to distinguish between a threat to newspaper diversity caused when a large corporation seeks to take over its rivals and a threat to diversity caused by a corporation that already has an enormous share of the market seeking to expand its share by a practice so blatantly unfair as predatory pricing. In any case, it is not strictly true that the Bill applies across the market. As the hon. Member for Eastleigh pointed out, schedules 2, 3 and 4—no doubt for good reasons, which I do not dispute—list all sorts of areas to which the new competition regime will not apply. It would be a simple matter to make an exception for newspapers. The Fair Trading Act is a healthy precedent. All that is required is the political will, which is the purpose of my amendment. In the absence of a miracle, I intend later to put the amendment to the vote.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: I support the amendment, which is not specifically anti-Murdoch or anti-News International. I declare an interest: I write reasonably regularly for The Sunday Times, which is, of course, part of News International. In the past few weeks, I have written about the potential catastrophic effects of the third way, the vulgarity and vast waste of the millennium dome and the abolition of the Lord Chancellor. I very much hope that I shall in future be given the opportunity to write other articles that are helpful to the Government. I do not attack News International or Rupert Murdoch and I am very happy to write for his newspapers and take his shilling.

The point needs to be made that this is a commercial Bill, the purpose of which is to regulate commercial dealings and promote the purifying oxygen of competition. It is a perfect Bill. It is strong and good in every respect except one: it fails to address the unique commercial position of the newspaper industry, which is worth £700 million a year and, notwithstanding that, succeeds in making an aggregate net loss of £50 million. Why is it unique? That question is essentially the argument that the Government have against the amendment. Why single out the newspaper industry?

I shall attempt to answer that in one sentence. No other major commercial undertaking is owned for the express and specific purpose of obtaining and using political power and influence. That is the difference between the newspaper industry and any other. Protestations to the contrary are not worth even considering.

The Sun did not run a banner headline, "It Was The Sun Wot Won It" because of mere vulgar braggadocio, but because it believed that it was true. The Prodi incident caused consternation not because it was an unedifying example of politicians operating at the behest of business men, but because the business man was Rupert Murdoch, who is, in effect, a strong and established politician.

What is the effect of that single difference between the newspaper industry and every other? I suggest that it has two effects. First, we have a legitimate interest in debating the industry in the House because it affects politics and democracy. The second effect, which is far more important in the context of the amendment, is that the political power that is wielded within the industry, which it conceals, distorts the commercial strategies of the market. The Bill deals with those commercial strategies and is predicated on commercial reality.

In normal commercial considerations, no commercial entity can or does afford, for a long period, to trade at a loss. It can do so only for a limited period to drive its competitors to the wall. That does not apply in the newspaper industry. The normal capitalist impulse to destroy one's competition is based always on the desire to obtain a monopoly position to manipulate price. That is not the motive in the newspaper industry, where the impulse is to destroy one's competitors to obtain a monopoly of power. That imports into the industry completely different commercial realities. One has only to test that against what has recently happened in the industry to realise that it is true.

Nobody but a commercial lunatic would have purchased The Independent for commercial reasons. It was purchased not because it is a commercial concern but because it is a newspaper and is likely, let us face it, to make a loss for a considerable period. Precisely the same may be said—topically—of the New Statesman. Nobody but a commercial lunatic would have purchased that, but it was purchased by a gentlemen of enormous commercial acuity, not because it would make a profit but because it is a newspaper.

The difference in the commercial considerations imported into the industry by the reason people use, purchase and run newspapers is extremely important for the purposes of clause 18. As we know, one must break two separate rules to transgress clause 18. The first relates to predatory pricing, which is set by Tetra Pak because of the European provisions of clause 60. There is no problem in the House with the conditions that Tetra Pak lays down. If one applies those rules there is a near certainty that Rupert Murdoch has been predatorily pricing with News International and, in particular, with The Times. I cannot tell the House that that is true because I am not privy to the inner workings of News International, but every objective test suggests that Rupert Murdoch has transgressed the Tetra Pak principle. That is not the problem, which is why amendment No. 8, which bears my name, does not even contemplate examining predatory pricing.

The single issue here is what is domination in the market, and, on that issue, the newspaper industry is different from others. The reason the Bill and European legislation and jurisprudence apply only to dominance in the marketplace is that that is the only place where it matters. No one who is not dominant in the marketplace will predatorily price. If they do, it will not be for long because if they do not hold a dominant position in the marketplace, predatory pricing is commercial suicide. Ultimately, if such a war is started, the person who holds the dominant position will always win on the well-known General Haig principle that there will always be one man left standing at the end. That is why legislation, in commercial terms, applies itself to the dominant position in the marketplace.

That does not apply to newspapers because the reasons for using and owning them mean that those with a substantial share in the marketplace will sustain losses for years, as News International has done, to break their competitors not commercially but politically and to gain a greater political share. The implicit danger is commercial. News International holds 33 per cent. of the market. I have to say to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) that, under any test, 33 per cent. will not be enough to guarantee that a court or the Office of Fair Trading will find that a company holds a dominant position in the marketplace.

A little law that I know proves that that is the case. The United Brands or Michelin test, which began its life in the ninth or 10th version of the Commission's report on competition, is that dominance exists if the nature and structure of the market enable a company to act independently of competition. I shall not bore hon. Members to tears with the reasons, but my view, which coincides with those of other silks who have been quoted, is that that test will not guarantee a finding of a dominant market position for Murdoch's empire or any other newspaper empire in this country.

If the House is to safeguard the principles that my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) articulated so well—the democracy of the House and the continuation of a healthy, democratic newspaper industry to support it—the only way for it to do so is for the House, united, one hopes, without party, to vote for the amendment.

Mr. Winnick: It has been said that amendments Nos. 1 and 8 and new clause 1 do not refer to Mr. Murdoch, but we all know that we are debating the Murdoch clauses, and there is no doubt whom we have in mind.

I do not regard Mr. Murdoch as being responsible for all, or necessarily most, of the ills of the media world. If, for example, we looked at The Independent, we would probably conclude that it had been an excellent newspaper and that, unfortunately, a decline took place. The Independent started as a very good newspaper—it was highly welcome—but, in the past two or three years, it was undoubtedly the author of its own decline. I am pleased that, as a result of a change of editor, there now seems to be a good prospect that The Independent will be the type of newspaper that one wants to see, and will provide honest competition for the other broadsheets. One need only compare The Independent with what it was under some previous editors and my point is made.

8.30 pm

I might be accused of making a wrong point, but I do not believe so, when I say that some of the anti-Murdoch sentiments come from those who dislike the political line that he—or at least his newspapers—is advancing on the single currency and against economic and monetary union. I support amendment No. 1, despite the question that I shall now pose. If the Murdoch newspapers—The Times and The Sun—were very pro economic and monetary union, and were in favour of Britain joining the single currency at the first opportunity, would there be the same amount of criticism? Undoubtedly, my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) would not change his opinion—he would be making the speech that he has just made, and doing very well indeed—but I wonder whether some of the critics are motivated by the line on the European Union that Mr. Murdoch or at least his newspapers are advancing.

The other broadsheets, The Guardian and The Daily Telegraph which have also been mentioned, are excellent newspapers, well able to look after their own, and one hopes that that continues to be the position, even if I would not tend to support the politics of those newspapers—especially, of course, of The Daily Telegraph.

There are three main reasons why I believe that new clause 1 and amendments Nos. 1 and 8 are necessary. First, the point has been made, and cannot be reiterated too often in the debate, that the pricing of The Times is unfair—that the purpose of such pricing arrangements is to drive competitors out of business. When recently I had a meeting—with one other colleague—with the editor of The Times, the fact that such pricing arrangements would drive competitors, especially The Independent, out of business was hotly denied, as though the thought had never come into the mind of those who control the Murdoch newspapers in this country.

We know that that is nonsense. We know that the sole purpose—perhaps it is unfair to say that, but one of the main purposes—of the pricing of The Times as it is at the moment in comparison to its broadsheet rivals is to drive at least one, perhaps two, of those rivals out of business. We also know—the point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) when he moved amendment No. 1—that if The Times was not so heavily subsidised by all the other Murdoch outlets, it would simply not be possible to have such a pricing arrangement. That is the first reason why I am, and have been for some time, very critical of what is happening. If The Independent were forced out of business, that would undoubtedly be a serious blow to the broadsheet market, to British politics and to British democracy.

The letter that we have received from the executives of The Daily Telegraph and The Guardian, containing the views of the lawyer, Mr. Fowler, has been mentioned. I agree that the executives have an interest, but Mr. Fowler's views should be noted.

The second reason why I am opposed to the present situation regarding the Murdoch media empire is that far too much media power is undoubtedly concentrated in the ownership of Mr. Murdoch—in Britain, as has been stated, in Australia and in the United States. I do not believe that that is desirable, or that it is healthy in a democracy. The danger is that if other broadsheets went out of business—certainly if The Independent did so—that would give the Murdoch press empire even more power than it has. That is why I say that that concentration of media outlets in the hands of Mr. Murdoch, not only in the press, but very much in television, is undesirable. One would hope that the Government would recognise that and act accordingly.

My third reason is somewhat different. In my view, Mr. Murdoch believes that he has any Government in Britain in his pocket and that his power—that word is very appropriate in this context—is such that no one in the main stream of British politics or, to put it more clearly, the two main parties, whether in government or not, is likely to take any position that will endanger his press empire. Although I appreciate what the Liberal Democrats have done in another place and here, I nevertheless have to say that, if they stood a realistic chance of forming the next Government, it is not likely, although I may be wrong, that they would be pushing new clause 1 with as much enthusiasm as they have been, and it is more than likely that they would be adopting the same position as the Conservative Opposition.

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; he realises that he has offered me a bait that I cannot refuse. I was not aware that he had some magical orb in his hand with which he could predict the future electoral success of any political party in this country. Perhaps he would reveal the secret.

Mr. Winnick: I am merely saying that it is interesting to note the attitudes of political parties. The Conservative Opposition, for example, are staying silent. They certainly will not vote for the amendments; that was made clear at a previous stage of the Bill's passage. The reason is pretty obvious: they do not want to give Mr. Murdoch the impression that they will act, or vote, in any way that will cause him offence.

That is the sort of power that Mr. Murdoch has. His feeling is that, with all the media power that he already possesses, he has the Government in his pocket. I do not believe that my Government are in his pocket at all, but I do believe that there is a feeling—I am speaking as frankly as I can on the Floor of the House—that, in order to be re-elected, we should not do anything by way of legislation that will give offence to the person who owns so much of the media in this country.

I think that that feeling is highly undesirable, and that it is not—I hope that it is not—the purpose of British democracy for one person virtually to decide who should be the Government of the day. It is not for one person, be it through The Sun or The Times—but especially the tabloid Sun—to say, in effect, that if the Government displease Mr. Murdoch, he will campaign to get them out of office. At the moment—I am being as frank as I can—both the Government, whom I enthusiastically support, and the main alternative Government give the impression that they do not want to take any action that would offend Mr. Murdoch.

I conclude by saying that in a democracy, there are bound to be—there always have been in this country, I suppose—powerful people in the media world, such as the late Lord Beaverbrook who was mentioned, who hold a good deal of power. I suppose that, by the very nature of capitalism, that is bound to be the case. Mr. Murdoch is somewhat exceptional in that he has more power than previous media tycoons. He would like to concentrate even more power in his empire and the time has come for the Government, and certainly for Parliament, to say that enough is enough. The most effective way in which to do that is to accept the amendments and the new clause.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Unusually, I want to support the Government's line and oppose the amendments. I cannot support the amendments because the Government's definition of predatory pricing in the Bill is perfectly adequate to deal with the situation. What has been added to that is an explosion of impotent anger against Rupert Murdoch, and the reasons for that are many and varied. My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) is obviously upset because Rupert Murdoch is voicing the views of British people on the euro. Others do not like The Sun on taste grounds and some, particularly on the left, do not like Rupert Murdoch's politics. As we spent more than 20 years attacking the politics of The Sun and have now come to accept so many of them, that is a rather curious ground on which to attack Mr. Murdoch.

Some hon. Members, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and the Liberal Democrats, do not like the fact that Rupert Murdoch is so close to the Government. The Liberal Democrats would rather that the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was close to the Government. I do not agree with any of those notions because they do not seem to do anybody any credit. I certainly do not come to praise Rupert Murdoch, but I certainly do not intend to bury him. I admire him as a stirrer and a brilliant newspaper man, many of whose actions have been good for the newspaper industry. I also admire him as a risk-taker and innovator who successfully gave us Sky television. When I say that I admire him, I do so with no implication of vested interests.

Mr. Radice: My hon. Friend used to do a television programme for him.

Mr. Mitchell: As my hon. Friend reminds us, I used to do a television programme for Rupert Murdoch but, thanks to one of his many commercial mistakes, my programme was dropped. That shows that even Rupert Murdoch is capable of bad judgment. The Sky television management have gone flabby because they took off the best current affairs programme on the network. I am trying to look at the matter in the light of the arguments, decide on the facts, and do myself a little credit with the Government. A reshuffle is coming and my hopes are strong. I have not yet received any word from Downing street, although I sit at home every night waiting for the phone not to ring. I hope that my speech will encourage the process. I want the Newcastle Brown award for meritorious conduct in this matter.

Mr. Ian McCartney: On the grounds of clarification and job insecurity, may I ask my hon. Friend whether he is after my job?

Mr. Mitchell: Certainly not. I could not do it anything like as well as my hon. Friend after all those conversations we had.

We should oppose the amendments for a number of reasons, the first of which is that it is wrong to use a Bill that deals with competition to reduce competition and increase prices. What on earth will we achieve by increasing prices? That is a distortion of the Bill's role. If there is a problem about Murdoch's share of the market, let us have the guts to tackle it directly rather than in a back-door, covert way.

Mr. Mullin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mitchell: No. We can all whinge about Rupert Murdoch. I am slightly embarrassed because I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). Like him, I am on the extreme left of the party. I am there because the party has moved so far to the right behind me. My hon. Friend and I are all that is left and I am a Gaitskellite.

Murdoch has been successful: The Sun is a success. He kept it alive and boosted it to a mass circulation newspaper. He kept Today alive far longer than would have been the case under any other management. The Times and The Sunday Times have been built up into successful papers. It is true that there is a threat to The Independent, but that is The Independent's fault, not Rupert Murdoch's. If The Independent has gone off, it is because it is no longer independent, has lost its way and has been a wandering, bad paper. It has pulled itself together and enormously improved, but the fault lies with The Independent, not with the attack on it by predatory pricing.

I did not notice The Independent being particularly squeamish, when it set up The Independent On Sunday, about deliberately smashing The Sunday Correspondent, which it duly did; The Sunday Correspondent sank. We did not get this concern and desire for protection then.

I do not notice The Daily Telegraph avoiding predatory pricing. About a quarter of its circulation is sold on much-reduced subscription rates and it gives away 33,000 copies. I love it, but I much prefer reading it for free and I am happy to be deluged with free copies wherever I go. However, that is another form of unfair, unreasonable competition. Why is the paper whingeing about predatory pricing when it gives copies away on that scale?

8.45 pm

Competition is endemic in the newspaper industry. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) is wrong to say that we are talking about a lust for power. We are talking about someone's pride in their product—in their newspaper. Does my hon. Friend not want his articles to be read by the maximum number of readers? Is that not what journalism is all about—competition? If we suppress competition in terms of pricing, will it not come back in all sorts of other ways?

I grew up in a home that was weighed down with encyclopaedias because predatory-pricing newspapers had been going from door to door, giving encyclopaedias away with a subscription to this and that newspaper. We never read any of them. We never read the papers, but we were festooned with encyclopaedias.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews rose—

Mr. Mitchell: I know that my hon. and learned Friend is going to say that I should have read the newspapers and encyclopaedias, and that I would not be making this speech if I had done so. I am not going to give way.

[Mr. Mitchell]

In any case, what has predatory pricing done for Rupert Murdoch? He has the same proportion of sales now that he had in 1988. The only newspaper that has gone under in the intervening period is his own paper, Today, so what has predatory pricing done for him? Is it such a powerful threat?

To go on in this fashion about predatory pricing assumes that people are stupid. Price is only a marginal factor in buying newspapers. Most people buy a newspaper because they identify with it. They feel that it expresses their character.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): My hon. Friend has just said that he got The Daily Telegraph for free.

Mr. Mitchell: In my case, I hope to buy more newspapers than that. My point is that getting them for free does not kill newspapers. It widens the circulation of quality newspapers. However, in the main, people buy a newspaper because they feel comfortable with it and it expresses their personality. They have an empathy and bond with it; that is what it is all about. It is not about the price being reduced one day a week. People look for quality.

A symptom is that red-top newspapers are all losing circulation while that of the quality papers is increasing, a helpful and hopeful sign. However, the Daily Express lost circulation when it lost its way. Fortunately, it has pulled itself together recently, but it is the fault of newspapers when they lose circulation. They cannot establish that empathy with their readers any longer because they do not have a personality with which readers can identify.

That point is what we need to emphasise, not predatory pricing, which is a marginal factor in such decisions. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South says that he wants diversity. So do I, but I do not want it at the expense of closing other newspapers. The enemy is bad newspapers and newspapers without character or identity, not predatory pricing. That is a failure of the newspapers. Therefore, I cannot support the amendments. They are mostly an expression of anger at Rupert Murdoch—an impotent and somewhat pathetic rage against the man—which does not become us.

I say loyally that the amendments are not a critique of our leader, who is on close terms with Rupert Murdoch. I am not going to put myself in the position of criticising our leader in any way, but, more importantly for practical purposes, what is proposed will not work. I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham will even vote for his amendment because he will not want to rebel against the Government, so why are we wasting our time with this futility?

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): This is an excellent Bill, which will be even further improved if the Government find it in their heart to accept the amendments. I want to deal with the particular point that the Government have made: they see no case for creating a special clause to deal with circumstances in the newspaper industry.

It has been put to the House this afternoon that the newspaper industry is a special case, for a number of reasons. The first is that newspapers are, above all else, a means of circulation of information—a free, unfettered and generally competitive circulation of information, which is vital to a healthy civil society. The Government are committed to recasting civil society—we want more people to be volunteers, to be aware of their rights, to be involved in local authorities and so on. We cannot shape a healthy civil society without the freest possible flow of information. A monopoly in newspapers, predatory pricing by newspapers, or an unhealthy dominance by any individual newspaper proprietor fatally hinders the free flow of information. That is the first reason why the newspaper industry is different and why specific measures are needed to deal with undue dominance and monopoly.

The second reason, which has been touched on by my hon. Friends, is the relationship between newspapers and politics. It is nonsense to argue, as some of my hon. Friends have done, that people go into newspapers because they want to make a profit. Beaverbrook, the archetypal proprietor, said it clearest and said it best—as he said so many things—when he said that he owned his newspapers to make propaganda. People become newspaper proprietors not because of profit—there are easier ways to make a return on their money—but for political and social influence and power. It must be unhealthy in politics for there to be undue dominance and monopoly in political and social power and influence.

Because of the importance of freedom of information and the free flow of information, and because of the relationship between newspapers and politics, it is all too easy to make a special case for dealing with monopoly and undue dominance in the newspaper industry. I declare an interest as one of the few remaining members of the parliamentary Labour party who will admit to having picketed Wapping by candlelight at the beginning of the 1980s.

My point is not an ad hominem point about Murdoch—it is that twice in recent times the Murdoch empire has driven a coach and horses through the clear intentions of monopoly legislation. The first time was when Murdoch acquired The Times. Anyone who doubts me needs only to read Harold Evans's book about that acquisition. Harold Evans is one of the legion of ex-Murdoch executives. He makes it perfectly clear in his very carefully documented book—as one might expect from one of the leading journalists of our generation—that the way Murdoch acquired The Times was wrong, was in breach of the legislation, and was based on a phoney presentation of statistics and undue pressure on the politicians of the time. Murdoch drove a coach and horses through the clear intentions of politicians when he acquired The Times.

The second time was Murdoch's acquisition of Sky, on top of his control of the newspaper and magazine market. I served on the Committee that shaped the regulations covering Sky and other outlets. It was clear to me that, for a second time, Murdoch was being allowed to get away with it—through his power, through politicians' fear of him and through the need not to be seen to cross Rupert Murdoch.

Now, at the beginning of this Administration, we have a Competition Bill and an opportunity to deal with the issue of undue dominance and monopoly in the media. Many people outside the House will not understand if we do not do something. We do not need to look in the crystal ball; we can read the book. Time after time, in Britain, Australia and America, Murdoch has driven his way through the intentions of the people and the legislators on the issue of monopolies. We have an opportunity, which will not come again, to deal with the issue. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider accepting the amendment, even at this late hour.

Mr. Beard: It must make bad legislation first to find a villain and then to find the legislation by which to condemn him. We are in danger of doing just that if we follow some of the arguments that have been deployed in this debate. The real issue is whether the rules that apply in a vast range of industries to abuse of a dominant position—or anti-competitive behaviour—apply also to the newspaper industry, or whether that industry requires special treatment.

The Standing Committee considered the clause that had been included by the other place—which deemed that special treatment was required—and removed it from the Bill for very good reasons. The first reason was that the clause did not meet certain of the Bill's principles—such as that it should be universally applicable right across industry, thereby giving it greater clarity. The second was that the Bill should be consistent with European legislation, so that the two legislative regimes could evolve in harmony. The third was that the clause introduced absurdities. The fourth was that the clause introduced a test for predatory pricing that was completely inappropriate and at odds with European precedent.

Each of the proposals in this group falls for one or more of those reasons. New clause 1—taking the proposals in reverse order—like the clause from the other place, speaks of any activity that reduces diversity. Applying that definition produces some absurd examples. Is a newspaper that recruits many gifted writers and attracts readers towards it and away from another newspaper, thereby endangering that other newspaper's existence, to stop recruiting talented writers? Of course not. Many other examples can be concocted to demonstrate the absurdity of the definition.

Amendment No. 8 would reduce the threshold in distinguishing whether there is a dominant position. However, when the matter is analysed and considered within the European context, it is doubtful whether there is such a distinction to be made. The European regime introduces a definition of dominant position that can catch abuse of dominant position in the newspaper industry if there is such a dominant position. In many of the examples cited in this debate, there seems to be an assumption that there is a dominant position for The Times, although very few facts and figures have been quoted to demonstrate it.

Currently, a dominant position will be interpreted as one in which anyone can operate without regard to competition or customers. That definition may very well apply to someone who is using cross-subsidisation from another business to operate predatory pricing. The solution for such practice is for the Director General of Fair Trading to investigate the matter according to the precepts that are already included in clause 18, to reach a conclusion and to operate accordingly. There is no evident reason why newspapers require a special definition of dominant position that is any different from that applying to any other part of industry.

Amendment No. 1 is very close to the likely definition in European legislation of dominant position. The weakness of including that specific definition in the Bill is that we would freeze the definition at the time when the legislation is passed, whereas European definition of dominant position might evolve and diverge from the Bill's definition. There is therefore a weakness that we will end up with two divergent pieces of legislation, whereas the intention was to have them in close harmony.

I do not think that any of the cases that have been cited in this debate justify a belief that clause 18 cannot deal with abuses and anti-competitive behaviour in the newspaper industry. The amendments are also in danger of introducing absurdities and breaking from some of the Bill's very basic principles—such as its universality and consistency with Europe.

I do not believe that the situation has changed since the Committee considered the Bill. I therefore believe that all three proposals in this group should be rejected, and that the principles applying in the newspaper world should be those stated in clause 18.

Dr. Ladyman: Some of my hon. Friends have railed against Mr. Murdoch and that is fine by me. I hold no candle for Mr. Murdoch and—short of my growing mammaries—I doubt whether he will ever say anything nice about me. I certainly hold no brief to defend his position. Nevertheless, I do not believe that my hon. Friends have shown that the Bill does not deal unamended with the position as they perceive it.

Let me reiterate how the Bill works. Clause 18 defines what cannot be done and who cannot do it. Clause 60 pulls in all European case law in order to define what is not allowed and who cannot do it. As a result of clause 60, anything that we can scrape out of European case law can be used. The provision is not optional. It does not say, "You may," or "You can if you want to." There is no choice in the matter. The Bill provides that European case law must be used in interpreting the Bill.

9 pm

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) said earlier, that includes the Tetra Pak judgment, which provides a mechanistic definition of what predatory pricing involves. Under a mechanistic definition it is not necessary to prove intent. Previous investigations into what Mr. Murdoch and The Times have been doing failed because at the moment it is necessary to prove intent. When that is no longer necessary, as my hon. and learned Friend said, given what everyone is alleging about Mr. Murdoch's predatory pricing activity, if the figures can be demonstrated to prove that, he will be found guilty and prevented from predatory pricing. I do not know whether the figures will prove that or whether the arguments used by The Times are true and the newspaper is not selling below cost. If it is selling below cost, it will be dead meat.

The only question arises in respect of dominant position. As I said earlier, European case law in United Brands v. the Commission says that organisations or individuals may be acting from a dominant position if they can influence the market and have the power from other sources to act independently. It uses almost identical language to amendment No. 1, so in my view amendment No.1 is superfluous. If that is the case and my hon. Friend the Minister confirms my interpretation when he replies to the debate, I assume that my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) will not find it necessary to press the amendment to a vote as the provision is already in the Bill.

Amendment No.8 seeks to introduce a new definition of dominant position in respect of newspapers, including the word "substantial". Under European case law, it is not necessary to have 80 per cent. of a holding in a marketplace to be dominant. European case law specifically says that a holding of 40 to 45 per cent. is almost certainly dominant and that a holding of as little as 20 per cent. might be dominant given the right circumstances. If we interpret "substantial" as being different from "dominant" and representing a lower threshold—otherwise the amendment would have no purpose—the amendment is saying that a holding of less than 20 per cent. of the market might represent a "substantial" position and could therefore result in anti-competitive practice. I am sorry to say that that would bring in not only The Times but all the other broadsheet newspapers that would be in a "substantial" position.

Mr. Mullin: My hon. Friend makes my point for me. The amendment is not an anti-Murdoch amendment, as it would apply to anyone—including The Daily Telegraph or the Daily Mirror—who attempted to engage in predatory pricing.

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is certainly right, but if the definition of predatory pricing according to the Tetra Pak judgment is selling below the cost of production and making a loss on a consistent basis, that is doubly the definition of The Independent. The day we knock on Mr. Murdoch's door and say, "You must stop doing this because you are breaking the law," he will say, "If you bring me to court, I want The Independent taken to court with me because it is also making a loss. It has a substantial holding in the marketplace and is every bit as covered by amendment No.8 as I am." That is why amendment No.8 is dangerous as well as unnecessary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) described the absurdities that the new clause would introduce. Under new clause 1, an attempt by The Independent or The Guardian to hire new and better journalists to improve their newspapers could be defined as acting to try to close down competitors. That makes a nonsense of the Bill. The Bill, as the Government have defined it, is strong enough to deal with Murdoch and The Times if it can be shown that Murdoch is selling below the cost of production. If my hon. Friends who fear that that is what he is doing are right, the Bill as it stands is already perfectly adequate to deal with such behaviour. I call on my hon. Friends to reject the amendments and the new clause.

Mr. Boswell: I rise with some diffidence on behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition to intrude on what is clearly the Labour party's private grief. This has certainly been an interesting and illuminating debate, perhaps characterised more by heat than light. It has been characterised more precisely by hon. Members' vain attempts to distil their dislike of a particular individual—Rupert Murdoch—and his empire into a series of penal measures that would be imposed on that empire.

I should make it clear from the start that the Conservative party is not against competition. Indeed, we Conservatives favour vigorous competition. Our reservations about the Bill more generally reflect the fact that it does not always achieve the objectives that it claims to seek. As a party, we are not in favour of predatory pricing or the abuse of a dominant position. As the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) made fairly clear, the issue is whether the measures proposed in the clutch of amendments are appropriate to the ills that are seen.

I should like to make it clear, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) did in Committee, that we accept that, in certain specific cases, competition legislation, as it has operated in this country over the years under different Governments, may be required to address some specific problems concerning the newspaper industry. It is clearly appropriate to legislation on mergers and the allocation of titles.

Although I do not have a detailed knowledge of the genesis of legislation, it is fair to say that one of the major concerns was that titles might disappear or be bought for the purpose of closing them down. Regardless of whether that is the intention of any individual in the present scene, we have clearly not failed to secure vigorous competition among broadsheets and tabloids—as well as, increasingly, dare I say, between them—and a wide range of differing titles. That may change. One reason for such a change, to pick up a point made earlier, may be the falling away of the propensity of persons to buy titles that are making losses, in order to advocate a particular position. At the moment, however, we have a very lively newspaper scene and must therefore identify what specific ill the amendments address.

We look forward to the Minister's remarks. I agree with recent comments that a case has not yet been made that any problem can be tackled in the way that is suggested. I apologise to the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) for picking up only a few of his latter remarks. I turn particularly to the remarks of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), who clearly dislikes Murdoch—an opinion to which he is entitled. He moved round several different ways in which the Murdoch problem, as he sees it, could be addressed. It could be predatory pricing, the abuse of a dominant position, something done in the past, motive or effect. It was difficult to pin down how it was to be tackled.

I wish to refer to the most likely of the candidates—the predatory pricing test. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham pointed out in Committee, it is very difficult in practice to differentiate that consideration from ordinary commercial pricing and keen marketing. As has been mentioned—I declare an interest in this—many of us benefit from subscription arrangements, either to daily newspapers or periodicals which are priced at a considerably lower figure than would apply if we were to buy them day-by-day at the newsagents. Other people may be able to intercept a copy given away on their way to work. There is a wide variety of effective pricing arrangements.

How on earth can we find what is predatory and what is not? That is still not clear to me. It is clear that if one seeks a remedy along those lines, it could be encompassed by the Bill as drafted and it should be possible to do so by generality, rather than by a specific case.

Another possibility would be to look at predatory pricing in terms of cost, and that was addressed. However, it is clear that most national newspapers, by definition, price themselves at below the cost of production or at an uneconomic level. They make that up by advertising, or they may run at a loss from time to time. One should look at another test, which is that of a formerly dominant position, I was interested in the exchanges that have just taken place, because it is possible to synthesise the situation in which—to take the case of the argument by the hon. Member for South Thanet—a newspaper might have a substantial position in the market; shall we say The Times. However, The Daily Telegraph, which sells many more copies, might have, within the terms of the Bill, a dominant position—so those two newspapers could be subsisting. However, it is not clear whether they would be subjected to the same or different tests.

I mention those examples because I feel that it is difficult to pick our way through to a fungible solution to what I am far from convinced is an actual problem, given the strength and diversity of the press and the weapons that the Bill will give the Government as part of their general approach to competition legislation. This is essentially an argument between the soul and the head of the Labour party as to the way forward. We shall look forward to the Minister of State's effort to wrestle with what are, in the words of the preacher, "doots" among his colleagues.

In conclusion—this is in no sense an attempt to subvert Government Back Benchers, or to discourage them from supporting the Minister; that is a matter for them—in declining to oppose the Government's position, as I anticipate it to be, I would commend the Government on a strange phenomenon. Their characteristic phenomenon is to find a public ill—or, if they cannot find one, to invent one or make a fuss about one—and then to tackle it with a great flourish. People are named and shamed, and action is taken, or threatened to be taken. Something is done about it, particularly if the focus groups say that something should be done.

Quite exceptionally, unusually and, in this case, sensibly, the Government have not bowed to the pressure to produce a specific remedy for a specific ill. They are relying, wisely, on principles of general application. We shall listen to the Minister of State with interest, and I am sure that, his hon. Friends will be listening with even greater interest. We shall—as they say in the history books—then await events.

Mr. Ian McCartney: My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) asked me to find it in my heart to support the amendments. No one can accuse me of being anything but a big-hearted person, but tonight I am not going to let my heart rule my head. We want intelligent decision making.

The Bill is not about ownership; it is about dealing with abuses of dominance and other anti-competitive behaviour. It will provide much stronger powers to deal with such behaviour. The media industry will continue to be subject to the existing merger control and newspaper merger regimes under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and to media ownership regulations under the Broadcasting Act 1990.

The Government have made clear their belief in the importance of a strong, diverse and independent press. That is why we are keeping the special merger provisions for newspapers in the Fair Trading Act, which protect plurality of ownership and diversity of content. The Bill deals with anti-competitive practices, which are wrong wherever they occur. The Government believe that abuses of dominance, such as predatory pricing, should be stamped out whatever the market. Clause 18 clearly covers firms that abuse their dominance by predatory pricing, which is vital.

9.15 pm

The principles established in European case law will apply under the Bill by virtue of clause 60(2) which makes it clear that there must be no inconsistency between the principles applied by courts in applying a domestic prohibition and those laid down by "the European Court, and any relevant decision of that Court".

The principles on predatory pricing established in AKZO and Tetra Pak will apply under the Bill.

Hon. Members have referred to briefings sent to them by executives of The Independent and The Daily Telegraph newspapers and to the opinion of the Queen's counsel that those briefings quote. It is important to distinguish between allegations about The Times and questions of principle about the interpretation of the Bill, but The Independent and The Daily Telegraph executives mix them together to suit themselves. The briefings entirely wrongly imply that what the Government have said about the European Court case law is dubious. I do not accept the assertion that "many lawyers disagree with this interpretation".

I have seen nothing to back up that assertion, and no hon. Member has said anything tonight to persuade me that it is right. On the contrary, even those who have tabled the amendments have, in their arguments, accepted that the European Court case law is very clear on the relevant points.

The suggestion in the briefings that Rupert Murdoch can operate with immunity from competition law should be treated with the disdain that it deserves. I take exception to the fact that hon. Members have said that the Government are in the pocket of Rupert Murdoch. The socialist Member for Makerfield in Rupert Murdoch's pocket? No one can say that I have ever worn a Sun lover's T-shirt.

Hon. Members should consider what the Government have done in the past few weeks: we have introduced automatic recognition, removing Wilson and Palmer—which allowed the newspaper industry to discriminate against employees on the ground of their trade union membership—and permitting those sacked for taking part in lawful industrial action to claim unfair dismissal. Moreover, we have introduced a national minimum wage, against which The Times has campaigned, and continues to campaign, vigorously.

This is a Government of fairness, not favours. No one can suggest that a Government in the pocket of Rupert Murdoch could introduce such workers' rights legislation. It is nonsense, and Labour Members should not claim that the Government are in the pocket of a vested interest. The Government are in the pocket of no vested interest. We were elected to tackle vested interests, which is precisely what we are doing in the Bill.

Mr. Winnick: I did not say that the Government were in the pocket of Murdoch. I said the opposite: that

[Mr. Winnick]

Murdoch believes that he has in his pocket the Government and the Conservative party, which is a highly undesirable state of affairs. That does not in any way mean that the Government, whom I support, are in Murdoch's pocket. Will my hon. Friend say whether he believes that the Murdoch empire has too much power and, if so, what steps should be taken to deal with that?

Mr. McCartney: I thank my hon. Friend for that clarification. I think that I made the Government's position on dealing with vested interests absolutely clear. I accept what I believe was an attempted apology, but it is invidious to give the impression, inside or outside the House, that the Government are treating anyone differently. That is not the case. We are a Government of fairness, not favours.

Much has been said about the actions of News International and The Times. It would be wrong of me to comment on whether the actions of an individual undertaking are or are not anti-competitive, as that is a matter for the competition authorities, both under the Bill and under existing legislation. The House should note, however, that the director general has asked News International to provide detailed information about The Times, to enable him to assess the impact on its competitors of its trading strategy.

I am surprised that that was not mentioned in the debate, especially by those who spoke in favour of new clause 1. This is the proper way forward. I do not accept the arguments of those who are out to get The Times and who say that, if its actions are not caught by the legislation, we must alter it to catch them.

That is not the purpose of the Bill or of the legislative programme. If someone has a case against Murdoch or any other individual, he can pursue that case, but we cannot distort the Bill as has been suggested. That would undermine the concept of the Bill, and our ability to prevent abusive and anti-competitive behaviour in the marketplace. Let us remember that, when such abuse takes place, small, medium and large enterprises suffer, and it is the responsibility of the House to improve legislation to prevent that from happening and to ensure that, if it does happen, we have the capacity to stop it and to take action to ensure that any loss is recognised.

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a problem in the newspaper industry that should be dealt with in the Bill? If the Bill were to fail to deal with the problem, what action would he take to remedy it?

Mr. McCartney: I thought that I made it clear that such matters are for the competition authorities. We are responsible for providing a legislative framework, and we have not only done that but improved on the existing framework. We oppose the amendments and the new clause because we do not believe that the framework is inadequate; we believe that it is rigorous and that it is constituted in the context of European jurisprudence, taking account of articles 85 and 86. It has been recognised from the outset as the only way of ensuring that we have an effective regime to deal with anti-competitive behaviour, including predatory pricing.

I want to make it clear from the outset that I sympathise with the thinking behind amendment No. 1. I entirely appreciate the fact that the object is to clarify what is meant by dominance under the Bill, drawing on the relevant EC jurisprudence. I and other Ministers have defined dominance in similar terms in debates in Parliament. We have no quarrel with the definition itself. I have no objection to the description of dominance set out in the amendment, as far as it goes. It is consistent with the explanations that I and other Ministers have given.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) for highlighting these important principles of interpretation. There is common ground between us on the substance, but the amendment itself is unacceptable. It could inadvertently do serious damage to the central policy of the Bill, which is to align the domestic prohibition of abuse with that of article 86.

European jurisprudence is clear that dominance means a position of economic strength that enables an undertaking to hinder the maintenance of effective competition on the relevant market by allowing it to behave to an appreciable extent independently of its competitors, of its customers and, ultimately, of the consumer. That test is laid down in case law, for example in the Michelin case.

Those EC principles of interpretation will apply under the Bill, by virtue of clause 60. Subsection (2) makes it clear that there must be no inconsistency between the principles applied by the courts in applying the domestic prohibition, and those laid down by the European Court, and any relevant decision of that Court.

Market share is not determinative of dominance, but it is an important factor. The Commission has expressed the view that while, in general, companies with market shares below 40 per cent. are unlikely to be regarded as dominant, undertakings with market shares as low as 20 per cent. may none the less be dominant if the nature and structure of the market enable them to act independently of competition.

Clause 60(3) requires our courts to have regard to relevant statements of the Commission, such as this one, in applying the domestic prohibition. Therefore, the assessment of dominance under the Bill will need to have regard to the Commission's statements. In short, the principles of interpretation on dominance, which are established in EC case law, will apply under the Bill.

Either the words of the amendment correctly define what is a dominant position under Community law, in which case they are unnecessary because that definition is already supplied through clause 60, or the words do not set out the test correctly and fully, in which case they should not be included. Where unnecessary provisions are inserted in legislation, they tend to go septic—that is to say that the courts look for some meaning to give them, rather than accept that they were not intended to have any effect of substance. In that way, in time they are likely to have effects that were entirely unintended. That uncertainty could cause business a major problem. If the latter interpretation were to prevail, it could lead to a UK prohibition being interpreted significantly differently to article 86.

The amendment would freeze the position in domestic legislation. That would carry the risk of the application of the domestic law diverging from that of EC law in an important area. As we stressed many times in Committee, we should not seek to specify or alter how the prohibitions themselves apply, but should rely on the governing principles clause. So, while I sympathise with the thinking behind the amendment, I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that it would be seriously counterproductive in practice. Having heard my assurances on the meaning of dominance under the Bill, and the principles of EC jurisprudence on the matter, I hope that he will be prepared to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment No. 8 tackles the issue by lowering the threshold of what is "dominant" in the national newspaper market. I see no justification for treating newspapers differently in that respect. Frankly, it smacks of fixing the legislation to catch The Times regardless of the proper merits of the case.

I have explained carefully what is meant by dominance in the Bill. That is a soundly based test drawing on established European jurisprudence. It would be wrong to replace that with a different test which would in any case be highly uncertain.

Mr. Redwood: Is the Minister saying that under the definition that he prefers The Times clearly is not dominant?

Mr. McCartney: The right hon. Gentleman is trying to be far too clever by half, as is his nature. I set out clearly what the Bill does, which is to provide a legal framework to deal with abuse of dominance in the marketplace, including predatory pricing. Whether someone is abusing the marketplace through predatory pricing is a matter for evidence, which should be taken properly by the competition authorities.

If the right hon. Gentleman has any bottle and if he thinks that the Government's policy is correct, he should go through the Lobby and support us on that basis. I assume that he will not do so, not because he wants to curry favour with News International, but because he believes that the Government's policies in that area are far too tough. He wants to be weak on competition policy and to allow abuses of dominance on occasions. Throughout the passage of the Bill, he has been at great pains to find ways out of dealing with those types of abuses in the marketplace. It is no surprise to me, even at this late hour, that he is still attempting in a few weasel words to place the Government in an unfavourable position. Once again, he has failed spectacularly—well, that got that out of the way.

New clause 1 introduces a press diversity prohibition and is similar to the clause that was thrown out in Committee. The earlier clause was wholly unworkable. I am glad to say that the supporters of new clause 1 have half met the criticisms that I made in Committee. They could have met my criticisms fully by withdrawing the proposed clause altogether. They have replaced the earlier threshold of a substantial degree of market power with the Fair Trading Act 1973 threshold, broadly at 25 per cent. of market share. I have already explained that there is no justification for a lower threshold to apply solely in the newspaper sector.

We said that the previous clause was too wide ranging and that any conduct—legitimate or illegitimate—may reduce the diversity of national newspapers by reducing competition. Now it is suggested that the concept of anti-competitive behaviour should be built in. That might be an improvement, but I have yet to hear a proper justification for applying tests to the newspaper market that are different from the tests in the economy at large. If conduct is anti-competitive and constitutes an abuse, it should be dealt with, whatever the sector. That is what the Bill does, and I urge the House to reject the amendments.

Mr. Radice: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 8, in page 10, leave out lines 40 and 41 and insert

"'dominant position" means—

(a) in relation to the national newspaper market, a substantial degree of market power, and

(b) in relation to all other markets, a dominant position within the United Kingdom; and'.—[Mr. Mullin.]

GENERAL EXCLUSIONS

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I beg to move amendment No. 69, in page 53, line 38, leave out 'which'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 70 to 72, 11, 16, 26, 15, 28 to 32, and 38.

Mr. Griffiths: These are minor and tidying amendments. Government amendments Nos. 69, 70, 71 and 72 tighten the definition of "trading practices" in relation to the European economic area regulated markets, and bring it into line with the definition of practices in relation to recognised investment exchanges in the Financial Services Act 1986.

Government amendments Nos. 11 and 15 tidy up a matter which was dealt with in Committee. Clause 50, which was inserted in Committee, enables the Secretary of State by order to provide for any provision of part I to apply in relation to land or vertical agreements, with such modifications as may be prescribed.

Government amendments Nos. 16, 26, 28 to 32 and 38 are minor, and are part of the overhaul of the transitional provisions. I hope that the House will accept the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 70, in page 53, line 39, after '(a)', insert 'which'.

No. 71, in page 53, line 41, leave out '(b)' and insert 'and which'.

No. 72, in page 53, line 43, after '(c)', insert 'which'.—[Mr. Nigel Griffiths.]

9.45 pm

Mr. Redwood: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 53, leave out lines 44 to 49.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 51, in page 54, line 37, leave out from beginning of line to end of line 6 on page 55.

Mr. Redwood: It was a pity that the Minister of State, in responding to my intervention in the previous debate, chose to make a crude and inaccurate political point during what was meant to be a civilised exchange to elicit information about whether The Times was in a dominant position under different definitions.

The Minister of State alleged that the Opposition are keen to water down the competition legislation, and that, by implication, we favour anti-competitive practices. One of the principal purposes of this amendment is to show that the contrary is true. As we argued in Committee, so we argue on the Floor of the House; we believe that, in several important respects, the Bill is sadly lacking. It does not have sufficient bite to deal with potential abuses of the marketplace by monopolies. Indeed, the Bill could be more accurately called the competition and protection of monopolies Bill, particularly if one looks at schedule 3 and the enormous loophole it contains. That is what we are trying to excise with our amendment.

The House will know that I have declared two interests and my wife's interest in the Register of Members' Interests. The House should know that I am not furthering those interests by anything that I say or do in these debates.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: The right hon. Gentleman must clarify the statement he made in Committee on 21 May. He said:

"The Minister must know that our case against the Bill is that it is either unnecessary or premature . . . we are against it in principle."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 21 May 1998; c. 48.]

Mr. Redwood: That is quite right. We made it clear that we are against the Bill because we do not think that it fulfils what the Government say is a joint aim, which is to have a strong and fair competition policy in our country. We have said that we do not think that the Bill can fulfil the Government's aim of clarifying between European and British law and avoiding double jeopardy. We do not think that it would sharpen the attack of the British competition authorities on those revenue-producing monopolies that are most undesirable.

I am conscious, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that at this relatively late hour you will want me to keep strictly in order. With the Under-Secretary's agreement, I shall deal with the words that we are seeking to excise from the schedule.

We wish to leave out paragraph 4 of schedule 3 on page 53. It might be for the convenience of the House, since not all hon. Members have the schedule before them, to remind the House of the words. It is headed:

"Services of general economic interest etc."

It states:

"Neither the Chapter I prohibition nor the Chapter II prohibition"— the two effective prohibitions that the legislation is about—

"applies to an undertaking entrusted with the operation of services of general economic interest or having the character of a revenue-producing monopoly in so far as the prohibition would obstruct the performance, in law or in fact, of the particular tasks assigned to that undertaking."

I accept that the last line and a half offers some limitation on what is otherwise a breathtakingly wide definition of exceptions. However, I think that it would be possible for clever lawyers operating for revenue monopolies or even companies with a dominant position who claim that they have a general economic interest that they are delivering through their services, to draw the attention of the courts to the big loophole in the legislation. Some will doubtless use it to good effect.

In Committee, we moved a specific amendment to try to improve competition in the water industry. The Opposition are strongly committed to the idea that water services could be improved, and that water prices could be lowered if proper competition was introduced into the industry. We had an interesting debate in Committee, and I was delighted that the Under-Secretary expressed some sympathy for the general thrust of my argument about the need for more competition in the industry.

It is well known that the Labour Government have been critical of the standards and practices of some in that industry, and of some companies in the industry. The Opposition are no friend of poor services or of anti-competitive practices. We would like to see rapid progress in the case of water. It is one very big example where we think that paragraph 4 of schedule 3 would make the Under-Secretary's task more difficult in the courts, and perhaps in persuading his colleagues in the Government that some action should be taken. Indeed, with the Bill before the House, this is the obvious time, and the Bill is the obvious vehicle, to make the water industry more competitive, but the Government seem to want to throw away that heaven-sent opportunity, and they voted against our amendment accordingly.

I urge the Under-Secretary, even at this late stage, to see the wisdom of removing the words that we seek to excise from the Bill, or tabling another amendment so that the words will not be as damaging as I fear they could be. We must think again.

Dr. Ladyman: How nice it is to be arguing with the right hon. Gentleman again, rather than with my hon. Friends. The right hon. Gentleman said that the last line and a half of paragraph 4 provide some limitation. If he means the words beginning "in so far as", they provide an absolute limitation on the schedule. Why does he not believe that?

Mr. Redwood: There is nothing absolute about those words. They provide limited circumstances for the competition authorities to counter-argue that a monopoly is going too far. They are limited, because the monopoly could always say that, if it were not allowed to continue with its price fixing or special agreement or deal, it could no longer fulfil the tasks assigned to it.

If a water company wanted to defend a particular agreement or pricing practice, it would argue that it could no longer supply clean water in the required quantities to all households. That would be a serious threat, and the court might believe the company, because it is the monopoly producer. It presumably has some credibility, and knows whether it can provide water on different bases. The court might judge that the company was right, and allow it to continue its anti-competitive practice.

How much better it would be if there were a market test for that practice. If another company could enter the market and provide a better service without such a restriction, it would be allowed to do so, and it would not be possible to argue through the courts in defence of the restrictive practice or the special agreement.

I was pleased, after my recent discussion of the subject in Committee, to discover that some leading companies in the water industry agree that more competition could be introduced, and that they might benefit because they are active and innovative. They believe that if there were more freedom in the market, they might be beneficiaries. That is a good sign that there would be an entirely positive response to more competition. In that case—I could think of many others—we should like the words in the amendment removed, or modified by the Government's statements, so that there is scope for introducing competition.

Before the House votes on whether to retain the words, we should also learn a little from the Government about what services they have it in mind to exempt under this wide-ranging paragraph. They must have had something in mind when they drafted it.

In Committee, it was suggested that such words are found in the treaty, so they had to be found in the Bill, but I am sure that the Government have done a little more research and thinking than that. The Bill creates a British law for British markets, as we have often argued, so we need the Government to tell us what would be permissible by way of a general economic interest service or a revenue-producing monopoly to exempt companies from the otherwise sensible provisions of the Bill and earlier competition legislation.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) will eloquently argue the case on his amendment No. 51, which attempts to test out or achieve something similar on the Bill's other substantial loophole, which relates to public policy. The House is owed an explanation of how often the public policy rubric would be used, and why we need it as well as the conditions of revenue-producing monopoly and general economic services, which might cover similar cases. Certainly the cases that I have in mind could be covered by either of those conditions.

I am sure that my hon. Friend has tabled his amendment partly to test out the exclusion and how wide it will be. The competition authority and the Bill will be very weak if those large loopholes remain and are generally used, so we shall urge the House to vote for the amendments.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful for the opportunity to support my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) on amendment No. 6, and to speak briefly to amendment No. 51, which would delete from schedule 3 paragraph 7, relating to issues of public policy. I want to add a few points in relation to paragraph 4, which relates to services of general economic interest.

My right hon. Friend is right to say that, in Committee, there was speculation about the purposes for which the Government were proposing paragraph 4. It was suggested—I confess that I cannot remember by whom—that the paragraph was inserted at the request, or at the behest, of the Post Office, which, in United Kingdom circumstances, may be regarded as both a service "of general economic interest" and "a revenue-producing monopoly". That raises the question whether, in any case, the Post Office would be allowed to carry on its activity without infringing a chapter 1 prohibition by virtue of paragraph (5), which relates to a legal requirement, as, if the Post Office is obliged by legal requirement to provide a universal service at a uniform tariff, it might be exempted for that reason.

My right hon. Friend is right to say that the Government have taken that path ostensibly, as argued in Committee, because there is parallel text in the treaty on European Union: article 90. However, we should reconsider the matter, not only to repeat the argument that my right hon. Friend eloquently made about the desirability of promoting competition and not giving the Government a let-out to protect monopolies when it suits them, but to question in this context—as I believe was not done in Committee—whether, even in their terms, the Government have gone about the process of introducing article 90 into the UK context appropriately. I question that, for three reasons.

First, it is obvious that the Government have not gone about the process appropriately in the context of article 90, which consists of three limbs. Limb 1 makes it clear that one is talking about public undertakings and undertakings to which member states grant special or exclusive rights. That rubric, which introduces article 90 and makes clear the circumstances in which article 90 and questions of services of general economic interest are to be interpreted, is not carried through into schedule 3 or paragraph (4).

As a result, it is not obvious, in the context of the language used in paragraph (4), that we are dealing with essentially public undertakings, or those that exercise public functions. We are simply talking about services of general economic interest or revenue-producing monopolies, entrusted—the paragraph does not say by whom—with the operation of those services, and where the "particular tasks" are "assigned to that undertaking." Again, the paragraph does not say who assigns those particular tasks. It is all implied that it is the state that assigns those tasks. In the context of the treaty, it is perfectly clear, under article 90, that the tasks are assigned by the state, but that is not carried through into the Bill.

The second problem is the manner in which the Bill is constructed. It would be tedious of me to go on about the form of the language, but essentially there is a difference between the form of article 90, which effectively applies the rules except in so far as that would obstruct the performance of the duties, and that of paragraph 4, which disapplies the rules except "in so far as the prohibition would obstruct the performance" of those tasks.

It is not simply a case of asking whether the bottle is half full or half empty. It is important in law that the prohibitions are applied, but with limits—as distinct from the prohibitions being disapplied, except in so far as they could be reapplied, as it were. That may, in practice, come to be quite a different distinction, and the Minister did not address that in Committee.

A third matter is that, in the context of article 90, the paragraph has a final sentence, which is not carried through into paragraph 4. That sentence reads:

"The development of trade must not be affected to such an extent as would be contrary to the interests of the Community."

I understand why the Government have not tried to carry that sentence through into the Bill: it would not make sense, in the context of UK domestic legislation, to talk about the interests of the Community. They could have left that out, and said that the development of trade must not be affected to an extent that would be contrary to the public interest. They could apply an overall public interest test.

In the Community context, the protection that is offered to member states should not be allowed to go so far as to hinder trade unduly, but the Government have not taken that important factor into account. I appreciate that the Government should not look at the widespread application of the measure in the way that, for example, the EU contemplates the protection of tobacco or alcohol monopolies in some member states. However, it is important to know under what circumstances the Government wish to proceed.

Amendment No. 51, which deals with public policy, is more straightforward. By their own admission, the Government have introduced paragraph 7 as a catch-all, or perhaps I should say a catch-nothing, because in Committee—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Competition Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Betts.]

Question agreed to.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Lansley: In Committee, Ministers said that they had no intention of using the paragraph 7 provision, and two questions arise in relation to that. First, if there is no intention to use the provision, why have it? Secondly, if it is intended to be used, under what circumstances will it be used?

I was struck by the debate on "exceptional and compelling". Ministers took great pains to stress how high the test of exceptional and compelling would have to be before Ministers were convinced that it would be right to use the provision—and they said that they had no intention of using it. About two weeks ago, during debate on the Human Rights Bill, there was a question about the circumstances under which Ministers should use a statutory instrument to amend primary legislation rather than waiting for an opportunity to change it by primary legislation.

There were two competing arguments about the circumstances in which Ministers should resort to this Henry VIII measure. The first was under compelling reasons, and the second was under exceptional reasons. As we had recently debated "exceptional and compelling", I told the Home Secretary that Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry had used the phrase "exceptional and compelling" and regarded it as the appropriate high test. I asked whether it would be an appropriate test in that context.

The Home Secretary has no function to defend Trade and Industry Ministers and, with his customary perspicacity, asked why, if their intention was not to use it, they were proposing it. That is precisely the question. The paragraph 7 provision has no parallel in the treaty on European union, so under what circumstances do Ministers propose to use it? If they do not intend to use it, why not accept the amendment and delete it?

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I cannot accept amendment No. 6 to delete paragraph 4 of schedule 3, which contains a limited exclusion that is drawn from article 90 (2) of the EC treaty. Including article 92 will mean that the activities that benefit from that article in relation to articles 85 and 86 will not be put in a less favourable position with respect to domestic prohibitions.

It is important to appreciate that article 90 (2) has been interpreted as providing only a limited derogation from the competition rules, and that its definitions are to be strictly interpreted. By virtue of clause 60, we are applying that jurisprudence, which means that the same will be true of the exclusion in paragraph 4 of schedule 3.

Revenue-producing monopolies are undertakings that have been granted monopolies by the state to raise money for the state. When this matter was raised in Committee, we mentioned some European countries that have such monopolies, and we agreed with the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) that tobacco was one instance and alcohol was another. In that instance, it is clear that the application of the exclusion will be limited. In such circumstances, we believe that it is entirely right that the prohibitions should be disapplied. Otherwise, the purpose of the act of public authority that entrusted the undertaking with the service would be frustrated.

Let me give some examples of the services that a vote on the amendments would put in jeopardy. They include not just some of the public utility networks, but uniform letter pricing. Is it the real intention of the Opposition to threaten uniform postal pricing and to make it very difficult for many people living in rural and remote areas to post a letter at the same price that people enjoy in the capital city and in major conurbations? That is the effect of amendment No. 6.

I hardly think that that can have escaped the notice of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). I believe that that is a hidden way in which to try to drive a coach and horses through uniform letter pricing and to open it to the private sector, which could greatly damage rural and other areas that require uniform letter pricing. It must be a viable service. I wish just that he had come clean on that.

On amendment No. 51, by its nature the power in paragraph 7 could be exercised only in rare circumstances. Before its exercise, the Secretary of State must be satisfied that there are "exceptional and compelling" reasons of public policy for her to act. That is a high hurdle to surmount. The power is, in that sense, a "reserve" power.

Not surprisingly, we have no present plans to exercise the power. However, if there are grounds to exercise the power, it should be available to us. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) may at some point feel that there are exceptional and compelling reasons of public policy why the prohibitions should not be applied, but this amendment would ensure that they would nevertheless apply. That cannot be right.

The power in paragraph 7 is a necessary safeguard. I note that the previous Administration also considered the power necessary, as it was included in the draft Bill that they published in August 1996. I urge the right hon. Member for Wokingham to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Redwood: The Minister should know that the Opposition's policy is to maintain a uniform tariff for a national postal service. We have made that clear, and we have no intention tonight of undermining or destroying that. We believe that it is possible to guarantee that system, which I believe is favoured by hon. Members on both sides of the House, by a director general exemption, or even perhaps by using the public policy power; I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) will not wish to press his amendment to a vote.

It is our case that having both the public policy power and this rubric about services of general economic interest weakens the Bill too much, and that this could be handled easily by one or the other. The Minister has to agree that if the postal system cannot be accommodated under other parts of the Bill where we think that it can, it could certainly be accommodated under the public policy power, and should be accommodated as quickly as possible, so that there is no doubt.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: If that is the case, why did the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends not table an amendment that would protect our uniform letter pricing service? They have not done so, and passing the amendment would threaten that vital service.

Mr. Redwood: I have just told the Minister how it is very easy to accommodate our mutual wish. He is a member of the Government, for heaven's sake. He is the one who has to sort out all the consequences of our important debates on the big principles of the Bill. I have told him that the Opposition would give a fair wind to anything that did that. Given his majority, I think that he could probably do it even without that Opposition guarantee, but it has been and remains Opposition policy to support the current national tariff for the postal system. There are many ways in which to accommodate it under the Bill—through director general rules or other exemption powers in the Bill—without needing this enormous blockbuster of paragraph 4 to schedule 3.

I am not persuaded by what the Under-Secretary has said. I find it odd that British legislation should be framed to exempt a continental tobacco monopoly. We do not have tobacco monopolies in this country, so there is no need to make special provision for them in British law. However, we do have other types of services of general economic interest or revenue-producing monopolies. The Under-Secretary cannot be sure how the courts will construe these phrases. Despite clause 60, there is always the danger that they will be construed in other ways.

It would be much safer, and would produce better competition legislation, if this very general clause were struck out. If it is only about continental tobacco monopolies, nothing will be lost; if it is there to protect real monopolies in Britain, we do not want it. I have already told the House how the one example that the Under-Secretary has produced, where we are in agreement, can be accommodated in other ways.

With the permission of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire, I suggest that we do not press his amendment to a vote, but that we should vote on this fundamental issue of whether the Bill should be heavily diluted by paragraph 4 of schedule 3.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 13

NOTIFICATION FOR GUIDANCE

Amendment made: No. 9, in page 8, line 22, leave out from 'with' to end of line and insert—

'such date as may be specified in a notice in writing given to the applicant by the Director when the application has been determined.

( ) The date specified in a notice under subsection (4)(b) may not be earlier than the date on which the notice is given.'.—[Mr. Nigel Griffiths.]

Clause 14

NOTIFICATION FOR A DECISION

Amendment made: No. 10, in page 8, line 40, leave out from 'with' to end of line and insert—

'such date as may be specified in a notice in writing given to the applicant by the Director when the application has been determined.

( ) The date specified in a notice under subsection (4)(b) may not be earlier than the date on which the notice is given.'.—[Mr. Nigel Griffiths.]

Clause 26

POWERS WHEN CONDUCTING INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. Breed: I beg to move amendment No. 76, in page 14, line 2, at end insert—

'(7) In exercising the powers conferred by subsection (6)(a)(ii) above, the Director shall afford the undertaking under investigation a reasonable opportunity for its legal or other representative to be present when the employee or officer is required to provide an explanation of the document.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 77, in clause 66, page 37, line 10, at end insert—

'(5A) In exercising the powers conferred by subsection (5)(a)(ii) above, the Director shall afford the person notified a reasonable opportunity for his legal or other representative to be present when the employee or officer is required to provide an explanation of the document.'.

Mr. Breed: I do not want to detain the House too long at this late hour. It is widely accepted that the powers proposed in the Bill are extensive. We ought, therefore, to consider for a few moments amendments Nos. 76 and 77, which seek to introduce a couple of safeguards that are vital to the protection of companies that may find themselves under investigation. Although I fully accept that powers currently available to the director general are insufficient and that the Government feel, as I do, that they should be strengthened, it is important to ensure that companies receive fair treatment when they are under investigation and subject to the Bill's extensive powers.

Powers to question employees and officers both past and present of any company are critical to the effective enforcement of action, particularly if a company has been committing an infringement over a long time. Although it is not disputed that it is appropriate that there should be power to seek information from employees and officers who have since left the company, it is surely sensible and in a spirit of natural justice to afford a company at least a brief—I emphasise brief—opportunity to comment on the role of any employee or officer who is to be questioned and on the appropriateness of so doing, and allow a company to have a representative present at any interview.

The proposed powers are extraordinarily extensive in their force and reach. Before the director or his or her staff exercise any investigatory powers, they should be balanced by some safeguards. Let us consider potential ex-employees or officers who may be interviewed in the process of an investigation. First, an ex-employee or officer may have been made redundant or been dismissed and may have a grudge or be prejudiced against the company personally or through sympathy for a former colleague. Secondly, an ex-employee may be working for a competitor and under contractual agreements that prevent them from disclosing information to anyone. They would find it difficult under such questioning.

Thirdly, an ex-employee or officer may wish not to answer any questions because they feel that it may incriminate them or someone else, or because they are not certain of information. That should not be seen automatically as casting any doubt on the activities or motives of the company under investigation. Finally, an ex-employee or officer may genuinely have forgotten—or at least not remembered well enough—all the facts or information for which they are asked, but may feel obliged to give opinions rather than facts and knowledge.

Those are practical examples. I recognise that the Bill provides a right of challenge, albeit only at the appellant stage, which is rather too late. I also recognise—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is too much background conversation in the House; I cannot hear the debate properly.

Mr. Breed: I recognise that speed is important in such investigations. The Government have made it clear on several occasions that they want the investigations to progress and not be bogged down. In some cases, however, it might be wise to allow a company a brief opportunity to comment and to have a representative present, not to influence, control or make any decision on whether the investigation should go ahead but simply to help avoid the time and expense of future challenges, which can certainly arise on appeal.

If the Government accepted the amendments, they would slightly redress the balance on behalf of companies that find themselves under the significant powers of the investigations, which are heavy and extensive. If the Bill proceeds unamended, companies may well find that those powers are so extensive as to be difficult for them to comply with—even if they want to.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I have listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on a matter to which we have given considerable thought. I hope that he may consider withdrawing the amendment in the light of assurances that I can give him.

The matter of legal advice being available during an investigation has arisen in various ways and has been debated at length in this House and the other place. In relation to clause 27, the Government gave an assurance in Committee that the right to legal advice was an important matter and would be covered by the director's rules under clause 50. Those rules are subject to the Secretary of State's approval and annulment by vote of either House. The amendment, if I have understood it correctly, is rather different. Investigations under clause 26, and under the Fair Trading Act 1973 as strengthened by clause 66, are "off-site" in character—that is to say they will not involve entry to premises.

10.30 pm

The Office of Fair Trading expects generally to exercise those powers by correspondence and therefore will allow time for legal advice to be sought. If the powers are exercised by requiring the production of documents at a specified time and place, the employee or officer concerned could be accompanied by a legal adviser. The right of an employee or officer to be accompanied by a legal adviser should be dealt with in the director's rules, and I am happy to give that assurance.

Mr. Breed: I am happy with what the Minister has said so far, but I ask him to clarify one point. If the matter is conducted in correspondence with an ex-employee, will the company be advised that such correspondence is in operation?

Mr. Griffiths: In terms of the effectiveness of the investigation, it is for the director general to weigh up whether the employee is likely to be the subject of any undue pressure, but being always mindful that, with an established appeals procedure, any actions of the director general that are not considered to be within the competence of the new Act would give people some recourse to justice and review. It is clear that the director's rule will cover the issue of access to legal advice. I hope that, in the light of my explanation, the hon. Gentleman will feel able to withdraw the amendment. I am grateful to him for raising this important issue.

Mr. Breed: The Minister has addressed part of the problem. The amendments seek to ensure that companies have notice that ex-employees are to be approached, thus giving them the opportunity to comment early in the investigation on the appropriateness of the background information concerned with the employee, which would perhaps provide helpful information to the director general and staff anyway. However, I accept the Minister's assurances that the matters will be worked out only in practice as cases happen. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 7

THE COMPETITION COMMISSION

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 49, in page 64, line 8, leave out from 'person' to end of line 16 and insert 'is—

(a) a puisne judge of the High Court;

(b) a judge of the Court of Session; or

(c) a judge of the Supreme Court of Northern Ireland, and before appointing as a member of the appeal tribunal any person who holds the judicial office mentioned in paragraph (a), (b) or (c) he shall consult the Lord Chancellor, the President of the Court of Session or the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, as he considers appropriate.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 50, in page 64, leave out lines 19 and 20.

Mr. Lansley: The amendments work together in the sense that amendment No. 50 leaves out the requirement for consultation with the Lord Chancellor and other Law Officers, since that is incorporated into the proposed structure of amendment No. 49. The purpose of amendment No. 49 is to replace the requirement laid upon the Secretary of State in the existing paragraph 4 of schedule 7 to appoint someone with legal qualifications. It would make explicit that the person to be appointed was a High Court judge. In a similar debate in Committee, it was made clear that the Government intended that the person to be appointed would be not a High Court judge, but equivalent to a High Court judge.

The appeal panel will represent the Competition Commission in considering appeals against the decisions of the director general. It was certainly understood in Committee that the Government intended to be free to appoint to the panel members who had not only suitable legal qualifications, but the ability to assess the economic character of the judgments. Those who bring appeals will believe that it is in their interests regularly to go to the courts rather than to rest on the decisions of the panel if they feel that the panel does not have the necessary legal credibility to give robust judgments that are likely only in the most exceptional cases—such as where high principles are at stake—to be overturned by the courts in a further appeal. We were at pains to make that point in Committee, but I do not feel that it was sufficiently taken on board.

To ensure that the appeal panel functions in the best way, the panel and the president of the appeal tribunals should bring the maximum legal credibility to their judgments, but that will not be achieved if the president is appointed on the ground of his or her economic credibility. The director general and other members of the commission are likely to have economic credibility, but those who appeal against the director general's decisions must have sufficient faith in the legal credibility of the system not to make a further appeal or even to circumvent the procedure.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, as I want to deal with the matter by way of intervention, not in a substantive speech. Does he agree that there is a real risk that there will be a much higher incidence of appeals against a tribunal's decision to a higher court and that it would be counter-productive not to incorporate into the Bill a provision such as the one suggested in the amendments?

Mr. Lansley: I agree. Our intention is to make the process work in the best interests of British industry, but industry will not be well served if it finds that, because of tribunals' lack of legal credibility, it regularly has to have recourse to the higher courts. The tribunals must provide a forum in which economically and legally credible decisions can be made straightforwardly and inexpensively. It is difficult to see how that could be achieved without a High Court judge as president of the tribunals.

Mr. Ian McCartney: Like the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), I am convinced that we need robust decision-making processes that have clarity as their central focus. I also believe that the membership of the panels must be credible in terms of the law, of business practice and of economics. The panels will be similar to the restrictive practice courts, where all three key pillars are consistent throughout the membership.

That is very important. If the process is to work, there must be a clear understanding from the outset that the membership must have a quality and credibility that ensure that people can accept a tribunal's decisions. We can all agree that access to full and independent appeal on the merits of the case is essential in ensuring that the new regime is fair and transparent. The Bill provides for precisely such a right of appeal.

Our proposals provide a clear separation between the body that has the investigative and original decision-making function and the body that hears appeals. Such a separation is essential to ensure a fair, independent and transparent appeals process. We achieve the separation by making the appeals tribunal a completely separate body from the Office of Fair Trading, which has the primary responsibility for investigating and dealing with infringements.

In its response to the consultation document, the Confederation of British Industry said:

> "We are pleased that the Government has taken into account the suggestions put forward by the CBI and has chosen to preserve an independent body with the power to conduct a full review of the DGFT's decisions."

Fairness demands that appeals can be dealt with efficiently and by people with the necessary expertise and experience. We believe that our proposals for a specialised tribunal will best achieve that aim. We are clear that the person appointed to be president of the tribunal will be a senior figure, with status at least equivalent to that of a High Court judge.

The tribunal itself will have equivalent status to the High Court and appeals from its decisions on points of law or levels of penalty will be direct to the Court of Appeal. It is clearly essential that the president should have appropriate legal qualifications, experience and standing, and strict minimum requirements are set out in schedules to the Bill.

We do not think that it would be right to limit further the range of people and expertise available to fill this vital post, as the amendments would do. General legal standing is vital, but so are special knowledge and experience of competition matters. We do not believe that it would be in the interests of the users of the appeal tribunal to limit the field of potential candidates to High Court judges alone, as the amendments propose. Our proposals will open up a much wider range of potential candidates. We believe that that is very important in what is, after all, a complex and specialist field.

I hope that, having heard that explanation of our position, the hon. Gentleman will be prepared to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. He has made clear the Government's intention to meet the tests of legal credibility that were implicit in the amendment, rather than limiting the tests to other kinds of credibility that will be vested elsewhere, in the activities of the director general and the commission. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 50

VERTICAL AGREEMENTS AND LAND AGREEMENTS

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 41, in page 26, line 4, at beginning insert 'Subject to subsection (1A)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 53, in page 26, line 4, leave out

'The Secretary of State may by order provide'

and insert

'The Director may recommend that the Secretary of State by order provides'.

No. 54, in page 26, line 4, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director'.

No. 42, in page 26, line 8, at end insert—

'(1A) Subject to subsection (1B), the Chapter I prohibition does not apply to a vertical agreement.

(1B) If the Director is satisfied that there is a vertical agreement which, but for the exemption in subsection (1A) would infringe the Chapter I prohibition, he may issue a notice to each of the parties to the agreement bringing that exemption to an end in relation to that agreement on the date specified in that notice.'.

No. 55, in page 26, line 14, leave out from beginning to 'is' in line 15 and insert

'The Director shall have power to give directions that an exclusion, exemption or modification made under subsection 1'.

No. 57, in page 26, line 15, leave out 'in prescribed circumstances'.

No. 58, in page 26, line 17, at end insert 'or category of agreement.'.

No. 56, in page 26, line 17, at end insert—

'(3A) Prior to making an order in relation to vertical agreements under subsection (1) the Secretary of State shall carry out and publish an assessment of the benefits to consumers of such an order.'.

No. 43, in page 26, line 21, at beginning insert '"connected" and'.

No. 44, in page 26, line 21, leave out 'and "vertical agreement" have' and insert 'has'.

No. 45, in page 26, line 23, at end insert—

'"price fixing agreement" means an agreement which seeks to control the price charged for the goods or services which are the subject of that agreement, whether or not by purporting—

(a) to fix a particular price, a minimum price or a price band, or

(b) to impose a requirement, make a recommendation or offer an incentive, other than an agency agreement under which the principal establishes the price at which the agent sells the goods or services which are the subject of the agreement or an agreement which relates exclusively to the price of an interest in land.

"vertical agreement" means an agreement between two or more undertakings (other than connected undertakings) under which one undertaking acts as purchaser and another acts as supplier of the goods or services which are the subject of that agreement and includes an agency or distribution agreement but does not include a price fixing agreement.'.

Mr. Lansley: The amendments are designed to clarify the characteristics of vertical agreements and to restructure the clause to give effect to the Government's apparent intentions. I think that it is common ground on both sides of the House that, like any other aspect of the activity, one has to judge whether the impact of vertical agreements on competition and consumer benefits is beneficial. Whereas one would judge many other classes of agreement simply on their effects, there is more of a presumption that vertical agreements are benign, and the President of the Board of Trade stated earlier that she would try to find a mechanism by which such agreements could be excluded from the scope of the prohibition.

10.45 pm

The difficulty is that, throughout the passage of the Bill, we have been waiting for the Government to tell us by what means they propose to exclude vertical agreements. We have been awaiting the views of the task force established between the Government, the Confederation of British Industry and other bodies to look into the matter. In Committee, we were told that there was a further reason for delay because we had to take on board the Commission's final view of the matter. When we began to understand the thinking behind the Commission's approach, there was all the more reason to amend the legislation so that the House could lead the Commission to an appropriate definition of vertical agreements, rather than simply wait for what it would tell us.

I will not dwell on all the other incidental matters, but, for me, what gave rise to most concern in Committee was the Under-Secretary of State making it clear that the Commission was considering a definition of vertical agreements that would encompass operations at different economic levels. Rather, therefore, than having an effects-based approach, we would have a narrow, form-based approach to the exclusion for vertical agreements. It seemed an unhappy precedent for the Commission to go down that path as it would be perfectly possible to define such agreements differently. Indeed, the purpose of the amendments is to undertake that definition. For example, price-fixing agreements will clearly be excluded from the vertical agreements that should obtain the benefit of exclusion from the prohibition; one amendment would achieve that.

Clearly, there must be a proper clawback provision. If the director feels that a vertical agreement that has the benefit of the exclusion would infringe the prohibition, he must have the right to take that agreement back under the terms of the prohibition. All that is set out in the amendments, including the requirement that vertical agreements should relate to two or more unconnected undertakings.

There are a number of benefits, on which I will not dwell at great length as they were set out well in Committee. However, it is important to recognise that, the vertical agreements that the Commission seems to be moving towards are necessarily those that operate at different economic levels, whereas those that we meet in practice often have horizontal aspects. One instance weighs heavily on my thinking and that is that, where a franchise agreement forms the vertical agreement, the franchise holder will often have a small number of units in his own control at a particular level to protect the brand, demonstrate the franchise and show how the agreement should be manifested. The sort of definition that the Commission is considering would exclude such vertical agreements. We do not have the benefit of its final document, so it is not clear how it will disinter such an agreement to separate out the vertical and horizontal aspects.

If Ministers intend, as they stated at the outset, to provide an exclusion for vertical agreements, we should give effect to that provision, but with suitable safeguards and definitions. The amendments pick up on those points and would give effect to them. In contrast to their stated intention to exclude vertical agreements, all that Ministers have come up with—in months—is a bold enabling power, with no specifics. Nor have they, as yet, given us any clear definition of the terms on which they would be likely to produce statutory instruments to give effect to their intentions.

The amendments have two purposes. They challenge Ministers to tell us, even at this late stage, the basis on which they propose to handle vertical agreements, and they ask the Government to incorporate in the Bill an exclusion and subsequent definitions of the kind they ought to have proposed in the first place.

Mr. Chidgey: Amendments Nos. 53 to 58 attempt to address concerns raised in parts of the British music industry. Vertical agreements are vital to the industry, particularly for songwriters, composers, music publishers, record companies and collecting societies. The success of the music business depends on its ability to license musical works effectively and efficiently to parties who wish to use them. The important point is the variety of agreements concerned, and I hope that the Minister can clarify the position.

One-off agreements may allow use of a piece of music in specific circumstances, such as for television advertisements. Agreements may comprise collective licences, allowing frequent music users, such as television or satellite broadcasters, to play a licence holder's repertoire without seeking authorisation for each composition. Vertical agreements concerning copyright are different from other vertical agreements, for several reasons. Unlike transactions involving other types of property, copyright licences do not transfer ownership from one party to another. They merely give permission for use of copyright work. It is right that such agreements should specify the circumstances in which the licensee is permitted to use the work. Anything else would render rights worthless.

European Commission case law already recognises that intellectual property contracts must contain conditions of use. Regardless of specific terms and conditions, licences grant freedom to those who wish to use music. Should the Bill result in uncertainty for rights holders about whether licence agreements are valid, they may choose not to enter into such agreements rather than risk losing control of their work, the source of their income. Members of British Music Rights, songwriters, composers and music publishers need certainty in their business relationships. We want the Government to assure rights holders that they do not consider agreements to be restrictive, and that the Director General of Fair Trading will not regard agreements as falling within the Bill's scope.

The National Consumer Council is concerned about clause 50. A balance needs to be struck between ensuring that the Office of Fair Trading is not overwhelmed by dealing with vertical agreements, and making sure that the director general has adequate powers to act against malign vertical agreements. The NCC feels that that balance is not struck sufficiently in favour of consumers. Broadly, we are concerned that the powers will not be sufficiently robust to deal with vertical agreements and anxious about the use of the clawback power in clause 50(3), which is the key to protecting consumers from malign agreements. We are worried that, unless the director general has sufficient powers to consider all vertical agreements that have been exempted or excluded, the provision will fail.

Our amendments are designed to probe the operation of clause 50. The purpose of amendments Nos. 53 and 54 is to probe why it should be the Secretary of State who makes the relevant order. Why should it not be the director general, or even the Secretary of State on the advice of the director general? Will the director general have any role in making the order?

Those questions have been raised in the context of the other powers in the Bill, particularly the Secretary of State's exclusion powers in clause 3, the director general's power to make individual exemptions under clause 4 and the block exemptions under clause 6 that may be made by the Secretary of State at the director general's recommendation. In clauses 3, 4, and 6, there is a clear distinction between the roles of the Secretary of State and the director general, but it has been lost in clause 50.

In the past, the National Consumer Council has feared that there has been too much scope for unfettered Executive action on competition policy. The director general should have the final say on competition issues while the Secretary of State should have it when broader economic issues must be considered. Clause 50 confuses that distinction. We look to the Minister for clarity.

Amendment No. 56 provides that, before making an order, the Secretary of State should justify why vertical agreements should be excluded or exempted from the prohibition. In doing so, he should assess the benefits to consumers of the order. The assessment should be published as part of the consultation process. That should make the process of making the order as open and accountable as possible.

Openness is important because clause 50(1) does not specify the criteria for making exclusions or exemptions. The situation in the Bill is different from what has been proposed in the European Union document, "Draft communication on the application of the EC competition rules to vertical restraints". The EU proposals, by comparison, are based largely on market share triggering the blacklisting of prescribed practices.

The main thrust of amendments Nos. 55, 57 and 58 is to ensure that the director general's clawback power is not too limited. As currently drafted, clause 50 means that the order will have to specify whether the director general has such a power or not. We believe that he should be able to use it whenever he considers it appropriate and not only when specified in the Secretary of State's order. The worst case scenario is that the Secretary of State could exclude or exempt all vertical agreements under clause 50(1) without empowering the director general to use any clawback power at all. Should that happen, no vertical agreement would be exposed to competition scrutiny. That would be unacceptable and we do not believe that that is the meaning of the legislation.

Amendment No. 57 would ensure that the director general does not have to be too constrained in his use of the clawback power. Clause 50(3) limits the use of the power to "prescribed circumstances". What are the prescribed circumstances likely to be? If such circumstances were confined to a merger inquiry identifying problems, it would be far too restrictive. The director general should have the power to consider any vertical agreement brought to his attention as being potentially malign. He should then be able to assess it, judge its anti-competitive effects and, if necessary, use the clawback power under clause 50(3) to bring it within the chapter I prohibition.

I have set out as clearly as I can our concerns about clause 50 by tabling probing amendments and providing background information on the specific concerns of the National Consumer Council and of the music rights fraternity, in particular British Music Rights. I expect the Minister to address the issues seriously and I hope that he will give some words of encouragement when he winds up the debate.

Mr. Letwin: I should begin by reassuring hon. Members that I do not intend to dwell on this matter at the length at which I dwelt on a previous matter this evening.

Clearly, at some point after I found myself dislodged from the Committee, my hon. Friends had an attack of extreme moderation, for they have tabled amendments that are minimalist. From an early stage in the Bill's progress, we were assured by the Secretary of State that action of a firm and decisive nature would be taken to remove vertical agreements from the scope of the Bill. We were assured repeatedly throughout the Committee stage—I have checked the Official Report of the later part of the Committee's proceedings—that we would be given a judgment of Solomon, if not something better, on the issue as a result of the prolonged deliberations of the Government and their chosen parties that would tell us exactly how that would be done.

Yet what do we find? We find provisions in the Bill that are simply a replication of the Government's general tendency to insert clauses that either are, or bear a striking resemblance to, Henry VIII clauses—clauses that give the widest possible discretion under regulation. My hon. Friends have tabled amendments that would make provisions that might be described as presumptive—they would still allow a considerable degree of discretion. The Minister owes it to the House to explain how he intends to use clause 50 as it stands; and why he would not be prepared to accept amendments that slightly constrain that regulation-making power.

I shall go further, because there is a point here that connects with proceedings earlier this evening. If my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) is right and the reason why the Government have wholly failed to bring forward a clear and concrete definition of the sorts of vertical agreement that will be exempt and those that will not is that they await the views of the Commission on the matter, the Government are once again guilty of entirely failing to distinguish between interstate and intrastate commerce. The views of the Commission on this matter are of exactly the same academic interest as might be the views of a range of economists: if the Commission has superior economists, its views are of greater interest; if inferior, as is all too often the case, its views are of less interest. The Commission has no jurisdictional interest whatever in this matter. As we have been repeatedly assured, it is precisely the purport of the Bill to deal with intrastate commerce. In such matters, the Government cannot hide behind the views of the Commission.

Therefore, we have before us the straightforward spectacle of the Government having spent many months considering an issue only to bring before the House something that they could perfectly well have brought before the House six months ago—provisions that enable the Government to decide in due time what the Government want to do. I would venture to say that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) could have drafted such provisions immediately—indeed, his research assistant or secretary could have done so.

The clauses tell us nothing, so, if the Minister intends to reject the amendments, he owes it to the House to tell us exactly why he is doing so. He owes it to the House to tell us how he will go about exercising the wide latitude given to him; and why he would not be able to exercise sufficient latitude if he accepted the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire. If the Minister cannot give that explanation, we owe it to the country to explain that this is yet another case in which the Government intend to abrogate responsibility over intrastate trade to an external power that ought not to have jurisdiction in that matter.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The issue of vertical agreements was considered at length in Committee. Clause 50 was added to the Bill at that stage to allow additional flexibility in the treatment of vertical agreements. Since that time, the CBI has written to hon. Members—and specifically to members of the Committee. The letter was dated 7 July. I shall quote the CBI's views on the clause added in Committee. The letter states:

"The Government amended the Bill at Standing Committee to allow for an exclusion to be brought in at a later stage—the CBI supported this."

The CBI supports the position the Government have taken in respect of these matters.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McCartney: On that specific point?

Mr. Bruce: Yes. I had intended to make a speech, but an intervention is simpler. I sat through the debate on Second Reading and tried to find out from the Government what they were trying to achieve with the Bill. Can the Minister give us one or two examples of cases in which he feels that vertical agreements are not working and tell us what the Government intend to do about it so that we can judge whether the clauses will do what they intend?

Mr. McCartney: With all due respect, we are trying to achieve a fair and effective competition regime, which includes the capacity to exclude vertical agreements. The vast majority of vertical agreements are benign, but there are circumstances in which a vertical agreement may not be benign. We must have provisions in place to deal with that. That is why the Government, after discussion with interested parties, came forward with clause 50. I repeat that that is why the CBI went out of its way to write to hon. Members saying that it supports the way in which the Government are proceeding.

Mr. Chidgey: The Minister is quoting a letter from the CBI, dated 7 July, which, as he rightly said, has been circulated to members of the Committee and others. The hon. Gentleman has given the House the impression—I am sure he did not mean to—that the letter contains a complete endorsement of the Bill. The Minister knows that it does not. There are seven points in the letter which express the concerns that the CBI still has. I am not saying that I agree with those concerns, but it is only right and proper that the record should show that, although the CBI welcomes the Bill in principle, it does still have seven specific concerns.

Mr. McCartney: With all due respect, I thought that I had made it absolutely clear that I quoted the CBI's view of what has happened on vertical agreements since the Committee stage. I quoted it accurately. I made no attempt, either generally or specifically, to attribute to the CBI any other remark—nor would I attempt to do so. I was trying to be helpful to the House. I have been dealing specifically with the issue around clause 50. I did that because that clause came about as a result of the consultations that took place. I believe that it was legitimate for me to quote the CBI's view. I assume that the CBI sent that note to hon. Members so that they could be clear about the process involved in achieving clause 50.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Mr. McCartney: I cannot think for a moment what the hon. Gentleman wants to add to that. Perhaps he will wait until I get a little further into the body of my speech.

We have said on a number of occasions that we believe that there is significant merit in recognising the special features of vertical agreements as a whole under the chapter I prohibition. The prevailing view among economists is that vertical agreements do not normally give rise to competition concerns, except where one of the parties holds market power or there exists a large network of agreements. In recognition of that, using the powers under clause 50 will reduce the burden on business of unnecessary notification. That will enable the better concentration of regulatory resources on areas of competition concern.

As hon. Members may be aware, the European Commission has been conducting a review of the treatment of vertical restraints. Papers that we have received recently from the Commission contain possible definitions of vertical agreements which could form the basis of a description for the purposes of the chapter I prohibition.

There is, of course, great merit in using the same language as proposed by the Commission, if possible. Many UK businesses are already subject to EC competition law and it might be burdensome to apply two different tests at EC and UK level when deciding how they will fall to be treated under the UK and EC prohibitions. This is a matter we are actively considering with the vertical agreements task force, which includes representatives from the CBI, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and the Office of Fair Trading.

Nevertheless, we recognise that some vertical agreements can cause serious competition concerns that might not be readily dealt with by reliance on the chapter II prohibition or the complex monopoly provisions of the Fair Trading Act. Clever lawyers—there are a few in the House—may also test the terms of the special treatment and squeeze agreements within it which were not intended to benefit. In particular, we do not propose to give special treatment to price-fixing vertical agreements.

It is essential that the director general is able to claw back individual agreements to examine them. That is a quid pro quo of a wide-ranging exclusion.

We have discussed our approach in detail with representatives of the CBI and it has their support, as I noted earlier when I quoted the body's parliamentary briefing.

I turn now to the specific amendments proposed by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). True to his tradition, he spoke to them in a reasonable and cogent manner. That sounds trite, but he understands what I mean. The definition suggested in amendment No. 45 for a vertical agreement is at odds with that suggested by the European Commission in its papers. As I have said, businesses may find it burdensome to have two different tests that they have to apply. Our approach in this area, as in many others, is to assist businesses by introducing a prohibition that is consistent with article 85.

Mr. Letwin: I want to press the Minister on the point about the CBI. Opposition Members entirely accept that the CBI prefers the current position to the original position, in which vertical agreements might have been entirely prohibited. Does the Minister not accept that, if the CBI was offered the alternative of total or possible total prohibition, compared to what is currently in the Bill, it would be very likely to favour the latter? He has not addressed the question whether it might favour over that the amendments in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley).

Mr. McCartney: I cannot say what the CBI thinks about the amendments. I suppose that, having read them, it decided to say in its briefing that it agreed with the Government's position on the matter, which would indicate that, on reflection and consideration, and after discussions with others who are stakeholders, it believes that the Government's proposal is the best way forward. If that was not the CBI's view, it would have told hon. Members so in no uncertain terms in its note to us, because this issue is as important to the CBI and its members as it is to other businesses.

Even without the objection that I described, I am concerned that the definition provided in the amendment may allow anti-competitive horizontal agreements to slip through by masquerading as vertical agreements. For example, two parties at the same level of trade could enter into reciprocal agreements for the supply of a particular good, setting conditions that relate to the supply of the good to consumers.

The amendments do not allow flexibility to amend the definition of vertical agreements over time. That is the key difference between the Government's approach and that of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire.

Amendment No. 45 would limit our ability to make adjustments to ensure consistency with the European regime. It would also preclude amendments to the definition if it proved to be defective. Some flexibility of that nature is desirable to ensure that special treatment remains of real value to businesses but does not open a loophole in the operation of the prohibition. Hence, clause 50 allows the special treatment to be altered, but only by affirmative resolution.

Mr. Lansley: I acknowledge that the route that I suggest might lead, in the initial stages, to a contest between a definition derived here and one proposed by the Commission. I want to tax the Minister on whether he believes that the definition towards which the Commission is moving is one with which he is content. Is it acceptable for the Commission to have a definition that includes operating on different economic levels, since that is more about form than effect and may have a significant adverse effect for franchise holders?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Ian.

Mr. McCartney: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You call me that because we have known each other since childhood—I was the child.

I would not have prefaced my remarks on the necessity to provide the opportunity in clause 50 to use the wording of the Commission's proposals as I did if the Government were unhappy or thought that the proposals would not work as we want them to. The fact that we are rejecting the hon. Gentleman's amendments means that, as I have said, we believe that the proposals from discussions in Europe will meet the objectives of the Government and business for vertical agreements. I understand that the hon. Gentleman will not accept that. Although I understand his reasons, there is a genuine disagreement between us. I hope that the judgment that I am making will prove to be correct. I spent a great deal of time discussing it with the CBI and others, to ensure that the decisions that we took, in relation to the principle of clause 50 and in relation to what comes out of it, genuinely met the requirements of business. There would be no point in the Government dealing with the matter in any other way.

The amendments proposed by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) tackle the issue of vertical agreements from a different perspective. Amendments Nos. 53 and 54 give the Director General of Fair Trading a role in the making of an order for vertical agreements. Amendment No. 58 also gives the director general power in relation to the scope of the prohibition, allowing him to remove the benefits of an order from a category of agreements.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs said in Committee, where a power extends to the scope of the prohibition, it is right that it be subject to affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament. Equally, it is right that a Minister, rather than the director general, is responsible for making orders.

Amendments Nos. 55 and 57 would both give the director general an ability to exercise clawback whenever he wishes to do so. As we have said, we think it right that the director general be able to exercise clawback, but only when he considers that an agreement would, if clawed back, infringe the chapter I prohibition, and that he would not be likely to grant it an unconditional exemption. That test will allow him to exercise clawback when an agreement is seriously anti-competitive, while giving businesses that enter into benign vertical agreements the proper certainty that they require.

By removing a test for clawback, the amendments could undermine the purpose of clause 50. If businesses are not given reasonable confidence that there is an appropriately high threshold before clawback, they may well seek to notify benign vertical agreements that are covered by an order to obtain that greater certainty.

I fully accept the sentiment that gave rise to amendment No. 56, but do not view it as necessary. We intend to consult widely with consumer groups, such as the National Consumer Council, as well as business before making an order under clause 50.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh raised the issue of intellectual property. We do not believe that there is a need to cover such agreements in the special treatment proposed. The licensing of intellectual property rights has been subject to article 85 in the United Kingdom for more than 25 years, and a licence to use intellectual property rights as such is not restrictive; it is granting a freedom. Other copyright issues are covered by the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 and recent European Community directives. I shall send the hon. Gentleman copies of the recent directive, because discussions of it took place upstairs. I do not think that the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) had quite joined the DTI team from the Treasury at the time—one of his hon. Friends dealt with it—so, if that would helpful, I shall send the hon. Gentleman a copy too, so that both Front-Bench Teams are aware of the position.

Let me return to amendment No. 56. The Department would expect as a matter of course to conduct an assessment of the costs and benefits for all legislation—primary or secondary. That assessment is placed in the Library when legislation is introduced to Parliament. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has undertaken to issue guidance requiring Government Departments to publish such an assessment when a proposal is consulted on. That new guidance is likely to be in place by September this year.

On that basis, I invite the hon. Members for South Cambridgeshire and for Eastleigh not to press their amendments.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister for the manner in which he responded, although I feel that on this occasion—although not in some of our earlier debates—the substance was not sufficient. It is like trying to grasp a hologram; one looks for the Government's proposals on vertical agreements, and they are just not there.

I am prepared to accept that the objective should be to arrive at a definition of vertical agreements which is workable, consistent and aligned between ourselves and the European Commission, and which, as the CBI proposes, should presume that vertical agreements are excluded in the vast majority of cases with appropriate clawback and definitions. The proposed amendments do that.

[Mr. Lansley]

The difference between Conservative Members and the Minister is that we feel that we should be leading the Commission to an appropriate definition, not simply resting upon the proposition that the Commission will, in due course, come up with a definition. Judging by the first accounts that have been presented to us in Committee and in the Chamber tonight, I believe that there may be practical difficulties with the definition when the time comes. Rather than resting on the proposition that flexibility is all and that we must go with the Commission when the moment arrives, it would be better to legislate rationally and in accordance with our objectives, and to press the Commission to come on board. However, I appreciate that the Minister was trying to respond helpfully and, as I understood him, he was not rejecting the definitions in the amendments so much as trying to see whether in due course some of those thoughts about price fixing and so on could be taken on board. On that basis I see no purpose in pressing the amendment. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

DIRECTOR'S RULES

Amendment made: No. 16, in page 77, leave out lines 12 to 16.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Clause 53

FEES

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 27, line 39, at end insert—

'(1A) a fee charged to a business for the discharge of functions by the Director shall not exceed the costs of fulfilling that particular function in that case.'.

I am conscious of a rather unsatisfactory discussion in Committee about the charging of fees, during which the Under-Secretary of State made it quite clear that the Government had not yet decided whether to charge fees or what they would be. As my hon. Friends said, that made it difficult to see whether the fees that might be charged had been taken into the compliance cost assessment, about which we have considerable reservations.

The amendment cannot be contested in principle. It seeks to ensure that in charging fees—we do not at this stage reopen the question whether fees would be charged—the director should not exceed the cost of fulfilling the function for which the fee is charged. That is basic natural justice and proportionality, and I have two points to support it, the first of which is at the macro level. It is important that the competition legislation and the suite of advice and fees to be charged by the director should not be used, to use the phrase in schedule 3, as a revenue-producing monopoly. The idea is not to charge greater amounts than the costs would require.

The second point is at the micro level and, in a sense, it is embodied in the amendment. It would be possible for the regulator to produce a schedule with a discriminatory function. For example, if the director or the Government prompting him were to take against the press or pharmaceutical companies or public utilities, the fees schedule might be arranged in a way that would discriminate between those businesses, or one of them, and other businesses that requested services from the director. Those services could be of more or less the same character and involve approximately the same cost.

As I have said, the amendment seeks to establish the principle that fees should not exceed the costs of the case, although it leaves open the principle that the fees could be lower—they could be rebated—or might not be charged at all. I hope that Ministers will consider those matters and give some assurances on them.

Mr. Ian McCartney: When we discussed the issue of the director's fees in Committee, it was recognised that it can be appropriate to charge fees when a genuine service is provided by the public sector. It was also recognised that fees for the giving of guidance and decisions might be a way of managing the director's work load in concentrating resources on where they are most needed and discouraging frivolous applications. However, the Government have not decided whether fees should be charged, still less the basis on which they might be set. I cannot accept the amendment because, if we decide the director should charge fees, it would narrow the range of options for calculating them. In particular, it would contradict subsection(2)(a), which provides that the rules may in particular provide for the amount of any fee to be calculated by reference to matters that may include

"(i) the turnover of any party to an agreement"

and

"(ii) the turnover of a person whose conduct the Director is to consider".

That provision was inserted by an amendment in another place because some respondents to the consultation exercise had argued that it might be appropriate to set differential fees for applicants to the director, based on their ability to pay.

I do not suggest that that is the basis on which any fees will be charged. As I have said, we have not taken any decision on whether fees will be charged, or how any fees would be calculated, but I do believe that it is an option which the Bill should make available. I recall that, in Committee on 11 June, the hon. Members for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) and for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) raised concerns about the burden of fees on small companies, and the hon. Member for Daventry recognised the value of being able to consider the possibility of relating the fees to the size of the undertaking. However, I can give some assurances about the exercise of the power to charge fees.

First, the Bill will enable fees to be set only at a level intended to cover the costs of the director in providing the particular services to which they relate; the fees could not be set at a level designed to generate a profit. Secondly, as any fees would be set by the director's rules, they would have to be consulted on, by virtue of clause 51(3). Business will therefore have an opportunity to consider and comment on the amount of any fees and the basis on which it is proposed to calculate them. I hope that that helps the hon. Member for Daventry in his consideration of whether to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Boswell: Although I am not entirely satisfied by that response, in the light of the assurances that the Minister has been able to give at this stage, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 54

REGULATORS

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 28, line 15, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsections (4) and (5)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendments Nos. 12 and 13.

No. 47, in page 28, line 18, at end insert—

'(4) A regulator shall not exercise any functions under this Part in respect of any matter until he has consulted—

(a) the Director, and

(b) any other regulator who may have jurisdiction in relation to that matter, and they have jointly determined whether and, if so, the manner in which, any of them are to exercise any functions under this Part in relation to that matter.

(5) In respect of a matter which—

(a) disregarding the concurrent jurisdiction of a Director, is not exclusively within the jurisdiction of one regulator, or

(b) affects or may affect competition outside the jurisdiction of that regulator, any decision within the meaning of section 46 in relation to that matter shall be made jointly by that regulator, the Director and any other regulator who has jurisdiction to a material extent in relation to that matter.

(6) A regulator shall not exercise both—

(a) his functions under this Act, and

(b) his functions under the enactment from which he derives his regulatory jurisdiction, at the same time and in respect of the same matter.'

No. 60, in schedule 10, page 78, line 7, at end insert

'if, but for those subsections, regard could be had to that general matter.'.

Government amendments Nos. 17 to 25, 33 to 37, 39 and 40.

Mr. Lansley: May I direct attention to amendments Nos. 47 and 60 in particular? It is helpful to have seen Government amendment No. 13. I recognise that it is, in substantial measure, a response to the issues that were raised in Standing Committee. I welcome the amendment in principle for that reason. Therefore, I will focus just on one important difference between amendment No. 13—which tries to create a structure that enables joint working between the Director General of Fair Trading and the other sector regulators—and amendment No. 47.

Subsection (6) of amendment No. 47 is intended to prevent a regulator, who has both Competition Bill powers and sector statute powers, from acting in relation to any given matter using powers from both Acts. To put it in a nutshell, it is intended to prevent a regulator from using Competition Bill powers in the first instance, but giving effect to decisions through regulators' powers.

Of course, not only does the director of the utility sector acquire additional powers, not least in relation to investigation and enforcement, through the Competition Bill, but, by using sector statute, he might be able to avoid some of the due processes that are contemplated in relation to the Bill. Therefore, the mixing of the two is an unhappy situation. Using the two together might lead to an unsatisfactory blurring of the distinctions between the exercise of Competition Bill powers and of regulators' powers.

To cut a long argument to a simple point, we all recognise that regulators have competing objectives. In this particular instance, they are often seeking to meet what are essentially structural objectives in relation to the industry: for example, the reduction of market share on the part of an operator within the utility that they regulate. They may pursue that objective through the exercise of regulatory powers, but they may try to use Competition Bill powers in the first instance, or undertake investigations, and so on. It would be undesirable for there to be a blurring between the two things. There may be circumstances where they want to reduce dominance, but in doing so try to assert abuse where abuse does not necessarily exist.

11.30 pm

The intention of that part of amendment No. 47—which I continue to commend to the Government, and which is not really reflected in Government amendment No. 13—is to take away the opportunity to move between the two jurisdictions in relation to the same matter. I welcome the Government's response to that point.

We could tie ourselves up in discussing amendment No. 60, so suffice it to say that, in Committee, the Under-Secretary took the view that the Government amendments were sufficient to bring the powers of the Director General of Telecommunications directly in line with the other utility statutes. However, my view is that, given that the Telecommunications Act 1984 does not operate in precisely the same way as other sector statutes, that would be true only if this further tailpiece was added on to the relevant part of schedule 10. I hope that the Under-Secretary will reflect on whether he has achieved the objective of trying to bring the powers directly into line.

To save time, I will not dwell on any other arguments. Given that the Under-Secretary has been looking for assistance from industry, I was grateful to receive from the electronics industry—to cite just one example—confirmation that it saw benefit in some of my amendments, especially amendment No. 47. It is concerned to ensure that there is clarity in the manner in which the utility sector regulators use their powers.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: At 11.31 pm, I can offer the House my 18-page briefing or the truncated Griffiths two-page version. I hope that the two-page version will cover the key points. In particular, I want to spend a little time on amendments Nos. 47 and 60.

There are Government amendments in this grouping. They would allow regulators to co-ordinate their activities under the Bill in a more effective manner.

[Mr. Nigel Griffiths]

They are a response to the concerns voiced by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) in Committee. It was suggested that the present arrangements imposed artificial constraints. The amendments would replace the present inflexible arrangement with a more flexible regulation-making power.

Amendment No. 60 would add clarification to new section 3(3C), which this Bill inserts into the Telecommunications Act 1984. Section 3(3C) deals with the ability to have regard to the subject matter of statutory duties when the duties themselves are disapplied. I assure the House that no amendment is needed, as section 3(3C) achieves its intended effect. It makes specific provision about consideration of the subject matter of statutory duties in the context of the exercise of the Director General of Telecommunications' concurrent functions under the Bill. However, it makes no change to the ability to have regard to the subject matter of statutory duties, where it is relevant, in respect of other functions in the Telecommunications Act where the statutory duties themselves have been disapplied.

As the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire was generous enough to admit, amendment No. 47 covers the same ground as the Government's amendment in dealing with the consultation and joint determination on who should exercise functions—subsection (4). However, it would also require joint decision making where jurisdictions overlap—subsection (5)—and it would preclude a regulator from exercising Bill functions and sector-specific regulatory functions at the same time in relation to the same matter—subsection (6).

The effect of the third part of amendment No. 47 would seem to be to import uncertainty about the lawfulness of use by a regulator in particular cases of information that he has obtained under Bill powers when subsequently exercising his functions under the regulatory Act. The amendment, by creating a firm division between the two sets of functions, increases the scope for challenge to the original use of the powers—for example, on the grounds that the chances of being able to take any enforcement action under the Bill were so small that the use of Bill powers to gather information was unreasonable.

I believe that amendments Nos. 60 and 47 would—I put it no stronger—weaken the Bill.

I hope that my explanation satisfies the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire. However, if he would like me to deal with further points, I shall be more than happy to do so from my 18-page briefing.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister for the character of his reply. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 12, in page 28, line 16, leave out 'exercised' and insert 'exercisable'.

No. 13, in page 28, line 18, at end insert—

'(4) The Secretary of State may make regulations for the purpose of co-ordinating the performance of functions under this Part ("Part I functions") which are exercisable concurrently by two or more competent persons as a result of any provision made by Part II or III of Schedule 10.

(5) The regulations may, in particular, make provision—

(a) as to the procedure to be followed by competent persons when determining who is to exercise Part I functions in a particular case;

(b) as to the steps which must be taken before a competent person exercises, in a particular case, such Part I functions as may be prescribed;

(c) as to the procedure for determining, in a particular case, questions arising as to which competent person is to exercise Part I functions in respect of the case;

(d) for Part I functions in a particular case to be exercised jointly—

(i) by the Director and one or more regulators, or

(ii) by two or more regulators, and as to the procedure to be followed in such cases;

(e) as to the circumstances in which the exercise by a competent person of such Part I functions as may be prescribed is to preclude the exercise of such functions by another such person;

(f) for cases in respect of which Part I functions are being, or have been, exercised by a competent person to be transferred to another such person;

(g) for the person ("A") exercising Part I functions in a particular case—

(i) to appoint another competent person ("B") to exercise Part I functions on A's behalf in relation to the case; or

(ii) to appoint officers of B (with B's consent) to act as officers of A in relation to the case;

(h) for notification as to who is exercising Part I functions in respect of a particular case.

(6) Provision made by virtue of subsection (5)(c) may provide for questions to be referred to and determined by the Secretary of State or by such other person as may be prescribed.

(7) "Competent person" means the Director or any of the regulators.'.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Clause 60

PRINCIPLES TO BE APPLIED IN DETERMINING QUESTIONS

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 61, in page 31, line 40, leave out from 'concerned)' to end of line 43 and insert

'the provisions of this Part are applied in a manner which is consistent with the application of the corresponding provisions of Community law.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 62, in page 31, line 44, at beginning insert

'Subject to the other provisions of this Part,'.

No. 63, in page 31, line 44, leave out 'determines a question' and insert 'deals with a matter'.

No. 64, in page 31, line 45, leave out from 'act' to 'whether' in line 1 on page 32.

No. 65, in page 32, line 4, leave out 'determining that question' and insert 'dealing with that matter'.

No. 66, in page 32, line 6, leave out from 'time' to 'Community' in line 7 and insert

'dealing with a similar matter under'.

No. 67, in page 32, line 13, at end insert—

'(4A) Subject to subsection (4B), where any question arises concerning the interpretation of this Part and, in particular, whether for the purposes of this section—

(a) a provision of Community law is a corresponding provision,

(b) a relevant difference exists between a provision of this Part and a corresponding provision of Community law,

(c) a matter arising under Community law is a similar matter, or

(d) a decision or statement of the Commission is a relevant decision or statement, any person with sufficient interest in the matter to which the question relates may apply to the relevant court for the determination of that question and the court may determine that question and make such declaration as it considers appropriate.

(4B) Where any question concerning the interpretation of this Part arises in proceedings before an appeal tribunal, an application for the determination of that question by a relevant court in accordance with subsection (4A) may only be made with the leave of that tribunal.

(4C) In subsections (4A) and (4B) "relevant court" means—

(a) in England and Wales, the High Court;

(b) in Scotland, the Court of Session;

(c) in Northern Ireland, the High Court.'.

No. 68, in page 32, line 18, at end insert—

'(7) In this section "a provision of Community law" includes the general principles of Community law and decisions of the European Court.'.

New clause 3—Decisions on matters subject to a Commission investigation—

'.—(1) Subject to subsection (3) below, the Director shall not make a decision that—

(a) an agreement infringes the Chapter I prohibition; or

(b) conduct infringes the Chapter II prohibition,

if that agreement or conduct is the subject of an investigation by the European Commission under a provision of Community law relating to Article 85 or 86.

(2) Nothing in this section shall prevent the Director from conducting in respect of that agreement or conduct—

(a) an investigation in accordance with section 25; or

(b) a Director's investigation or Director's special investigation within the meaning of Part II.

(3) If the Director has grounds to believe that the European Commission will conclude that agreement or conduct to which subsection (1) applies will not be found to be within the Commission's competition law jurisdiction, he may proceed to make a decision under sections 14 and 22.'.

Mr. Lansley: At this late hour, the House will forgive me if I do not explain the arguments in their full form—the 18-page version. Earlier in the debate, the Minister was at pains to say that the Government believe that it is important to respond to representations—not least from the Confederation of British Industry, for example. He will be aware that, like my hon. Friends and members of the public, the CBI is very concerned that the provisions in clause 60 will have to be better defined in the legislation if the Government's intentions are to be realised accurately. We essentially believe that the issues should be better defined in legislation rather than waiting for the courts to do the job.

The matters of "corresponding question" and "relevant difference", for example, have not yet been defined in the Bill. If the Government's intention is to align UK and Community law as closely as possible, they should be able to tell us what constitutes the relevant differences. Otherwise, over time, the principles may begin to diverge again. For example, clause 60 deals with incompatibilities. Will the Government list them? Where do the Government expect the Bill to depart from European Community law?

[Mr. Lansley]

In respect of the purpose of amendment No. 61 and the others grouped with it, I am attempting to do the Government's job for them. If we cannot have the legislation that we want, we may as well amend the Bill to achieve the secondary objective of which industry is seized—clarity and certainty. We will end up with lack of clarity and uncertainty if we proceed with clause 60 without knowing what the corresponding questions are and how they are to be determined. The clause should be amended so that all the provisions in the Bill are treated as corresponding in effect. We should not have relevant differences—those that exist should be specified. Instead of including phrases or provisions from Community law, we should replace corresponding provisions or inconsistency with a much clearer definition.

Amendment No.67 is additional and stands alone. It seeks to provide a better mechanism for determining the issues that arise on clause 60 by permitting a person with sufficient interest in the matter to apply for a determination by the relevant courts so that a declaratory ruling may be obtained.

I have provided an unsatisfactory explanation of a matter on which I could have spent considerable time. I am concerned that so far—even in Standing Committee—Ministers have not examined clause 60 sufficiently. The phraseology used in the clause opens up precisely the differences between UK and EC law to which they objected in other respects. It should have been replaced by a provision that aligned the two systems of jurisprudence instead of one that served the Government's purposes without telling us in what respect they envisaged that the relevant differences and incompatibilities would emerge over time.

Mr. Ian McCartney: First, I thank the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) for his constructive approach to the matter. I accept that, because of an agreement to complete proceedings on the Bill within an appropriate time, neither he nor I will be able to set out in detail why he feels the amendments should be accepted and why I would resist them. Therefore, I shall write to him setting out the points that I do not have time to make tonight so that he can consider them before the Bill returns to the House. That is inviting opportunities, but it is only fair to the hon. Gentleman and to myself.

Clause 60 is important. It exists to ensure that, as far as possible, UK and EC prohibitions are interpreted and develop consistently with the EC competition law system. That is critical in minimising burdens on business.

Although I welcome the spirit of the amendments, I cannot accept that they would improve the wording of the clause or the operation of the regime and I am happy to explain briefly why that is the case.

Amendment No.67 is significant as it introduces a new and separate step into the operation of the Bill—the right to apply to the High Court, or the equivalent in Scotland and Northern Ireland, to determine questions. The questions include whether a provision of Community law is a corresponding provision; whether a relevant difference exists between UK and European law; whether a matter arising under European law is similar and whether a decision or statement of the Commission is relevant.

The amendment is wrong in principle. It appears to be based on the mistaken view that there is a choice of law between UK and European systems and that the choice should be made even before the substance of a case is addressed. There is no such choice of law. There are not two rival sets of principles. There is but one set of principles. Accordingly, interpretation of the Bill is not a two-stage process. One cannot construe the prohibitions and then compare them. They must be construed from the outset on the basis of clause 60.

The Government have made it clear on a number of occasions that it would be wrong to allow appeals on interim stages of the decision-making process. If we allowed appeal at every step of way, we would end up in an interminable process. The appropriate course is to allow the director to make a decision and to confine appeals to substantive decisions. Those arguments apply in this context.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire also tabled amendments Nos. 62 to 66. We believe that we have followed the right formulation and approach in clause 60. I shall give the hon. Gentleman a more substantive reply on the amendments in writing, and hope that he will feel able, even given this stilted debate, to fight another day.

New clause 3 covers similar ground to the subject of the discussion in Committee of various amendments to clause 42, especially the then proposed new clause 12. The amendments were broadly concerned with avoidance of forms of possible double jeopardy, where agreements or conduct may fall both within the scope of domestic prohibitions under the Bill and European prohibitions under articles 85 and 86 of the treaty. It will probably come as no surprise to the House that we do not see any need to alter the Bill's provisions for dealing with parallel jurisdiction, particularly in investigations.

More particularly, I reiterate that, when the Commission is actively investigating an agreement or conduct, there will be no practical point in the director's starting a separate investigation. The practical assurance of unnecessary duplication of investigation between the Commission and the director is achieved by the alignment of the UK prohibitions with those of articles 85 and 86 and the practical co-operation that will exist between the Commission and the United Kingdom. For those and a number of other reasons, we find the new clause unacceptable. I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Lansley: I was quite fond of new clause 3, and quite sad to forgo the opportunity to explain it in detail. In fond expectation of further communication from the Minister, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

REGULATIONS, ORDERS AND RULES

Amendment made: No. 15, in page 39, line 20, leave out 'or' and insert—

'( ) section 50, or'.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

11.45 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 39, line 20, leave out 'or' and insert—

"( ) section 51, in the case of the first order made by the Secretary of State under that section, or'.

This evening is only the second time that I have played hookey from the proceedings of the Bill. On Second Reading on May 11, I hung on the lips of the President of the Board of Trade during her 52-minute speech. I stayed on the ramparts while what seemed like half the Labour party attacked Mr. Murdoch, and at about a quarter to 9, I made my own plea to serve on the Committee that considered the Bill. It is perhaps forgivable at that late hour that I misquoted an interlocutor of the Duke of Wellington.

The Committee of Selection graciously put me on the Committee, on which I served with constant admiration for my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friends, and occasional amazement at the ramshackle quality of the arguments deployed by the Government. Until late this evening, I have been serving on the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, the members of which very properly feel that one cannot make a mature decision until after dusk.

My first absence from the proceedings of the Bill was on the morning of June 23, when I was absent from the Committee on lawful occasions, which, in all piety, I indicated to the Minister. A little after 11 o'clock that morning, the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs embarked on the long furrow of moving and speaking to his new schedule, which affected community pharmacies. He concluded the furrow with a passage of the new schedule three and a half hours of debate later at 6 o'clock.

Very early that morning, my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) moved the amendment that served as a jewel-like harbinger to the matter before us. He moved it with the same coruscating clarity that characterised his actions throughout the Committee, which makes it such an honour that his name is attached to mine on amendment No. 59.

I shall not rehearse all the arguments that my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire deployed on June 23, which occupy three columns in the Official Report of Committee proceedings. The issue related to the fact that, in what was then clause 70, now clause 71, there is a power to make regulations and orders. My hon. Friend sought to make the Secretary of State's orders under clause 51 subject to affirmative resolution.

The Minister resisted the amendment on two grounds—first, the slowness and greater difficulty imposed on the process of introducing any necessary adjustments to the rules, and secondly, that the rules concerned only procedural matters, which fell below the level of primary legislation or matters subject to affirmative resolution.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire responded by reminding the Minister of the weight that the Government had attached throughout the Committee to the clarificatory rules that the director will make. He said that the rules might be procedural in content, but were substantive in effect. My hon. Friend added that, although he understood the Minister's case—that multiple use of the affirmative resolution procedure might be difficult in practice when the rules were amended—it was still desirable to have the fullest possible scrutiny on the first occasion that the director's rules were made.

The Minister's total silence in response to that reasonable suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire has provoked him and me to bring the concept back on report. In making this tiny personal scratch on the Government's adamantine front—this is the only time I have bothered the House on report—I remark that, on the Government's other objection, EU experience has shown that the procedural elements of competition law can be of immense importance. In a number of key cartel cases, appeals have turned on procedural points.

In schedule 9, there are matters on which rules may be made which are not merely procedural. If I may give examples where the rules provide for the circumstances in which the director may act, the imposition of conditions or the cancellation of them in relation to parallel exemptions under paragraph 9—and, likewise, in relation to third-party rights on disclosure of information under paragraph 12—will serve.

What will be of particular interest in such matters—the House will be delighted to hear that I am concluding—is the extent to which the rules will depart from EU principles in similar circumstances. Finally, rules under clause 51 are not limited to the matters in schedule 9, and I draw the Minister's attention to clause 51(2). I hope that the Government will look with favour on this small amendment at this late hour.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I should like to be able to accommodate the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke), whose contributions to the Committee have been entertaining from first to last.

I recognise that the right hon. Gentleman is proposing only that the first exercise of the power to make orders under clause 51 should be subject to the affirmative resolution. Nevertheless, I do not think that the rules under clause 51 are of such significance that they should be subject to affirmative resolution. Lest he does not wish to rely on my judgment, I pray in aid two other important bodies.

We are reflecting the guidance of the then Joint Committee on Delegated Legislation, which, in its second report in 1972-1973, suggested that the affirmative resolution procedure might normally be appropriate for powers substantially affecting provisions of Acts of Parliament. The powers under clause 51 do not fall into any of those categories. Similarly, the House of Lords Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Deregulation did not question the fact that this power was subject to negative resolution when it reported on the Bill.

I want to reassure the right hon. Gentleman that clause 51 (3) requires the director general to consult when he is preparing rules, so those likely to be affected will have the opportunity to make their views known. I hope that that will allow the right hon. Gentleman, on reflection, to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Brooke: I am disappointed by the Minister's response, as is my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). However, the Minister knows the way to my heart. The original Committee set up in the House of Lords to look at delegated legislation was chaired by my late noble father. When it was decided that there should be a Joint Committee of both Houses, my father was approached by the Leader of this House, who said how desirable it would be to have at least one member of the House of Lords Committee serving on the Joint Committee, and how helpful it would be if he would chair the Joint Committee. My father did that as well.

Under those circumstances, it would be churlish of me to resist the plea that the Minister is making—although I hope that the Government will not rue the day. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

11.56 pm

Mr. Ian McCartney: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

First, I thank the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) for his assistance. If he keeps it up, he may be in for a job on this side of the House. [Laughter.] This is new new Labour.

The Competition Bill is a major step forward for British consumers, business and competitiveness. It will radically reform and strengthen the laws to deal with anti-competitive behaviour, such as cartels and abuses of a dominant market position.

Both consumers and business deserve a better deal, which the Bill will deliver. The Government have acted swiftly, whereas the Conservative Government dithered for years and did nothing. Anti-competitive behaviour hits ordinary people; it means lower quality, at higher prices. Competition is vital to ensure choice and value. The vast majority of businesses that work so hard to compete also deserve better protection from the few that seek to cheat and bully.

The current competition regime is often bureaucratic, slow and ineffective. The powers for rooting out and dealing with serious anti-competitive behaviour are notoriously weak. In the meantime, customers and competitors suffer. Smaller companies have been driven out of business while complaints were investigated. Even the most blatant cartels can get away with little more than a slap on the wrist. As a result, there is very little deterrence to anti-competitive behaviour, and no recompense for firms and consumers that are on the receiving end of it.

The Bill will put those failings right. The Director General of Fair Trading will be able to act swiftly to stamp out anti-competitive practices. Those on the receiving end of such practices will have new rights to seek damages. Moreover, the Bill will sweep away the existing bureaucratic restrictive practice laws, which require many thousands of harmless commercial agreements to be registered.

The Bill modernises our competition law to bring it more in line with the prohibition regimes that already operate in the European Union and in many of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries. Many UK firms already have to deal with EU competition laws. The Bill will greatly simplify matters for such firms by introducing prohibitions that are modelled on those in the EU rules.

Reform of the current regime is long overdue. The Bill will give us a really modern and effective competition regime at last. The result will be stronger markets, a better deal for consumers and more opportunities for good British businesses to thrive. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Boswell: We have all enjoyed listening to the Minister's press release. The Government have been ambitious, even courageous, in introducing a complex Bill which attempts to merge the European philosophy on competition with British domestic legislation. The attempt is massive in scale, but it has by no means wholly succeeded.

In preparation for tonight, I read my Second Reading speech, and I have never before found that so many queries that I raised on Second Reading remained on Third Reading. Many additional issues of concern arose in Committee. My old philosophy tutor used to say, "Always start your essay with a query, try to answer it, and end with another." The Minister must have been one of his pupils, too.

There are some concepts in the Bill about which industry may be happy, but the CBI and other representative and responsible organisations retain considerable reservations on various aspects. In our haste to consider the Bill, one or two issues were not fully rehearsed. For example, the CBI brought to our attention in its latest letter the interaction of the continuing powers on scale monopoly with the new prohibitions. Much will depend on how the Government and the director general interpret the law.

There is a need for clarity in explanation for businesses, and especially small businesses, at all stages of implementation. As has been clearly revealed tonight, there is a huge, and in my view unhealthy, reliance on the order-making process—for example, in relation to the director general's rules and issues such as fees, of which we know nothing yet. The House will need to give those subjects further detailed scrutiny.

Real concerns remain about the compliance costs, even conceptually. We have not explored tonight, as we did in Committee, the imperfections, inconsistencies and incoherence in the Government's analysis of compliance costs, which does not do nearly enough to acknowledge the problems that businesses will face in seeking legal advice.

Most businesses are legitimate and want to trade fairly, so it is incumbent on the Secretary of State and the director general to proceed whenever possible by exception, and with sensitivity. We move now from press release to implementation, which affects business, whose costs need to be kept to a minimum.

There are still gross imperfections and a tendency to excessive intrusion in the Bill, which has been greatly oversold in its effects, but we do not think it appropriate to divide on Third Reading: like the Minister, no doubt in his case with his fingers crossed, we stand back to see how it will work in practice.

12.3 am

Dr. Ladyman: This is the first Bill on which I have served throughout its passage through the House. I apologise to my hon. Friends for irritating them at times, and beg their indulgence. I am grateful to Opposition Members for the challenge that they have offered throughout.

Opposition Members seem on occasions to have minimised the crimes with which the Bill is designed to deal. When people act anti-competitively, they are stealing just as much as someone who burgles or steals from one's house, so it is important that we take the matter seriously. The Government have done so; they have done good work in producing the Bill, and I am proud to have helped with some parts of that process.

12.4 am

Mr. Chidgey: I, too, do not intend to detain the House for long—[Interruption.]—although I am grateful for the support that I seem to be gathering from all corners of the House; the longer it goes on, the longer I will go on.

The Liberal Democrats have made it clear since Second Reading that we support the main principles in the Bill and welcome the strengthening of competition law by the two major prohibitions: the chapter I prohibition on agreements to prevent, restrict or distort competition, and the prohibition of abuse of a dominant position. We have had many interesting, but not necessarily satisfactory, debates on those. We also agree with the principle of providing for a new regime to be applied and enforced by the Director General of Fair Trading and giving powers to investigate if reasonable grounds for suspecting that either of those two prohibitions have been infringed.

However, it is about the body of the Bill, the substance of the debate and the detail of the arguments that our reservations have remained—reservations which the Government have failed to overcome in spite of extensive debates, attempts to amend the Bill and lengthy probing in Committee.

Hon. Members will recall that the Bill came to the House from the other place with key amendments, which in the main met our fundamental reservations about the Bill. During our debates, the Government have seen fit in every case to overturn those amendments—specifically, measures to clarify the exclusion of vertical agreements, to resolve the issue of retail price maintenance on over-the-counter medicines and the effect that that will have on community pharmacies, and to tackle the dangers of predatory anti-competitive practices in reducing the diversity and independence of our national newspaper press.

The last is the key issue—the Government's refusal to recognise the limitations of the Bill in dealing with predatory anti-competitive practices in the national press. The Government have claimed that the various amendments tabled at different stages were all unnecessary and unworkable, yet they know only too well that independent and highly respected legal advice has argued to the contrary. At the very least, the Government's legal advice is saying one thing and equally eminent, reliable and respected advice is saying the opposite. That means that we may enact a Bill which will be a field day for lawyers and a great benefit to those organisations that intend to pursue predatory practices.

The Government should reflect on that, as this Bill could well be a Pandora's box for the future. I hope that it will not be, and that, through the various processes, we will find some strength in it. If we do not, the Government know where the blame will lie.

12.7 am

Mr. Brooke: I shall be exceptionally brief.

In the first debate of this Parliament, I said that the battle of Isandhlwana was over, and the defence of the mission station at Rorke's Drift was about to begin. The Minister of State, who was good-humoured throughout our proceedings, paid me the, perhaps unconscious, compliment of echoing that thought. In Committee, he picked up a reference of mine to faith and bestowed the soubriquet of "Faith, Hope and Charity" on my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friends the Members for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), the Whip.

Whether consciously or unconsciously, the Minister bestowed upon them the names of the three Fairey Swordfish biplanes that, at the start of the world war two assault on Malta, represented the entire British aerial defence of the island available to the Governor. The Government may mock the resources available to this side of the House, but the three Fairey Swordfish successfully defended Malta, and we went on to win the war.

12.8 am

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): As perhaps one of the few Members of the House who have run businesses around the world, I welcome in principle an improvement in competition law. It has been my experience that north America and even Asia have considerably more open and competitive economies than continental Europe or the United Kingdom. However, I am not entirely sure whether the primary objective of the Bill is harmonisation with European competition law or the improvement of competition in Britain.

The Bill has grave weaknesses. We have already heard of the problems of harmonising with European law relating to intrastate versus interstate under article 85. We need to harmonise on whether cases will be heard in one jurisdiction when they could be dealt with in two. Companies will have the problem of requiring clearance both in Europe and in the United Kingdom. There is the problem of whether UK authorities can vary exemptions obtained in Europe, which could add to the muddle.

The Bill will create uncertainty, and it will give too much power to the Director General of Fair Trading, rather than providing democratic accountability through the President of the Board of Trade. It will be a burden on medium and small businesses. I am particularly concerned that those who run oligopolistic companies seem too relaxed. I hope that the Bill will improve competition, but I fear that it tries to do two different things, and that it will fail adequately to achieve either.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Economic Development (North Northumberland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

12.10 am

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs has been on the Treasury Bench for most of the past seven hours, but I must detain him a little longer. A matter of importance to people in my constituency has arisen from the announcement last week by the Dawson Group of more than 700 redundancies. The group, which owns Pringle, the knitwear company, has blamed the high pound, a reduction in far east markets and general economic conditions, all of which have presented severe obstacles to exporting companies, particularly those producing quality products for the far east. However, the company has had its own failings in the United States and in its marketing strategy.

It is a tragedy for Berwick that so many jobs should be lost in the borders. Pringle has been in Berwick for 50 years, and the factory that is to close currently employs 280 people. The remainder of the 700 jobs are in other parts of the borders. Pringle used not say much about the Berwick factory; I think that it thought that too high a profile for the significant part of its product that was expertly made in England would undermine its claim to be Pringle of Scotland. Privately, however, Pringle recognised how successful that manufacturing unit was.

The shock closure follows many years of job losses in a small town that cannot stand so many losses. Recently, 200 jobs were lost at Pringle. More than 100 jobs were lost when Polychrome left Berwick. About 100 seasonal jobs in the salmon fishing industry have been lost. More than 150 went when the shipyard closed. Other trades, including agriculture and engineering, have also had significant job losses. The latest blow is devastating for the families involved. The loss to the local economy will add up to millions of pounds in wages that passed through the town's businesses and contributed to the welfare of all.

We need help, on both sides of the border, and some of the crisis can be dealt with on a cross-border basis. Reports in London newspapers have referred to closure of two Scottish factories by Pringle, carefully omitting to mention that one of them is in England. That is why the English Minister responsible for industry—Scotsman though he is—is here to answer this debate. His counterpart at the Scottish Office, the Minister for Education and Industry, has also been closely involved in discussions since the redundancies were announced. He said:

"I recognise that a significant proportion of the people working in the Berwick factory are resident on [the Scottish] side of the border."

There are many reasons why the Scottish Office must remain interested in what is happening not only in Scottish parts of the borders, but in Berwick-upon-Tweed, for which the English-based Minister is responsible.

The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office visited Hawick two days after the closure announcement. He announced a package of measures at a meeting arranged before the closure by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). The package aroused much interest. My hon. Friend described it as the beginning of an answer, feeling grateful that the measures had been announced but that more needed to be done. From the English side of the border, the question that comes to mind is: what is our equivalent of those measures? That is one of the things that I hope the Minister will tell us tonight.

The Scottish Office Minister announced an additional £1 million for Scottish Borders Enterprise immediately; a commitment to best endeavours to find additional extra funding if Scottish Borders Enterprise can bring forward further viable projects; the setting up of a new rural inward investment unit within Locate in Scotland, which will attract investment to areas such as the borders; a commitment to provide the borders with reallocated, unused European structural funds if any become available; and a commitment to keep discussions with the Dawson Group open and to assist it in redevelopment. We are anxious that that may lead to the funding of new factory development on the Scottish side of the border to replace factory capacity still available on the English side. That would make no sense.

The Scottish Office Minister also announced Scottish Office support for an IT link between Heriot-Watt university and the Scottish college of textiles and mentioned other measures already announced, such as the designation of Hawick as a property employment support programme area and the expansion of telecoms infrastructure in the borders. In some parts of the borders, it is even less developed than it is in Berwick. The package must have some English counterpart, and I hope that the Minister will say what it is.

I wish to put to the Minister some other measures that should form part of the response on the English side. On European funds, we are already anxious about the potential loss of objective 5b funds, which have been a source of some help for industrial projects in north Northumberland. Northumberland and Durham's joint bid for objective 1 funding has been jeopardised by the claims of European statisticians that it is not a cohesive area. I contradict that argument. I hope that the Government will continue to press actively for objective 1 status.

I wonder whether the Retex scheme for textile areas still has funds in it that could be made available to help replace lost textile jobs in the area. The loss of jobs in the textile industries is recognised across Europe as requiring special help.

There are employment measures that could be taken. The Government could accelerate the new deal programme for over-25s. On present plans, it will be some time before they become eligible, and redundant Pringle workers would not be become eligible until they had satisfied the 12-month rule. In other areas, I think that measures have been taken to exempt redundant workers from that limitation. It could be done alongside bringing forward the new deal measures for over-25s so that they become available more quickly in Berwick. I hope that the Minister will press his colleagues to pursue that course.

To attract new industry to the area, we want to press ahead with infrastructure projects that make the area attractive to and viable for industry, of which the best known is the need to complete the dualling of the A1, which remains on either side of Berwick an unsatisfactory single carriageway road and a deterrent to industrial development. There is cross-party agreement that dualling should go ahead. We await the announcement of the roads review with trepidation. I hope that the news about Pringle has been telegraphed to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions so that it realises that A1 dualling has assumed even further importance as we try to make the area attractive to industry.

Berwick has longer-term plans for a rail freight terminal. We want that development to be encouraged. There are also various local projects in different Government Departments and with other bodies which, in these circumstances, Ministers should try to help along and give a sympathetic nod to. There is a private finance initiative bid by the council for 250 houses to be built by housing associations in the town and the surrounding area; I hope that that will be encouraged. There is a foyer project for young people in the Old Granary in the town centre. There is a heritage lottery bid for completion of townscape work that has already been begun, but has been set back by a change in the national heritage fund rules and system of bidding. I am concerned about that, because we need such work to continue; it provides some continuing employment during the present crisis and helps to attract people to the town.

I emphasise that many of my suggestions go beyond the Department of Trade and Industry. What needs to be done is interdepartmental, involving many Government Departments, and cross-border. We used to have an eastern borders development association that recognised, by its very existence, that the eastern borders had a coherence. Indeed, the borders as a whole, with their shared dependence on the textile industry and agriculture, have many features in common; people travel across the border, and businesses ignore the border as their activities cross it continuously. We have to look at the impact on both sides of the border of measures of this sort.

A practical way forward is to respond to the present crisis by getting the relevant agencies together and knocking heads together so that we can get some co-ordination of possible solutions. That could be done by forming a task group, which could meet in Berwick and draw together all those who have a contribution to make, ensuring that action in Berwick was related to that in the adjoining borders. That group could include the local authorities from both sides of the Border—Northumberland county council, Berwick-upon-Tweed borough council and the Scottish Borders council—the Northumberland training and enterprise council, Northumberland business link, English Partnerships, the Northern Development Company, the Government office for the north-east and Scottish Enterprise. The group would embrace the means to cover local business development, training measures, the attraction of new activities to the town and the provision of the new infrastructure and facilities to support new growth. In addition, it could press the European funding issues I mentioned.

The work would be greatly helped if the Government looked again at Berwick's status for development purposes. Berwick lost its assisted area status in 1984, but, much more recently, the Rural Development Commission excluded Berwick from the areas in which it did economic regeneration work, even though that work was vital to the rural hinterland around Berwick, whose population's prospects depended on what happened in the town. Now that the factory closure has taken place, surely this is the moment to reintroduce the RDC work into Berwick. That work is in the process of being transferred to the regional development agency, but, before that process is completed, a decision should be taken that Berwick should be included within the rural project work that used to be undertaken by the RDC.

All that work can be better advanced if we get the various agencies together, recognise that many Departments, governmental bodies and local government bodies have a contribution to make, and acknowledge that the problem is a cross-border issue. We have to get people moving to draw together the resources that are already available through existing channels and to put in bids for the new funds that will be needed for significant new action.

Over the years, the nominal unemployment rate in Berwick may have appeared low, but, as in much of the borders, that is partly because young people simply give up and go away to find work elsewhere. The actual unemployment rate will be increased by 50 per cent. as a result of the closure of the Pringle factory. The situation has worsened significantly, so action of the sort that I have outlined is now essential.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Nigel Griffiths): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on securing this important debate. The right hon. Gentleman has represented his constituency for 25 years and he spoke with considerable knowledge. I grew up in the borders and I have always taken a keen interest in the issues affecting Berwick, Galashiels, Hawick and the other conurbations. I am pleased to be able to respond on behalf of the Government.

I worked briefly in a textile mill and I have some first-hand knowledge of the sector. I am sad, but not surprised, that neither the shadow President of the Board of Trade nor any of his Conservative colleagues have appeared in the Chamber to listen to this important debate on the problems facing the textile industry, particularly in the Berwick area. I am afraid that it is yet another example of the Opposition failing to know or care about the problems that have been raised.

The textile and clothing sector is of great importance to the United Kingdom economy, to local employment and to regional economies. The sector is the ninth largest UK manufacturing industry, if we include footwear. Manufacturers' sales total over £17 billion and the value of exports was over £7 billion in 1996, the latest figure available. With employment totalling over 421,000, it is clearly an important and significant employer. That is why my hon. Friend the Minister for Science, Energy and Industry has met representatives of the textile, clothing and footwear industries over the past six months. He has had the opportunity to discuss with them the important issues affecting that sector.

The Government are supporting a range of activities aimed at improving the competitiveness of the textile and clothing industries. These include projects to help improve marketing skills, develop supply chain partnerships, encourage better links with industry and academia and improve environmental performance, as well as promoting the profile of the industry and assisting young fashion designers, which I know that all right hon. and hon. Members will welcome. My hon. Friend has also initiated a dialogue with the leading trade associations and with the trade unions with a view to reviewing and establishing a national strategy for the textile and clothing industries.

Let me indicate the help that has been given and then go on to deal in more detail with some of the other points raised by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. In the five years from April 1993 to 31 March 1998, enterprises in Northumberland received 127 offers of financial assistance from the regional selective assistance scheme. That totalled almost £24 million. The projects involve a total investment of £156 million, and they aim to create 3,340 new jobs and safeguard 865 existing jobs.

The right hon. Gentleman told us of some of the ways in which the Scottish Office has been able to respond to the Pringle closure, which demonstrate the value of regional autonomy. That is not yet available in the English regions, but the Government have introduced legislation that will result in the creation of regional development agencies. They will be in operation in April 1999. Until then, the Government's response will be as strong and positive as possible.

A number of steps have been taken so far in response to the local crisis to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. The regional director of the Government office for the north-east has already been in contact with Berwick-upon-Tweed borough council and will be visiting soon to co-ordinate a response group. That group already includes the Northumberland training and enterprise council, the Employment Service, Northumberland county council, Berwick-upon-Tweed borough council, Scottish Border Enterprises and representatives from Pringle. Initially, it is trying to help those affected by the redundancy by improving counselling, careers guidance and advice on retraining opportunities. The group will also examine ways in which to make better use of resources, including the Government's new deal programme and funding from a range of European sources.

The right hon. Gentleman has asked me whether his constituency is eligible for Retex assistance. Berwick-upon-Tweed is eligible for assistance under the EU's Retex II initiative. The purpose of that scheme is to provide assistance to areas affected by the decline in the textiles industry. The closure of the Pringle factory makes the area an obvious choice for funding from the scheme.

Over £500,000 is still available and can be used to provide business support to small and medium-sized enterprises, and for the conversion of former textile buildings to put them to commercial use. Another source of EU funds is the objective 5b northern uplands programme, which provides funding support for four main priorities: economic development and diversification, tourism, community development and environmental enhancement and conservation. Some £2 million of assistance is still available from that resource.

The creation of a response group provides the basis for a robust reaction to the Pringle factory closure. My officials in the Government office for the north-east understand the priority that I attach to ensuring that the group gets all possible Government support. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to liaise with the group to ensure that it benefits from his considerable expertise, which he has built up over a long period.

Mr. Beith: Can the Minister assure me that there is no obstacle to the response group drawing in expertise and interest from bodies on the Scottish side of the border?

Mr. Griffiths: I can confirm that. Scottish Border Enterprises is a member of the group and is working with representatives of Pringle and the right hon. Gentleman's local council. I hope that their excellent input will ensure that all possible local and national resources are devoted to ameliorating the problems that he has rightly highlighted in the debate.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Education Action Zones

1. Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Rothwell): What is the timetable for (a) applications and (b) decisions on the remaining education action zones which come into effect in 1998–99. [48088]

7. Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): What plans he has to increase the number of education action zones in the next four years. [48094]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): We had 60 applications for the present bidding round, 25 of which have been chosen to commence from September and/or January 1999, each receiving £750,000 a year for at least three years from public funds and £250,000 from other sources.

Mr. Gunnell: I thank my right hon. Friend for that information. Can he confirm that the Leeds local education authority can submit an application in the second phase of announcements for zone status for the inner-south Leeds family of schools, having withdrawn its earlier submission owing to reconsideration of the future for Middleton Park high school in my constituency? Will such an application get equal consideration alongside those remaining earlier submissions?

Mr. Blunkett: I am happy to confirm that applications from Leeds on the lines that my hon. Friend outlined would indeed be welcome. I was greatly impressed with the east Leeds initiative when I went to see it earlier this year with Madame Cresson, and I know the excellent work that is being undertaken by the schools, the governing bodies and the local education authority in Leeds. Should we be fortunate enough next week to secure the resources in the spending review to expand the number of education action zones in the remainder of this Parliament as we intend, Leeds will be a welcome bidder indeed.

Mr. Willis: I am deeply grateful to the Secretary of State for his final comments. He will know that my former school, John Smeaton community high school, was part of that east Leeds consortium and those words will be welcome there. Does he agree that the Liberal Democrats have strongly supported the introduction of education action zones? Indeed, we welcome their expansion, provided they are successful. Does he also accept that if an education action zone fails, it is the local education authority that has to pick up the pieces, so it is important that LEAs have representatives on education action zone forums?

Mr. Blunkett: We see education action zones as a partnership. Sometimes the LEA is the chair, sometimes business, and sometimes the schools have led the bid, as is the case with east Basildon and Croydon. Wherever the leadership comes from, partnership is crucial. The representation of all interests ensures that they can work together. Although I share the hon. Gentleman's sentiments about that partnership approach, the pieces would have to be picked up by all working in and being educated in the zone—the schools, the governing bodies and the LEA would be included, but parents and children would be at the receiving end. Our task is to ensure that education action zones do not fail, but we should learn the lessons from them and spread what works best as quickly as possible to the remainder of the education service.

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is some concern about the commercial input in certain education action zones? Can he specify exactly what will be the role and input of companies such as Shell in the zones?

Mr. Blunkett: I want to make it clear that I greatly welcome the tremendous commitment and enthusiasm that is being shown by business, in both cash and kind, to education action zones. I deprecate the abuse that some companies received at the hands of the broadcast media when we made the announcement The spectacle of Jeremy Paxman and others attacking those who were giving freely of their time and committing their resources, equipment and materials was a disgrace.

We welcome commitment—whether from Shell, British Aerospace, Marks and Spencer or BT—such as that in Hull, where British Aerospace is linking Hull with Rotterdam, and that in north-east Lincolnshire and Grimsby, where assistance is being given to link every home to schools, so that the network can provide education in the evenings, at the weekend, in the holidays. It is the beginning of a process for the future which will be achieved only if people come together and commit themselves to making it work.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Schools in education action zones will be buying books, computers and equipment from companies that operate for profit. Does the Secretary of State have any objection in principle to schools or schemes buying management or teaching services from companies that operate for profit, such as the Edison project in the United States?

Mr. Blunkett: I should be extremely careful not to endorse any private enterprise that is engaged in the education system, as I would disqualify it automatically from any future partnership or bidding process. As people buy equipment, design, cleaning and other services, we will expect the education service, not just in education action zones but elsewhere, to buy expertise wherever and whenever it is required. I make it clear again, as I have done publicly before, that education is not for sale. Education action zones are not the beginning of a process of privatisation.

Further Education Colleges

2. Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): What plans he has to ensure that the members of the boards of corporations of further education colleges are representative of the communities they serve. [48089]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State published on 5 March a consultation paper, "Accountability in Further Education", which addresses the matter. Responses are invited by 24 July.

Ms Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. May I inform him that, on a recent visit to my local further education college, I discovered that, of the 22 board members, seven represent staff and six represent local schools and business? Another eight—the single largest group—were appointed by the funding council; and of those, only one lives in the area served by the college. The other seven live up to 30 miles away in highly suburban areas, which are very different from the inner city where the students come from. There is no one from a minority ethnic community, despite the composition of the student group, and there are no parental links among that group with the college. Does he think that right?

Dr. Howells: I certainly do not think that that is right. We recommended in our Green Paper "The Learning Age" a great deal more accountability for the boards of further education colleges. The changes that we are proposing are designed to assist that process. For example, we shall restore the ability of local authorities to provide governors. Arrangements will be monitored very rigorously by the Further Education Funding Council, and the findings will be available publicly as part of its inspection reports.

Welfare to Work

3. Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): What steps he is taking to help people who are unemployed and over the age of 25 off benefits and into work. [48090]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): My right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities and I launched on 29 June the programme for adult long-term unemployed people, providing £75 a week subsidy, advice and counselling on the lines of the initial gateway for the younger unemployed, and up to a full year's full-time education for those for whom it is appropriate. In pathfinder areas, we are also providing forward funding for the skills initiative, which will help to overcome the skills shortage that has been identified so far by our skills task force.

Mrs. Gilroy: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. Does he agree that, for the 678 people in my constituency who are over the age of 25 and have been unemployed for two years, the new deal represents a good deal to help them back into employment? Is he satisfied with the progress in the pilot employment zone in Plymouth, which has already attached 50 people to personal advisers who are identifying personal barriers to getting back to work and staying in work?

Mr. Blunkett: I am very pleased to give the employment zone and those who got it off the ground the credit that they deserve. It is an excellent initiative and we hope to be able to build on it. We are delighted with the progress made in offering the adult unemployed a real opportunity. Major companies right across the board have been prepared to sign up to the programme since 29 June, and an extra £479 million of new money is going towards helping the longer-term unemployed, on top of the £450 million that is already being put in through the Employment Service, training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies in Scotland. That makes it possible to give hope to the long-term unemployed at the same time as investing in the future of young people.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Is the Secretary of State aware that some elements of the voluntary sector, especially those with long experience of helping people back into work, have been rather disturbed by some of the language used by his Department, which appears to imply that they have no role in the programme? Will he take this opportunity to say that that is not the case?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, I am happy to do so. In each of our initiatives, as I said earlier in relation to education, there is an emphasis on partnership. The voluntary sector and those with long-standing experience have an essential part to play not only in delivering the programmes but in giving advice on imaginative ways in which we can re-engage with those who, often through no fault their own, have been out of employment for a very long time.

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): Does my right hon. Friend agree that programme centres have proved more successful and more popular among the long-term unemployed, whom they were designed to help, than the Employment Service jobsearch programme? Is he aware that Rotherham is one of the national pilot centres, and that one of our two programme centres, run by QMAT—Quality Management and Training Ltd.—will celebrate tomorrow its 300th client placed in work? Given that the pilot programme centres have already proved their worth, what plans are there to extend the centres throughout the country?

Mr. Blunkett: I am delighted to commend the work that has been done in Rotherham, and those 300 people have clearly benefited greatly from programmes tailored on a modular basis to their specific needs. The same principles are beginning to be applied across the board. Employment zones, with the personal job accounts, are also a new and imaginative way of making progress. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities and I want to build on the experience that has been gained and develop the programmes more widely.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): Is the scheme under the new deal for unemployed over-25s compulsory? The design document suggests an element of compulsion, but it is not exactly clear. If there is compulsion, does the Secretary of State agree that, to offer no fifth option for the unemployed under 25 might be acceptable, but to offer no third option for the unemployed over 25 is not acceptable?

Mr. Blunkett: Attending for interview is compulsory, but taking one of the options available in the programme for the longer-term unemployed is not. When we develop our pilot programme from November, with £129 million of new money and programmes tailored for the 12-month to 18-month unemployed, further options will be available based on the principles set out for the under-25s.

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): I welcome the announcement that the over-25s will benefit from the new deal. In my constituency, the vast majority of the unemployed are over 25. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that one of the pilot projects to be launched later this year will be in Leicestershire; and that we are still on schedule to get the over-25 unemployed in my constituency back to work as soon as possible?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, I can confirm that that will be one of the pilots, with Fernley business services. It will provide a way for us to test out the most effective and imaginative ways of ensuring that we put behind us the scourge of allowing people to languish on the unemployment register without the prospect of being able to earn their living.

Unemployment

4. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): What assessment he has made of the likely trends in unemployment in the UK over the next two years; and if he will make a statement. [48091]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): By long-standing convention the Government do not publish forecasts of this kind.

Sir Teddy Taylor: While some of us think that the general outlook is rather depressing, does the Minister accept that the special problems of seaside towns like my constituency, where unemployment is particularly high, deserve his attention? One of my wards has 25 per cent. unemployment, yet we are denied all kinds of grants because we are counted as being in travel-to-work areas where unemployment is much lower.

Would the Minister be willing to have a special look at this problem, particularly over the next two years? Would he discuss with other colleagues in the Cabinet the possibility of changing the travel-to-work area basis for grants, bearing it in mind that in Southend we have lots of unemployment but no grants whatever?

Mr. Smith: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, we have as part of the new deal and our wider welfare-to-work initiative looked at the problems of seaside areas and the particular issues of seasonality as a factor in unemployment, and we have amended the criteria for early entry to the new deal programme to allow personal advisers the discretion to admit people early where seasonality and the pattern of work have been damaging prospects for employment.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman and other colleagues who represent seaside areas will acknowledge that we appreciate their particular needs. The hon. Gentleman referred to definitions of areas for particular help, and the matter is under consideration. It is primarily the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade; I shall make sure that the hon. Gentleman's concerns are drawn to her attention.

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): As my right hon. Friend is aware, the Manchester City Pride partnership responsible for delivering the new deal in Salford has applied to be a pilot project for the extension of the new deal to the long-term unemployed. Would not that be an excellent way to attack the unemployment problem, particularly in inner cities? A key issue for people wanting to become self-employed and to start their own business is access to capital, but in many inner-city areas, that is difficult. What help can the Minister provide to ensure that unemployed people have a real chance to set up their own business and so reduce the unemployment which is the scourge of many inner-city areas?

Mr. Smith: As part of the new deal for the young unemployed, help and advice will be available on progress to self-employment, and that will include advice on access to capital. As part of the new deal for the long-term unemployed, which started on 29 June, we shall extend access through work-based training to self-employment help and business start-up support. Where local TECs, like City Pride, can make that available, that will also be a feature of all the pilots which will be starting in November. I cannot endorse any particular pilot because we have to make a selection judged on the merits of the case, but I recognise the high quality of the delivery of the new deal for the young unemployed in Manchester.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): The Minister may not want to forecast unemployment now, but before the election he was happy to promise that he would make savings in benefits to unemployed people in order to spend more on education. Will he confirm that the number of unemployed people claiming benefit is now rising? Is that why the Government are incapable of delivering their pledge to raise the proportion of GDP on education spending?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman would do well to recall that since the Government were elected to office, employment has risen by 300,000, unemployment claimants are down by 270,000, and International Labour Organisation unemployment is down by 265,000.

The hon. Gentleman referred to recent trends. In the first quarter of this year employment increased by 60,000 and unemployment decreased by 35,000.

When the public hear these claims from the Opposition, they will not forget that it was the Conservative Government who took unemployment above 3 million, who condemned more than 1 million young people to unemployment, and who presided over interest rates at 15 per cent., inflation at nearly 10 per cent., and record levels of bankruptcies and repossessions. There can be no return to the boom and bust and the incalculable damage inflicted on the British people by the Conservative party.

Moral Instruction

5. Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): If he will issue guidance to schools to develop the capacity of school students to reason about moral issues; and if he will make a statement. [48092]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): The advisory group on education for citizenship and democracy has identified moral reasoning and responsibility as a vital component of citizenship in its initial advice and will be making final recommendations in July.

Mr. McWalter: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and for her interest in the question. Does she accept that many people leave school with an elementary or poor grasp of moral concepts and moral reasoning, and that perhaps we should get on with this matter with rather more haste than we have so far?

Ms Morris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. We could not have acted with more haste—we set up an advisory group that has looked at this issue, among others, and reported within the first year of the Labour Government. I look forward to further recommendations from the group and in due time to seeing citizenship, which includes moral reasoning, represent a full part of the curriculum for all our students.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does the hon. Lady agree that denominational schools are well placed to make a contribution in this process? Does she share my concern that, having gone out to public consultation on the issue following a previous outcry, the Liberal Democrat-controlled Devon county council has introduced a charging regime on parents who want to send their children to denominational schools, using figures described by the principal of Cuthbert Mayne school as nonsensical? Is it possible that, in the study that the hon. Lady mentioned a few moments ago, she might consider the question of denominational transport? While it clearly is not her fault that this situation has arisen, she is now in a position to do something about it.

Ms Morris: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on managing to bring denominational transport into a question about moral reasoning. It is for him to deal with what local Liberal Democrats are doing in the area that he serves. I agree with the first part of his question, however. I am greatly persuaded when I visit denominational schools in my constituency and beyond that they have a clear understanding of the shared values of the religious community. Part of the work on this aspect of education involves the encouragement of all our schools to acknowledge the shared values that are so important to every community—both school communities and the wider community.

Mr. Eddie O'Hara (Knowsley, South): Does the Minister agree that the way to develop moral reasoning is not only to impart knowledge to pupils but to give them the opportunity to put that knowledge into practice by interacting in curricular and extra-curricular activities? That is a good example of how both didactic teaching and active learning have their part to play. Those who overemphasise passive learning are pointing the route towards moral illiteracy among pupils.

Ms Morris: I have some sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. It is important to remember that giving children the opportunity to develop moral reasoning is not about telling them blindly to obey what other people say but about teaching them to become active citizens, to understand shared values and to grasp why there is a need for right and wrong both in school and in the wider society. That is what we aim to do with the extra emphasis that we are putting on citizenship. We want to enable students to grow up to be full and active citizens. That means teaching why we have right and wrong and why moral values are so important to society.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Is it not ironic that politicians should be talking about giving moral guidance to schoolchildren in a week in which the phrases "cash for access" and "Tony's cronies" have passed into the political lexicon? Is it not doubly ironic that this talk should be happening at a time when religious education and religious moral guidance are continually under pressure in schools?

Ms Morris: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman should raise that issue—one that I thought might be raised. One of the reasons why we set up our advisory group on citizenship, including moral reasoning, so speedily was that we saw the lack of ability to develop moral reasoning in the past as one explanation of why the previous Government thought that it was acceptable to receive cash for questions.

Local Education Authorities

6. Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): What proposals he has to redress inequities in resources allocated to local education authorities. [48093]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): We are currently reviewing the education standard spending assessment formula and the additional education needs index with the objective of achieving a fairer system. Decisions will be taken in the autumn.

Mr. Todd: I thank the Minister for the time that he spent meeting representatives of two deprived schools in my community, Newhall infants and Church Gresley St. George's. May I draw his attention to comments made by David Hart, the general secretary of the National Association of Head Teachers, who described the current system for allocating money to schools as grossly unfair? May I also draw his attention to the discrepancy between Derbyshire, where a primary school child receives support to the tune of £1,275 a year, and Kensington and Chelsea, where a child has £2,384 spent on his or her education? Can he explain or justify such a difference?

Mr. Byers: I do not intend to justify a system that we intend to change. We inherited from the previous Government a system under which the additional education needs index, which is supposed to measure poverty, lists Torbay as being more impoverished than Sheffield. and Barnsley as being in less poverty than Bournemouth. The system is clearly fundamentally flawed, and we will change it to ensure a fairer system for counties such as Derbyshire so that money can be invested in schools in areas that deserve funding.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Do I take it from that reply that the Minister does not deny a report in the Evening Standard a week ago that the Government plan to transfer funding from London to other parts of the country? [HON. MEMBERS: "Good idea."] My constituents will be interested to hear that. As the Minister is undertaking a review, will he consider seriously the need to increase funding in London because of huge cost increases exemplified by an alarming increase in vacancies for teachers in the metropolis?

Mr. Byers: We will move to a fair and transparent system for allocating resources. The standard spending assessment regime is only one part of the picture, and it must be considered alongside the comprehensive spending review, which will be made known to the House next week. Together, the review and the new assessment regime will put in place financial support so that every school can deliver high standards and the quality of education that our children deserve, both in London and elsewhere.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I thank the Minister for turning his attention recently to the needs of education in Stoke-on-Trent and Staffordshire. His review of the SSA will be crucial in dealing with the year-on-year cumulative underfunding our schools have suffered. May I refer him to the recent Coalfield Communities campaign report, which will tell him that educational achievement in Stoke-on-Trent averages 30 per cent. whereas the national average is 45 per cent. Will his fair and transparent review take into account the needs of Stoke-on-Trent and Staffordshire?

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend has been a strong campaigner for schools in her constituency and in Staffordshire. I am sure that the steps that the Government have already been able to take to assist schools in her constituency are making a difference at long last. However, that is only a start. Step by step, we must continue to invest properly and effectively in schools in her constituency and other parts of the country. I am confident that the outcome of the comprehensive spending review next week will bring money to modernise our schools system, money for reform and money to deliver the quality of education that our children deserve and our nation needs.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Does the Minister agree with the Secretary of State, who admitted to the Select Committee on Education and Employment the other day that the proportion of national income devoted to education fell during the Government's first year of office compared with our last year in office? Does he agree that that is the opposite of what Labour pledged to the electorate? Will he say how much it would cost to meet the pledge to increase educational expenditure as a proportion of national income?

Mr. Byers: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was referring to the budget for 1997–98, which was set by the Conservative Government when the hon. Gentleman was in office. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I condemn the fact that a reducing proportion of national wealth was going into education, but that is the legacy of his Government. Next week, it will begin to change because we shall have the outcome of the comprehensive spending review when Labour's priorities will be identified. They will include not waste, but education, health and other areas in which people want investment.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): What progress has been made on the stripping out of common costs? It is bizarre that while the cost of employing a teacher in most parts of the country is similar, that factor is not taken into account in the standard spending assessment.

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend raises an important point about the area cost adjustment factor in the education standard spending assessment. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is the lead Department on those matters, but I confirm that it has begun a review of how that factor works within the SSA. The outcome will be announced some time in the autumn.

Grammar Schools

8. Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): How many representations he has received from parents of grammar school pupils in the recent consultation document. [48095]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): The draft grammar school ballot regulations were issued for consultation on 3 June. The consultation period is continuing and will end on 31 July.

Mr. Brady: I thank the Minister for that answer. Will he accept my warm congratulations on the wisdom that he and his colleagues have shown in selecting Ashton-on-Mersey school in my constituency as a beacon school? Does he agree that that is a tribute to a selective system of education that is working well? The pupils who do not go to grammar schools in the borough of Trafford, far from being consigned to failure at the age of 11 as he and Labour Members suggest, are consigned to beacon schools. Is that not a tribute to a system of education that has some of the best results in the country?

Mr. Byers: No, it is a tribute to a Government who are prepared to put dogma to one side in the interests of children. The 75 schools that we announced as beacon schools on Tuesday demonstrate a range of abilities and talents, whether they are selective, non-selective or comprehensive. Wherever they are, if good work is going on, we want them to share the secrets of their success.

We will put the interests of children first and we believe that the interests of all children are best served in a non-selective education system.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I am interested by the Minister's comment that he is against dogma, but against selective education as a matter of dogma. Among the 75 beacon schools that he identified this week as providing best practice was Torquay grammar school. Will he confirm that he would not want that school to be changed in any significant way because he has identified it as a beacon school? Will he urge local Labour activists to desist from any attempt to change its status, lest parents, governors and teachers at the school think him guilty of hypocrisy?

Mr. Byers: The future of Torquay grammar school is a matter for local parents in Torquay, as is appropriate. I have no doubt that if a school is doing well, it will have parental support and there is nothing for it to fear. Let us be open. The policy of the Labour party and the Government is clear. We are not going to return to the days when at 11, the majority of our children were condemned as failures so that a few could have a superior education. Our goal in government is to ensure that all children have a high-quality education, and we intend to achieve it.

Family-friendly Employment

9. Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): What steps he is taking to promote family-friendly employment practices. [48096]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Alan Howarth): We are working across Government to promote family-friendly employment policies in a range of ways. My Department's contribution includes the national child care strategy and publicising the business case for such policies.

Mr. Coaker: Does the Minister agree that this is a most crucial area of Government policy and that, if we are to bring about change in the country, family-friendly employment practices are extremely important? Does he agree also that there is a long way to go in terms of increasing employers' awareness of all that is available and bringing the standards of practice of the poorest employers up to the standards of the best?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. There is much happening through the national child care strategy and the policies set out in the "Fairness at Work" White Paper, which reflect the importance that my hon. Friend and I and the Government attach to family-friendly policies. I appreciate that it is a complex story, and we shall make every effort to explain the case. We have produced a summary version of our Green Paper on child care, which is available on the internet and in a range of languages in accessible formats. We are supporting parents at work by producing a pack for employers. This afternoon, I shall meet Joanna Foster, head of the National Worklife Forum, which is a campaign sponsored by industry to make the case for family-friendly policies. I shall brief business men next week for an hour at breakfast—when I hope that my hon. Friend's alarm clock will not have gone off.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Minister accept that more families now depend on the income of both parents to ensure reasonable living standards for them and their children? Does he accept also that, although the situation will be improved by the introduction of the minimum wage, more friendly employment practices would be achieved if employers provided more flexible working hours for mothers of young children and creche facilities for the children of working mothers?

Mr. Howarth: I agree very much with the hon. Gentleman. More and more employers are recognising the business case for family-friendly employment practices. Such practices mean that they will be able to recruit from a wider pool of labour and retain workers whom they have trained to skill levels. Productivity will be greater because there will be less stress and absenteeism among the work force. Employers can help in a variety of ways: by supporting the child care costs of staff, sponsoring places in out-of-school clubs and holiday play schemes, linking their employees with child minding networks and operating flexible working hours and term-time working. In all those ways, employers can help their colleagues in work to balance their obligations to the employers with their obligations to their families.

Child Care

10. Mr. Tony Clarke (Northampton, South): What steps he plans to take to ensure the safety of children in child care facilities. [48097]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Alan Howarth): The welfare of children under the age of eight in day care facilities is protected by statute under the Children Act 1989. This Department and the Department of Health jointly published a consultation paper on 27 March which poses a range of questions about the future regulation of early education and day care.

Mr. Clarke: Is the Minister aware that only one in three child care workers are subject to police checks and that this is due largely to inconsistencies among local authorities? Some local authorities check only their staff while others check their staff and those in the voluntary sector. In light of the Government's planned increase in child care provision, will the Minister ensure that there is greater consistency and access to police checks, thus affording more protection to our children?

Mr. Howarth: The safety and welfare of children is paramount among our concerns. We shall focus on it continuously in the expansion of child care that we are determined to bring about. Part X of the Children Act 1989 requires local authorities to register and inspect day care settings and child minders and, in that context, to satisfy themselves that a person is fit to care for young children. Many local authorities use police checks, but that is not at present a statutory requirement. That is a key issue in our consultation.

11. Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South): What arrangements he intends to introduce for the delivery of the national child care strategy at local level. [48098]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): Local child care partnerships—forums in Scotland—will be established and built on in every area of the country. They will enable us to use the £12 million that we have allocated this year to establish the structures for the development of the child care strategy of the future, building on the Green Paper "Meeting the Childcare Challenge".

Miss Begg: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that there is still great variation in both the quality and level of child care, depending on the locality in which one lives. In my own constituency, a play group will not be meeting next year because it failed to find suitable accommodation. What was lacking was co-ordination to make sure that all the different aspects of child care that make up a child care strategy were in place in a locality. May I urge my right hon. Friend to ensure that such co-ordination is present in each locality, to make sure that the different elements required to make up a full strategy are in place?

Mr. Blunkett: The local partnerships will ensure not only that there is co-ordination, but that we do a thorough audit of what already exists; that we put in resources to save projects that are viable and popular but are currently threatened; that we build on those by expanding those partnerships to incorporate new child care facilities, including the voluntary and private sector; and that we prepare for the introduction of the working families tax credit child care disregard, which will make it possible for millions more parents to take advantage of satisfactory, high-quality, properly inspected child care—[Interruption.]—in a way that has never before been possible in the United Kingdom and was never even thought of by the Conservative Members who are currently barracking me.

National Music Service

12. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): What standards he will set the national music service for the teaching of music. [48099]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): We have no plans to create a national music service. However, I can assure my hon. Friend that we do recognise the contribution that music can make to every child's education, and its importance in supporting children's cultural, spiritual and social development. That is why my Department's recent consultation paper, "Fair Funding: Improving Delegation to Schools", proposes new funding arrangements to protect existing local music services.

Mr. Kidney: In Staffordshire, there is an excellent music service, as I am sure the capacity audience who were at Birmingham symphony hall last Sunday will testify, after hearing 1,000 Staffordshire schoolchildren perform before them. My hon. Friend's consultation on possible central funding of the music service is of concern to areas such as Staffordshire that already have an excellent service. Will she assure me that there will be no dumbing down of music teaching in Staffordshire in the event of moving to central funding? The objective of equal access to music, both learning and performing, is excellent, but will she take the time to ensure that any change in funding leads to effects that are harmonious, not discordant?

Ms Morris: I am sure that last Sunday's performance by Staffordshire schoolchildren at the international convention centre, which is a very special hall in Birmingham, was well worth attending. I assure my hon. Friend that the reason for the change is to protect music services, because they have not been protected in the past and year on year, there have been cuts that have damaged what is an essential part of a child's education and development. I can give my hon. Friend the assurance he seeks that the change is not about dumbing down, but about enhancing and extending opportunity, so that never again will music in our curriculum be threatened as it has been in the past.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): In endorsing the words of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) about Staffordshire children's musical ability, may I say that the same is true in my constituency and in West Sussex? I am sure that the Minister knows that anything that she and the Government can do to improve music teaching and the music service in this country will be greatly welcomed. However, does she agree that there is an opportunity to establish regional centres of excellence for music teaching? Perhaps it would be a good idea to select one or two schools in each region that have exceptional musical skills and to channel children to those schools for special teaching.

Ms Morris: The hon. Gentleman has raised that question with me before and I have said that we are sympathetic to the idea. That is why we are putting far more resources into the specialist schools initiative, which now allows schools to make bids to specialise in music. One or two weeks ago, I was able to announce the first of the specialist schools that will concentrate on music; I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that.

I know that the hon. Gentleman will also welcome, as has been welcomed throughout the education and music world, the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport that we shall launch the youth music trust, which will enhance opportunities to learn and practise music, not only in school, but outside school. We are determined that music will play its part in the exciting programme of out-of-school learning that the Government have launched. Children will have the opportunity to spend extra time on and to have access to extra expertise and resources in learning and practising music, as in many other subject areas.

New Deal

14. Mr. Ivan Lewis (Bury, South): If he will make a statement on the voluntary sector's contribution to the new deal. [48101]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): I very much welcome the important contribution that the voluntary sector is making to the new deal. It has been involved from the initial planning and design stages to the delivery of gateway services and the provision of work and training opportunities. Those are now operating throughout the country, with scores of voluntary sector organisations involved, making places for thousands of unemployed young people.

Mr. Lewis: I welcome the central role that voluntary organisations have been given in delivering the new deal programme across the country and in my constituency. Will my right hon. Friend consider the problem that is increasingly experienced by voluntary organisations with existing projects that are working across Employment Service boundaries? They are finding it difficult to gain access to the contractual process because they are not confined to one geographical area, but their innovative projects would give young people the opportunities that they need to gain skills. Will my right hon. Friend clarify how such organisations that work across geographical boundaries can gain access to the new deal so that they can offer opportunities?

Mr. Smith: Yes, the new deal is a flexible and pragmatic programme, and we are developing it in response to need and potential. We are currently reviewing the operation of contracting in the new deal. There is nothing to prevent any voluntary organisation from contracting for more than one unit of delivery in the new deal, but I realise that the co-ordination of that might involve complexities that would particularly tax smaller voluntary organisations. I will ensure that the review considers that issue and that appropriate guidance is given, because we want to make the most of the enormous potential offered by the voluntary sector.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): In view of the success in the pathfinder areas of the voluntary sector option in the new deal for the under-25s, will the Minister explain why there is not a similar option for the over-25s? Will he explain in more detail his plans for voluntary sector involvement in the new deal for the over-25s, particularly in view of the answer that he gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch)?

Mr. Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred in an earlier response to voluntary sector involvement in the new deal for the over-25s. I underline that the new deal for the long-term unemployed not only fulfils our manifesto commitment to make available subsidies of £75 a week to employers taking on unemployed people over 25 who have been out of work for more than two years, but goes well beyond that commitment in opening up thousands of full-time education and training opportunities. What is more, in the pilots that we are developing for November, which will open up opportunities to 90,000 people who have been unemployed for 12 or 18 months, there will be a specific range of options, including the full involvement of the voluntary sector, for which the hon. Gentleman asks.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The Minister will remember that a few weeks ago, I mentioned the good work of Skillshare in my constituency, which provides much of the work that Skillshare does in other parts of the country and is under threat of closure because of the withdrawal of funding by Lancashire county council. The Minister has written to me about that, although he offered no hope whatever, but will he today congratulate Skillshare on obtaining funding from a trust set up by Ultraframe, a private firm in my constituency? Its owners, John and Rosemary Lancaster, have today guaranteed funding for the next 12 months. Will he also take a fresh look at ways in which he can assist organisations such as Skillshare to ensure that they will have some hope of life after the 12 months is up?

Mr. Smith: I commended Skillshare, along with other voluntary sector providers to the new deal, in my answer to the hon. Gentleman last month. As he says, I have written to him, and I have encouraged those in the field to make contact with Skillshare to find out what help can be made available. This is not, perhaps, the week unreservedly to endorse any commercial sponsorship arrangements without knowing the details, but if Skillshare is able to continue to provide good-quality support to programmes that help the hon. Gentleman's constituents, no one will welcome that more than me.

GCSE Students

15. Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): If he will estimate how many students achieving average and above average results at GCSE level do not continue into further education. [48102]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): The youth cohort study of 1996 showed that 44 per cent. of all GCSE candidates in England achieved at least five passes at grades A* to C. Of those, some 2 per cent. did not go on to any form of further education or training.

Mr. Sheerman: I am grateful for that information, but it does not exactly square with what I have from the House of Commons Library, which suggests that only 90 per cent. of high-ability students go on to further education and that about 40 per cent. of average students are lost to further education. Even if we split the difference, the situation is serious. Could not my hon. Friend encourage sixth-form colleges and the rest of the further education sector to take a leaf out of the book of the private sector, and to start looking at their supply chain to see what happens to good-quality students who fail to go on to A-levels and university? Saving those kids before it is too late must be the best investment that could be made in the education sector.

Dr. Howells: We are revamping the careers service to concentrate on precisely those young people who appear to be dropping out when they should be going on to further study. It was a great pleasure for me this morning to launch a new initiative called the Eagle campaign, linking St. John's college, Cambridge, with Lambeth local education authority. It will try to construct compacts with schools in the area to encourage children to reach for the sky in their educational attainment. That is important. Far too many of our universities tend to look beyond the towns and wards that surround them and search nationally for students, when they should be looking on their own doorstep and finding out how to encourage young children to raise their aspirations and sense of self-esteem so that they go to university and good further education colleges.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): If further education colleges are to encourage more students to come through their doors in the innovative way suggested by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), they need to retain their independence and flexibility in order to innovate and provide the courses that best meet the interests of the local community and local employers. Is the Minister aware of the concern in the further education sector that the Government might reduce independence and impose the dead hand of centralisation on the sector? Will the Minister take this opportunity to give some comfort to the sector by assuring it that at least the Government will not reduce the proportion of business governors on the corporation bodies of further education colleges?

Dr. Howells: We are not interested in placing dead hands on anything; we are interested in tearing off the dead hands that the previous Government imposed on so much of the education system. We will open up the accountability of further education college boards so that they reflect the communities that they serve. That means that they will be able to tap the full potential of the community, not just friends of business men who happen to have been placed there by the previous Government.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): Does my hon. Friend agree that the previous Government's legacy of the worst participation rate of 16 to 18-year-olds in education of any of our major competitors is disgraceful? Will he give serious consideration to the proposal in the report by the Select Committee on Education and Employment to abolish child benefit and transfer those resources to a means-tested allowance for students as an incentive for young people to remain in education?

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends in the Department are looking very closely at post-16 provision in this country. In doing so, we shall talk to every other Department in Whitehall about how it might be possible to move towards the optimum in terms of persuading young people to partake in education and training after 16. We shall be looking at every possible means of attaining that; no holds are barred.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): At least the Minister spared us the suggestion that his aspiration is to ensure that all children are above the average, but leaving that aside, will he acknowledge that the most important thing is to cause them to aspire to achievement, and to provide the means of giving them the information to achieve their full potential? In that connection, will he remember the importance of the further education colleges and—despite his somewhat grudging remarks—the remarkable fact that, when a previous Administration gave them their independence and released their energies, the level of participation and of involvement rose with unprecedented speed?

Dr. Howells: I would be the last person to begrudge the achievements of further education colleges. I believe that they have done a superb job, especially given the appalling situation in which they found themselves under the previous Government. That is why two thirds of them found themselves in very difficult financial circumstances, and why they must cut their way out of the jungle of absurd bureaucracy that characterises the brokering of education in further education colleges in this country.

Business of the House

Sir George Young: The House is grateful to the right hon. Lady for next week's business and for an indication of the business for the following week.

This morning we had further leaks from the Government, this time on the roads programme. Does that not underline the need for a statement on the much-delayed White Paper? Can the right hon. Lady help the House by saying when that might be?

When might we debate the reductions in the defence budget that were announced in yesterday's strategic defence review? Have we lost the two remaining one-day debates on the Army and the Navy?

Last week, my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) asked for an assurance that the Government's proposals on the North sea oil tax would be given in an oral statement. The Leader of the House could not give an assurance at that time, as she had not considered the matter, but there is much uncertainty on that, and it is of great interest in Scotland. Can she give an undertaking that that decision will be announced in an oral statement?

In the light of the difficulties that have confronted the Government over recent days, on which the Leader of the Opposition focused with such effect yesterday, may we have a debate on the new rules of conduct that are being circulated by the Cabinet Secretary, so that the House can judge how effective they might be in disengaging Ministers and their special advisers from the rest of the circle that the Prime Minister built up around him in opposition?

Finally, can the right hon. Lady shed any further light on the likely date of the summer recess? Last week she said that it was clear that the House could not rise before the end of July. I appreciate the turbulence in the programme, but if she could share her latest thinking with the House, we would all be grateful.

Mrs. Taylor: I shall try to be as helpful as possible. On the suggestion of a leak on the roads programme, I did indeed hear some of the speculation this morning, all of which concluded with comments to the effect that the Deputy Prime Minister had all the schemes on his desk and had yet to make decisions, so I do not think that the decisions have been taken, let alone leaked.

I hope that we can have a statement on the White Paper on transport before the House rises. There is great pressure on time, but I am looking to find time for such a statement.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about a debate on the strategic defence review and the days on the Army and the Navy. I believe that it will be possible to have those debates in the spillover period. If so, it will of course be possible for the views of the Select Committee on Defence to be taken into account—I understand that the Select Committee intends to comment on the defence review.

I cannot guarantee the right hon. Gentleman the statement that he requested on North sea oil. There are many decisions still to be made and many demands for a statement. Some judgment must be exercised.

The right hon. Gentleman says that the new rules of conduct are to be circulated by the Cabinet secretariat. Perhaps I may remind him what the Prime Minister said yesterday:

"I have instructed the Cabinet Secretary, therefore, to revise the rules that we inherited that govern such contracts and to strengthen them in any way that he thinks fit."—[Official Report, 8 July 1998; Vol. 315, c. 1065.]

We are working to the rules of the previous Government, and if there is a need for strengthening, that will happen.

The announcement of any recess is always subject to the progress of business: that is especially so this year. With that proviso, I hope that it will be possible for the House to rise on Friday 31 July, but I cannot yet guarantee that, as we still have some extremely important business, including the Northern Ireland Bill, which I mentioned in my statement. We must make progress on that and on other outstanding matters that have yet to be debated in the House.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Will my right hon. Friend have further discussions with the Opposition about the timetabling of their business and the issues selected for debate? I ask that in the light of events last Friday, when Opposition Members—one of whom, the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), I see in the Chamber—talked out the Fireworks Bill. They implied that in doing so, they had the support of the firework industry. However, they had no such support and have been told so by representatives of the firework industry, who said that the actions of the Opposition could contribute directly to an increase in firework-related accidents.

As Opposition Front-Benchers stated that they wished to give the Bill a fair wind, will my right hon. Friend propose to the Opposition that they make some of their time available, so that we can ensure that firework-related injuries go down rather than up as a result of irresponsible actions of Opposition Members?

Mrs. Taylor: Many people both outside and inside the House would be appalled at the behaviour of those who sought to prevent that Bill from making further progress last week. Firework-related accidents are an important issue. I hope that those who stopped the Bill will have a clear conscience because they will bear a great deal of responsibility for any further problems that might arise. The Opposition said that they would give the Bill a fair wind. They acted irresponsibly, and I can well understand why my hon. Friend and others say that the whole procedure for private Members' Bills must be considered by the Modernisation Committee.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Given that the timetable is under pressure and that the Leader of the House is anxious, through her Committee, to reduce the number of late sittings, will the right hon. Lady acknowledge that the Government could make a contribution by accepting on Monday the amendment passed by a substantial majority in the other place? Will she acknowledge the comment of Lord Russell that, if the Government do not accept that modest and reasonable amendment, it will raise the question of whether they want a revising Chamber?

When will the Prime Minister either correct or confirm his statement that medical students will be exempt from student fees? Obviously, those students would like to hear him confirm that that is Government policy.

May I endorse the plea by the shadow Leader of the House for an early statement on North sea oil and gas taxation? The Leader of the House may be surprised to hear that The Press and Journal (Aberdeen) led on that story this morning. Tens of thousands of jobs are at risk as a direct result of the Government's failure to give a clear statement on something that they promised in April.

Mrs. Taylor: I have nothing to add on the last point.

We shall not accept the Lords amendment in Monday's debate. Indeed, I have found that accepting amendments rarely leads to shorter debates, but we shall not support the amendment because we do not think that it is right. The hon. Gentleman quotes Lord Russell; I remind him that Lord Dearing spoke and voted for Labour's position on the matter.

Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): Reference has already been made to the demise of the Fireworks Bill. We spent five hours debating a range of narrow amendments, and at the conclusion of the debate we were discussing a tidying amendment. The Bill has been thoroughly scrutinised in both Houses and has been through both Houses' full procedures. May I seek discussions with the Leader of the House about what opportunities might be available to bring back the most essential parts of that measure? I know that the CBI's explosive industry group has written to my right hon. Friend to say that it considers the consequences for firework safety in the millennium celebrations to be extremely grave.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend makes an extremely serious point. Many of us were pleased when she decided to introduce that private Member's Bill on such a serious safety issue. As she points out, the CBI and many others are extremely concerned that we should make progress. I can make no promises about future progress, but I am certainly willing to meet her and to discuss the matter.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): In view of the unfortunate connotations of the way in which the Labour party's ridiculous campaign on cool Britannia has gone, will the Leader of the House try to make time for the House to debate the British Council, which does invaluable and remarkable work for this country overseas? To my shame, its budget was cut under my Government and it needs more resources to enable it to carry forward its remarkable work of promoting British culture throughout the world.

Mrs. Taylor: I am not sure about the hon. Gentleman's reference to cool Britannia, but I endorse what he says about the good work of the British Council. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have been happy to help the British Council from time to time and we appreciate the good work that it does. There will be an Adjournment debate on the issue next Wednesday morning, so perhaps the hon. Gentleman could catch Madam Speaker's eye then.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on early-day motions 6 and 318?

[That this House should impose new restrictions on the activities of potentially-corrupting commercial lobbyists in influencing parliamentary decisions, in order to improve access to Government and honourable Members by those groups and individuals who cannot afford to employ lobbying organisations.]

Both were tabled more than a year ago; the first calls for a new, rigorous system for controlling lobbying in the House, and the second draws attention to the dangers of insider information being supplied to lobbying firms by new employees who were previously employed by political parties.

Although a great deal of humbug has been spoken over the past few days, it is worth recalling that, only two years ago, many Conservative Members were described as having their snouts so deeply in the trough that all that could be seen of them was the soles of their feet. We have a serious problem: we have failed to control lobbyists whose main work is to ensure that their rich and powerful clients become richer and more powerful, to the detriment of other clients and other people who cannot afford their services.

Mrs. Taylor: I agree with my hon. Friend that a great deal of humbug has been spoken on this topic in the past few days. He will recall that Lord Nolan considered controlling the activities of lobbyists and decided that there were important restrictions in terms of taking further action. Many of us would be concerned if it was suggested that the House of Commons should license lobbyists and give a seal of approval to certain ones, which is one of the proposals that has been made. I accept that there is concern about certain activities; the House should make it clear that the allegations have been about the way in which lobbyists conduct themselves, not about the way in which Members of Parliament or Ministers conduct themselves.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): The right hon. Lady confirmed that there will be a debate on the strategic defence review when the House resumes after the recess. Will she confirm that it will be a two-day debate? To assist the House, I can confirm that the Select Committee on Defence will have a report ready on the strategic defence review. The dates of the recess are immaterial to us, because we shall be working throughout the recess to get the report ready so that hon. Members can take it with them when they visit the beaches. Our job has been made somewhat easier by being able to start on our study four weeks earlier than expected because of the leaks that have taken place.

Mrs. Taylor: I hope that the Select Committee on Defence did not waste too much time on the various and conflicting so-called leaks that were circulating in advance of publication. I confirm that I should like to provide time for a two-day debate—obviously that will be subject to further discussions through the usual channels—and I am pleased that the Select Committee will be able to do its work. I am happy to confirm that many Select Committees do extremely good work during the recess, which knocks on the head the idea that the recess is simply a holiday for hon. Members. A lot of work is done, not only by the Select Committee on Defence, but by many others.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there should be new legislation regarding the activities of lobbyists, especially in the light of the fact that in the past few days there has been an opportunity for us to clean up the Augean stables? Fortunately, that opportunity has come at the beginning of the Parliament, not at the end. Does she agree that the day that lobbyists become more important than Ministers and Members of Parliament will be the day that democracy dies?

Mrs. Taylor: I remind my hon. Friend of what I said about the Nolan committee. His basic point about lobbyists being more important than Members of Parliament is very alarming.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): During yesterday's defence statement, I strenuously, but unsuccessfully, attempted to catch your eye, Madam Speaker. I fully realise, being of limited physical stature, why I was not called.

Will the right hon. Lady confirm that there will be no further statements by any Defence Minister before the debates in the overspill? I ask that because I clearly heard the Secretary of State for Defence say yesterday that the Minister for the Armed Forces would be making further statements about the Territorial Army very soon. Will she please clear the matter up? It is extremely important to both Welsh regiments, and I hope that she will be able to give some assurance about this delay.

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman asks that there be no further statements. I hope that he is not suggesting that no further details should be given, and that no questions should be answered by the Department. We now have the strategic defence review, and hon. Members will be able to read it. The normal decision-making process will continue, and if other information should be made available, that will be done in the usual way.

Mr. Jim Fitzpatrick (Poplar and Canning Town): May I bring to my right hon. Friend's attention the fact the Commission for Racial Equality has decided that the leaflet distributed by Poplar and Canning Town Conservative association in Newham in May this year is in breach of the guidelines to which all political parties signed up, in that it contained offensive material? My local newspaper, the Newham Recorder, also regard the leaflet as racist. Despite having written to the Leader of the Opposition three times, I have yet to receive a response with the Conservative party's official view of this literature.

May I also draw to my right hon. Friend's attention the fact that there is a by-election in Custom House and Silvertown ward in Newham? In conflict with the spirit of the Registration of Political Parties Bill, which is going through Parliament at the moment, a candidate is standing in that by-election under the name of Real Labour. Coincidentally, four of the persons nominating the Real Labour candidate had nominated Conservative candidates at the borough elections in May. Should time be set aside to debate the dirty tricks that Poplar and Canning Town Conservative association seems to be playing?

Mrs. Taylor: All of us should be concerned if offensive material such as my hon. Friend describes is being circulated. I hope that the Opposition Front Benchers will ensure that the Leader of the Opposition replies to my hon. Friend soon.

As my hon. Friend said, the Registration of Political Parties Bill is before the House. I am not sure whether there will be scope for him to raise this matter on Tuesday. Descriptions of candidates, nominations and the use of terminology are being investigated by the Home Office, and ideas have been sought to ensure, for example, that candidates cannot abuse the names of other political parties. I shall certainly draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the Home Secretary's attention.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): In her statement, the right hon. Lady said that she hoped that the Government would be able to announce the results of the review of the roads programme before the House rises, which is welcome news. It is essential that she is clearer about the Government's intentions and that she guarantees that a statement will be made before the House rises. If decisions about bypasses and major road schemes were to be made when the House was not sitting, and if those decisions were adversely to affect areas such as Cheadle—where we desperately await completion of the Manchester airport eastern link road—the people of Cheadle and elsewhere would be furious with the Government.

Mrs. Taylor: I said that I envisaged a statement on the White Paper and that the roads review announcements would follow that. I shall ensure that hon. Members receive proper information, and I expect that to be available before the start of the recess.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): The Government have made it clear that they intend to replace the existing standard spending support for local authorities with a much fairer system. Will my right hon. Friend assure us that the House will have an opportunity to discuss that issue before decisions are taken, so that we do not whinge afterwards? She will be aware that Labour Members represent the majority of rural constituencies. The history of spending has dominated Government support in the past, and we are frightened that the history of spending in the past 18 years could determine that of the next three. Will she assure me that the House will be given a proper opportunity to influence what happens, and that we will debate the issue before decisions are taken?

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend will understand that there is no scope for a debate on this matter in the near future. However, there are many other ways in which hon. Members can influence the decisions of Ministers. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has published a range of consultation papers, and has invited comments from anyone who wants to contribute to that decision-making process.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Will the Leader of the House please provide an opportunity, next Thursday and every subsequent Thursday, for the Prime Minister to come to the House to correct the obfuscation and errors of fact that he perpetrates each Wednesday?

Mrs. Taylor: There is absolutely no need for such a statement.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): If the situation at Drumcree were to worsen, would the Leader of the House consider arranging a statement that would—I hope—give members of all parties in the House an opportunity to make it clear that the rule of law must prevail? Should it not be made clear that the recommendations of the Parades Commission—which was set up with the authority of Parliament—should not be ignored, that both communities are expected to accept such recommendations and that there must be no repeat of what happened 24 years ago, when the undermining of the rule of law led to action by mobs in the street? In those circumstances, I hope that the Opposition will make it clear that they fully support the Government's attempts to ensure that the rule of law prevails in Northern Ireland. I see the hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay), the Opposition spokesman on Northern Ireland, nodding in agreement.

Mrs. Taylor: I hope that circumstances will not arise in which such a statement is needed.

I believe that all hon. Members are very concerned about the position in Northern Ireland. We all hope that the progress made so far in the peace process can be maintained, and I think it is incumbent on all of us to do everything that we can to maintain it.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): Is the Leader of the House aware that Ministers promised an oil taxation consultation paper in mid-April?

Will the right hon. Lady find time for a debate or statement on a wider issue affecting the North sea—the Government's position at the conference on the Oslo-Paris convention, involving the removal of oil platforms and discharges of nuclear waste? Surely it makes sense for the House to debate the Government's position before the OSPAR conference, rather than being faced with the rubber-stamping of a decision made at the conference after it is over.

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman must understand why it is not possible for me to find time for such a debate. It may be appropriate for him to apply for an Adjournment debate; but we shall have the usual three-hour Adjournment debate before the summer recess, at which issues of that kind—along with any others that concern hon. Members—could be raised.

Royal Assent

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Registered Establishments (Scotland) Act 1998.

Pesticides Act 1998

Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) (Amendment) Act 1998

I have been extremely remiss. I was going to allow the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) to catch my eye at the end of business questions. Will the Leader of the House allow me to call him now?

Mrs. Taylor indicated assent.

Madam Speaker: It is my fault; I am so sorry.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I am extremely grateful to you, Madam Speaker, and to the Leader of the House.

The Leader of the House will have gathered from the comments of her hon. Friends the Members for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that concern about recent events is not limited to Opposition Members. When my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) asked about the new rules of conduct, the right hon. Lady said that new rules were being drawn up; but my right hon. Friend asked for a debate on those rules. May we have a response to that question? If the right hon. Lady cannot promise a debate before the House rises for the recess at the end of this month, may we at least have an undertaking that the rules will be published, and will be widely available?

Mrs. Taylor: I cannot see any prospect of a debate on any improvements that we might make to the rules, which we inherited from the previous Government, in the near future. As for publication, it is currently intended that the same procedures should apply.

National Health Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jane Kennedy.]

3.58 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): As you know, Madam Speaker, it is exceptional for the House to devote a whole day's debate to a celebration, but that is what we are doing today, and it is right that we should join the rest of the country in marking the 50th anniversary of the national health service, which has served our country so well for so long, and in thanking all the people working in the NHS and their predecessors for doing such a wonderful job. There have been church services, a royal garden party, major conferences and hospital open days—even a special rose has been produced—for the 50th anniversary.

On a personal note, it has been a great privilege to take part in the celebrations, to have the honour of being Secretary of State for Health at such a time and to have the opportunity to share in the rejoicing over the success of the most popular institution in Britain. It is all the more a privilege to be a Labour Secretary of State for Health at this time, because the national health service was founded by a Labour Government, is based on Labour principles and is our party's greatest contribution to improving the lives of the people of this country. Since it has existed, no one concerned about their health has had to worry about not being able to pay the doctor.

Fifty years ago, our country was emerging from the aftermath of the second world war. That war—the most destructive in the history of humankind—had dealt a series of body blows to our country and our people. It had laid waste to homes, schools and hospitals, destroyed factories, and blitzed harbours, railways, roads and bridges. Yet despite all those huge problems, a new spirit was abroad. To win the war, the people of this country had worked together and had shared its perils. They were determined to share a better and fairer future. A new bargain was struck—everyone accepted a duty not merely to try to provide for themselves, but to help provide for others. Whoever was doing well would pay in to provide for others who fell ill, lost their job, had an accident or grew old. They could do that in the sure and certain knowledge that if they in turn fell ill, lost their job, had an accident or grew old, others would pay in to look after them.

Thus Labour's welfare state, including the national health service, was born. The NHS was founded on the principle that the best health services should be available to all—the best for all, quality and equality. That appealed to the fair-minded people of our country. It still does. No one dares challenge those principles. No one says that the best health services should not be available to all. Of course, it did not appeal to the Tories, who fought tooth and nail against the establishment of the NHS. They did not merely put up a token resistance; they voted against its general principles and its detailed proposals. The Tories voted 51 times against Labour's proposals to establish the NHS—one vote for every year that we are talking about and, no doubt, one for the pot. They did not merely vote against it, but denounced it—they railed against it. According to them, the NHS

"will destroy so much in this country that we value."—[Official Report, 1 May 1946; Vol. 422, c. 232.]

It

"would be a fatal step."

It would sap

"the very foundations on which our national character has been built."

One Tory woman Member predicted:

"bitterness will result"

and even went on to say that it

"may lead to civil war".—[Official Report, 30 April 1946; Vol. 422, c. 81-91.]

Another said that it would be

"the death knell of the family doctor" and another generous spirit said that it was

"a very carefully prepared measure of highway robbery."—[Official Report, 1 May 1946; Vol. 422, c. 205–61.]

All those predictions were made by the Tories under the moderating influence of debates in the House of Commons—what they said outside, God only knows. Since then, some Tories have claimed that they did not oppose the NHS. All that I can say is that they had a funny way of expressing their support.

Despite the efforts of the Tories, in Parliament, in the press, and in the more backward parts of the medical profession, my most distinguished predecessor Nye Bevan pressed on with turning his great vision into reality and, despite everything that they could do to obstruct it, the NHS came into being on 5 July 1948. Because of Tory propaganda, it was not particularly popular up to that point, but no sooner was it up and running than it soared in popularity. It has been that way ever since. The NHS is remarkable; it is one of the few examples in history of something that proved more popular in practice than when it was just a nice theory.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In view of my right hon. Friend's reminder of Tory opposition to the creation of the NHS, would not it be an appropriate moment for the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), who speaks on behalf of the official Opposition, to apologise to the British people?

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) indicated dissent.

Mr. Winnick: The way in which the right hon. Lady dismisses the suggestion demonstrates only too well that, had she been around at the time, she would have been the staunchest opponent on the Tory Benches to a concept such as the NHS.

Miss Widdecombe: How does the hon. Gentleman know?

Mr. Winnick: It is obvious from the right hon. Lady's attitude.

Mr. Dobson: To the best of my knowledge, not a single member of the then parliamentary Tory party rebelled against the Whip, which resulted in 51 votes against the establishment of the NHS. I do not like to demand anything of the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe); what she does is up to her.

In 1947 and 1948, some said—and some still say today—that we could not afford the best for all and that the principles of the NHS were not practicable and could not be delivered. The past 50 years have proved them wrong; the NHS has served this country well. Most of the time, most people in most parts of our country have received top-quality treatment and care. The NHS has proved to be the cheapest and most cost-effective health care system in the developed world. That is not despite the principles on which it is based but because of them. Fairness and cost-effectiveness have gone together; they are two sides of the same coin.

The NHS is paid for out of taxation, so it is free to people when they use it. That is not just a fine principle; it is efficient. It avoids the need for costly paperwork that is inevitable in systems in which patients must pay. That is one the main reasons why our system is so cost-effective. Our tax-based NHS puts a bigger proportion of resources into patient care, and a lower proportion into paperwork. That is true even after the worst excesses of the Tories' attempted introduction of an NHS internal market.

The NHS works well in practice. It is not just a success story; it is a brilliant bargain. Let us compare our spending on health with that in the United States. The United States spends twice our proportion of national wealth on health, yet women in Britain live as long as women in the United States, and British men live longer than American men. The state of our health compares favourably with other major European countries, although we spend less on health care. I cannot claim that the NHS alone is responsible for our favourable international health rating, but it is certainly responsible for favourable comparisons on cost. That is a vital economic asset.

At any given level of performance, our system consumes less of the national wealth than others. Its benefits do not stop there. Funded from taxation, it imposes little direct cost on employers. Countries with other systems finance their health care in a way that places high non-wage costs directly on employers; ours does not. That keeps down the cost of employment here and helps our businesses compete in world markets. Our low non-wage employment costs are generally recognised as one of the major attractions for foreign company investment.

One can see why, deep down, the Tories do not like the NHS. The national health service is based on a socialist ethic, it is superior in principle, it works in practice, and it is the most popular institution in the country. It is no wonder the Tories do not like it. It is no wonder they tried to introduce competition and left it in such a state. They left us a system that had set doctor against doctor and hospital against hospital—a two-tier system of health care, underfunded, overworked, overstretched—which managed to keep going only because of the dedication of its staff, who had been battered from pillar to post, whose professional views had been ignored and whose commitment had been taken for granted. It is not enough today to celebrate the past. We must plan for a better future. We have to modernise the service, and that will take time: a long time. When it takes at least three years to train a nurse and six to train a doctor, shortages cannot be ended overnight.

The new Government have already provided more resources. We have put into the NHS £2 billion more than the Tories planned, and £1 billion more than the Liberal Democrats promised. That is still not enough, which is why we shall shortly announce more money for the NHS for the next three years.

It is not a question only of money. Like everyone working in the NHS, and like patients and carers, we recognise the need to improve and modernise. New hospitals, new plant and equipment, new technologies and new drugs must be provided. New ways of working will be required. New arrangements must be made to enable doctors, nurses and midwives to keep up with ever more rapidly changing technology. Unlike the previous Government, we are consulting the people involved about how best to make the changes that are needed. We have to carry the full support of the professions if patients are to benefit in full from all the new opportunities that modern technology has to offer.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): The Secretary of State links the view of the professions and the cost of the health service. Does he accept that all the consultation has shown that there is general agreement among the professions that, merely to stand still, the NHS needs 3 per cent. real growth per year, and that just short of £9 billion has to be announced next week in order to achieve that over this Parliament?

Mr. Dobson: I will save next week's announcement for next week.

Miss Widdecombe: The Secretary of State was not asked to prejudge next week's announcement. He was asked whether he agreed that, in order to stand still, the sum required would be just short of £9 billion. He was not asked whether or over what period it would be made available. Is £9 billion required merely to stand still?

Mr. Dobson: The Tory sum has increased. The last time Conservative Members asked the question, it was £8 billion, and now it has gone up to £9 billion; if I say that we will find more than £9 billion over the weekend, it will go up to £10 billion, and the Liberal Democrats will come in at £11 billion. People have waited for six months or more for the result of the comprehensive spending review, and when they hear it I hope that they will be satisfied.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Do not leak anything, Frank.

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend and I are alike: we never leak anything.

The NHS has been underfunded and beleaguered, and change has come to be seen as a threat. Some economists talk about the threat of people living longer, the threat of new technology or the threat of new drugs—strange people, economists. Think about it: how many of us feel threatened by the thought of living longer? It seems a good idea to most people.

Is new technology a threat? As a teenager in the 1950s, I saw my father waste away and die from kidney failure. Today, the new technology of transplants or dialysis could probably have saved his life. Given the resources and the help to cope with it, new technology is not a threat; it is an opportunity and a promise.

New drugs are another new opportunity. With new drugs, we can cure diseases that not long ago were incurable. A short course of tablets can replace painful, dangerous, invasive surgery. New drugs are another opportunity, provided that the people working in the NHS have the resources and the help and guidance on how best to make use of them.

What have we done since we got in? For a start, we have put together the biggest hospital building programme in the history of the NHS. New hospitals are planned for High Wycombe, Calderdale, Hereford, Wellhouse in Barnet, Worcester, Bishop Auckland, South Manchester, South Tees, Swindon, Bromley, Newcastle, Reading, West Middlesex, Dudley, Walsgrave in Coventry, Central Manchester, Gloucester, University College hospital in London, in my constituency, King's College in London, St George's in London, the Royal London in Whitechapel, Sheffield and Hull.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dobson: Abide a minute. Work has already started on new hospitals at Dartford and Gravesham, Carlisle, Norfolk and Norwich, High Wycombe, Durham, and Greenwich. What a contrast to the Tory record—£33 million paid out to the lawyers and accountants and nothing got started at all.

Mr. Duncan: Will the Secretary of State give a firm undertaking to the House today that all those hospital building programmes that he has just listed will definitely go ahead?

Mr. Dobson: We certainly intend that they should go ahead—[Hon. Members: "Ah."] It may well be that one or two fall by the wayside, but I have to say that we found them lying on the wayside, left there by the useless lot that we followed. They never got one of them started. The roof has been put on Dartford and Gravesham and I am shortly to do the topping-out ceremony at Carlisle. The only thing that was topped out when the Tories were in was the topping-out of the wallets of the lawyers and accountants whom they got in.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): Does the Secretary of State intend to rely on private finance initiatives for that impressive list of hospital building? Is there no concern that he might have to up his £9 billion estimate in future years to pay for the enormous revenue tail that the PFI contracts will create for the NHS?

Mr. Dobson: I do not know where people dig these figures up from. Certainly, a substantial number of the ones that I have read out are PFI schemes. I am confident that, whatever else, the hospitals will get built, they will be built on time, they will be built to price, they will come into operation and they will provide a service for people. That is what people want.

Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale): My right hon. Friend does himself a disservice and hides his talent under a bushel. He forgot one very important development. I had the honour to cut the first sod of my hospital in Rochdale, to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the NHS. Would my right hon. Friend like to take this opportunity to rectify his mistake and add Rochdale to his list?

Mr. Dobson: I am delighted to stand corrected and discover that I am not guilty of exaggeration or hyperbole—litotes, I think, is the proper description. I apologise to my hon. Friend and to the people of Rochdale for leaving out their hospital. So we have seven hospitals started, which is a rather better record than that of the mob opposite.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): While the Secretary of State rolls out the achievements of the Government in the past 12 months, will he comment on why waiting lists in Wales have risen from more than 67,000 when the Labour Government took over to 73,000?

Mr. Dobson: They certainly rose in England, but they have stopped rising. I trust that they have stopped rising in Wales, but I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that assurance.

We said that we would help the hard-pressed staff in the NHS and social services cope with the pressures of last winter. And so we did. Over 1,500 special schemes were put in place, funded by the extra £300 million that we found. The result was a brilliant success. The people in social services and the health service worked together and put on the best winter performance in recent times. They dealt with more emergencies than ever before without the chaos and indignities of people waiting for treatment for days on trolleys and mattresses on the floor in what used to be called Bottomley wards.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): Much of the winter pressures money was given direct to social services to help to unblock jams. It would have been better to give money directly to social services in the spending round rather than make cuts of 1.1 per cent. in 1997–98 and 1.1 per cent. in 1998–99. Those cuts, measured in real terms, and before demography, meant destruction of social services in Oxfordshire and more bed blocking than will ever be undone by extra money for winter pressures.

Mr. Dobson: I am fascinated by the concept of a world before demography, but I must get on. No is the answer. No, no, no. Funding the social services part of the winter pressures effort through the NHS meant that I could guarantee that the money was spent on what it was intended for. If it had been handed out to local authorities, I could not have guaranteed that. I find my relations with the Chancellor of the Exchequer easier if I can guarantee that when he gives me extra money for X, Y or Z, it is actually spent on people in hospitals.

We said that we would get waiting lists down. With the help of the extra £500 million that we found this year, the NHS is doing just that. The lists stopped rising in May, and started to come down in June. I understand that the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald will press me "hot and strong"—her words, not mine—about a suggestion that waiting lists are being fiddled in Worcester. I have checked, and the people concerned tell me that they are doing nothing different from what they have done with waiting lists for the past 10 years. I assume that the presence of the right hon. Members for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) and for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) implies that the right hon. Lady has followed the convention of warning her colleagues to be in the Chamber when she makes her personal attack on their integrity.

What the right hon. Lady does not know is that waiting list figures for Worcestershire have not been reduced by the recent validation process. In fact, the reverse is true. The figures for March include, for the first time, more than 2,000 people who had simply been left off the lists previously. Some of those people should have been put on the list before the general election. I am still trying to find out why they were not.

Waiting lists are coming down, and will continue to come down, as will waiting times. Our waiting lists initiative is not confined to one year, but is part of our long-term programme to modernise the NHS. We are determined to improve health and health care in the most deprived parts of the country, and that is why we have set up health action zones in the South Yorkshire coalfields; Bradford; the east end of London; Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham; Luton; Manchester, Salford and Trafford; North Cumbria; Northumberland; Plymouth; Sandwell; and Tyne and Wear.

To test out the effectiveness of using modern technology, we have set up three pilot schemes for NHS direct—a 24-hour nurse-led helpline—in Milton Keynes; Preston, Chorley and South Ribble; and Newcastle, North Tyneside and Northumberland. The pilots have been such a success that the scheme is being extended to cover more than 10 million people, and that will include Greater Manchester, Birmingham and Cornwall. It will cover the whole country by the end of 2000.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): May I welcome the choice of Birmingham for one of the new NHS direct schemes? Does my right hon. Friend agree that making good-quality advice available 24 hours a day, seven days a week, is a lot better than having market madness and a two-tier health service available 24 hours a day, seven days a week? Does he further agree that NHS direct will help to boost primary care, and will he look with favour on plans soon to come forward from Birmingham for primary care improvements that will ensure that the people of the city receive the health care that they need and deserve?

Mr. Dobson: I am sure that NHS direct greatly benefits the people concerned. It has another merit, in that it will provide job opportunities for trained nurses who because of injury, often back injury, find that they can no longer use their nursing skills to deal with patients. It has many merits. It is clear that many people are willing to ring the 24-hour helpline knowing that it is there for 24 hours. Some of them, because they are considerate of others, are reluctant to go to accident and emergency or ring for a doctor or ambulance. In some cases, people who clearly would not have rung for an ambulance have rung NHS direct and ambulances have been sent round straight away because the cases were urgent. In many cases, nurses have given immediate reassurance to concerned parents, the children of elderly parents and people worried about their neighbours. It has been a great success and I commend the people who have been carrying it out.

[Mr. Dobson]

We also promised at the general election that we would conduct an independent review of health services in London. We established the Turnberg review. The report was published and we accepted all its recommendations. With the exception of one or two—far from all—Conservative Members in London, there have been no substantial criticisms of the report or our implementation of it.

As part of our programme to get rid of the divisive arrangements that we inherited from the previous Government on primary care, we have made much progress towards the establishment of primary care groups involving GPs, community nurses and social services. Contrary to Tory propaganda, we reached amicable agreement with the GPs and everyone else concerned.

Mr. Simon Hughes: You gave in.

Mr. Dobson: It is giving in now, is it? The representative of the Liberal Democrats does not believe that the reasonable points that the British Medical Association made on behalf of its members should have been conceded. We should not have given in. We should have stuck it out, behaved like the Tories and ignored the representatives of the profession. That is not the way we operate.

Mr. Hughes: The Secretary of State knows what happened. His Minister of State was faced with the prospect of the GPs making a large protest last week. He negotiated with them the week before and has now delivered primary care groups with seven GPs and a GP in the chair. The groups are meant to represent all the professions and the community. Effectively, they will be run by GPs.

Mr. Dobson: For the first time in the history of our health care, nurses will have a say in what happens in primary care.

Mr. Hughes: The Tories introduced that.

Mr. Dobson: No, they did not. They did not introduce primary care groups in every part of the country. The hon. Gentleman should not reinvent history. He will be claiming that the Liberals invented the national health service next.

Mr. Hughes: We did. [Laughter.]

Mr. Dobson: I have been practising with that fly for some time.

We have other main tasks. We have to provide the staff of the NHS with the education, training and retraining necessary for them to cope with the ever increasing demands of their jobs. We must put in place new arrangements to set and deliver high-quality performance standards across the NHS. We must give more priority to public health and to reducing the inequalities in health that leave poor people ill more often and dying sooner. Once the outcome of the comprehensive spending review is published, I shall be able to spell out our new arrangements for continuing professional development for all NHS staff.

Let me give a simple example of what is needed. We all still expect nurses to provide tender loving care. These days, we also expect them to cope with using highly complex, high-tech equipment. They cannot be expected to do that without the necessary training and time for training, including training specific to new equipment. When we took office, we discovered that there is no machinery in the NHS to set performance standards or ensure that they are delivered. Without those arrangements, things go wrong. Nothing is done; people die. That is what happened with the children in Bristol, with breast cancer screening in Devon and Exeter, and with cervical cancer screening in Kent and Canterbury. We are determined to change the NHS, so that such systematic failures never arise again.

Today, the Government are putting quality at the heart of the NHS. We are doing something that no Government have done for 50 years: implementing new mechanisms to set standards, deliver standards and monitor standards. The Government are not prepared to leave quality in the NHS to chance, as occurs at present. Patients deserve a first-class service wherever they are treated.

We shall establish a professional-led National Institute for clinical excellence, to provide authoritative guidance to all health professionals on the latest technologies and drugs. There is no such organisation at present. We shall introduce national service frameworks to lay down what treatment and care should be provided for patients suffering from particular conditions. Except for cancer and children's intensive care, there are no such arrangements at present. We shall place on all local hospital boards the duty of clinical governance, to make sure that standards are met. They have no such duty at present.

We shall establish a Commission for Health Improvement to monitor the performance of every part of the NHS, carrying out a rolling programme of spot checks and troubleshooting. There is no such organisation at present. We shall require all hospital doctors to participate in national external audits. There is no such requirement at present. We shall give all GPs and their patients the right to get information on the success rates of treatments in their local hospitals. They have no such right at present. We shall carry out annual independent surveys of the experience of patients and carers in the NHS, to ensure that their voices are heard and heeded. There are no comparable national surveys at present.

I emphasise that all those proposals have been welcomed by representatives of the professions, which reflects both their commitment and the practical common-sense nature of what we propose. They are some of the practical steps that we have been taking to improve the NHS. We are equally committed to improving the health of the public and reducing inequalities in health. Under the Tories, the gap between rich and poor widened, as did the gap in health. That is true, and I shall give just one example.

In the early 1970s, there was scarcely any difference in the number of deaths from heart disease among men in social class 1 and those in social class 5. Today, men in social class 5 are three times more likely to suffer from heart disease. That constitutes a widening of the health gap. We are determined to reduce that gap, and the NHS has much to contribute to that process. However, other Departments' programmes will help even more.

Unemployment makes people ill. Our investment of £3.5 billion in the new deal for jobs will help improve the health of the people involved. Bad housing makes people ill, so our £900 million investment in new housing from the takings from the sale of council houses will provide decent homes and improve the health of the families concerned. Low pay makes people ill. Our national minimum wage will improve the health of the worst-off workers. Those and other measures are geared to helping the most deprived families and most deprived neighbourhoods—both have been neglected for far too long.

All those changes simply apply the basic socialist principles of the national health service to modern circumstances. Some people do not like that. Some so-called experts make a living travelling around the world attacking the principles of the NHS and demanding that we abandon its principles and charge everybody for everything. When they are in Britain, they ignore the evidence of the intrinsically cost-effective NHS. When abroad, they ignore the evidence of the intrinsically more expensive systems in the countries that they visit. They are a group of self-perpetuating ignoramuses. However, they are wasting their breath and whoever is paying their travel bills is wasting his or her money.

At the general election, the British people voted for the NHS—free when they need it, paid for by the taxpayer. The Government accept the verdict of the British people. Tories may argue, as some do, for a different system, but the Government are committed to the one we have. Today, we salute the people who work in the NHS—people of all colours, of all races, of all religions and of none. For every minute of every hour of every day of the past 50 years, they and their predecessors have bound up the wounded, healed the sick, cared for the afflicted, comforted the dying and consoled the bereaved. Frustrated by lack of resources and obstructed by archaic systems of organisation, they have never thrown in the towel. They have fought the good fight, but they have seldom received rewards to match their contribution to the well-being of our country.

Fifty years ago, our fathers and mothers—in some cases, our grandfathers and grandmothers—made an act of faith: they agreed to found the national health service. They had faith in the future, faith in the health care workers and faith in the principles of the welfare state. Today, as a country, we are rich beyond the wildest dreams of people in 1948. It now falls to us to renew and modernise the NHS, so that it is fit to face the challenge of the new century and the new millennium. We must not flinch or falter now.

Fifty years ago, people could only hope that the NHS would work. Fifty years later, we know that it works. We have experienced its benefits. We know that Nye Bevan was right when he wrote:

> "Society becomes more wholesome, more serene, and spiritually healthier, if it knows that its citizens have at the back of their consciousness the knowledge that not only themselves, but all their fellows, have access, when ill, to the best that medical skill can provide."

It is our job now to make sure that we renew the national health service, so that future generations experience the benefits that he gave to us. Nothing less will do.

4.36 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): The Opposition welcome the debate. We are especially glad because, on this occasion, for once, the subject has been raised by the Government. Hitherto, to get the Government to account for their stewardship of the national health service, the Opposition have had to demand the debates. To this moment, we have still not had the debate that we have consistently demanded on the White Paper.

The 50th anniversary is indeed a time for celebration. It is a time to remind ourselves that our health service is a service for the whole nation, conceived and planned by the wartime coalition Government—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—and developed beyond the original scope of its founders by a succession of Governments spanning half a century. The original plans for a universal health service, free at the point of delivery, are in fact more than 50 years old. A White Paper was published by Mr. Churchill's coalition Government in 1944, containing proposals for a comprehensive, free health service.

Our health service is the property of the whole nation, not merely of particular sectional interests, or professions, or political parties. Our health service serves the whole nation, and individuals do not serve our health service by trying to claim sole moral ownership of it, or a monopoly of concern for its best interests.

Our health service is now infinitely more comprehensive than the plan envisaged by its founders. That is its greatest triumph, but it also poses some of the greatest problems. The demand for resources resulting from new technology, pharmaceuticals and changes in society has increased exponentially.

Mr. Winnick: The right hon. Lady mentioned briefly the White Paper produced in 1944, but she sort of skipped the next few years. Will she explain why her party was strongly opposed to the conception of the national health service and why it voted against the measure at every possible opportunity? After all, some explanation would be useful.

Miss Widdecombe: If the hon. Gentleman cares to consult our manifesto of 1945, he will find that the Conservatives were in favour of a universal health service. The difficulties that we had with the detail of the setting up of the health service were reflected in changes that the Labour Government of the day subsequently made. I suggest that he re-research that history, and he will find that what I have just said is true. Until today, I did not know that Beveridge was the property of the Labour party. The hon. Gentleman will find that the national health service is the property of all political parties and the entire nation, and we should be grateful for that.

The previous Conservative Government, contrary to the present Government's propaganda, increased spending in real terms by an average of 3.1 per cent. per annum. By 1997, health spending was three quarters more again than in 1979. We treated 4 million more patients; 6,000 more every day since 1991 than in 1979. Most crucially, those patients waited a much shorter time than their predecessors. The number waiting for over one year was cut from 200,000 in 1987 to just 15,000 in 1997. Four out of 10 patients on waiting lists were treated within one month and over 50 per cent. within six weeks.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): How then would the right hon. Lady explain the fact that every possible gauge of public opinion—every survey, poll and questionnaire—during the previous Government's time in office clearly showed that very few people thought that the national health service was safe in the hands of the Conservative party? Was that fact not reflected in the general election, in that so few Conservative Members are now on those Benches?

Miss Widdecombe: The disillusion, if there was disillusion, with the degree to which the health service could deliver services was as nothing compared with the disillusion in 1978 when the Labour party completely wrecked the health service by making enormous cuts, causing industrial action, slashing the capital spending programme and reducing the pay of medical staff. We had to rebuild the health service. The Labour party has not delivered on the propaganda pledges that it consistently churned out before the last election.

Furthermore, the last 10 years of Conservative government saw the largest capital building programme in the history of our health service. The Secretary of State read out some schemes today which are very commendable, but more than 750 schemes, worth over £1 million each, were completed in the last 10 years of Conservative government. The capital stock of our health service was modernised to a level unimaginable in 1979.

We have never tried to claim that our health service was perfect, but two thirds of its life has been spent under Conservative Governments, and we can feel proud of its achievements during that time. The Secretary of State has come to the House and, rightly, praised the health service and what it can do now compared to what it could do when he watched his father suffer, praised the new technology that was not available a few decades ago, and praised all those who have worked in the health service delivering the range of care that he described. After giving so much praise, it would have been generous of him, on a day of national celebration of the health service, to give credit where it is due and say that two thirds of the credit should go to us and one third to Labour.

We should be aware that many challenges that face our health service over the next 50 years will be met not by simple, comfortable and neatly packaged solutions, but by resolving very difficult questions, the complexity of which the Secretary of State underestimates, and by the care and dedication of everyone who is a part of the service.

Last May, we were led to believe that our health service was about to enjoy a golden period. It was, apparently, to be "saved". That now seems a very long time ago. Far from being saved, our health service has entered a period of crisis: record waiting lists, fiddled figures, clinical freedom under threat, hospital cuts and closures, GPs forced into collectives, spending cuts, bureaucracy on the rampage and Tony's cronies packed on to trust boards, all against the backdrop of the slickest, spin-doctored public misinformation campaign since the formation of our health service 50 years ago. It is now time to strip away the sugar-coated sophistry that threatens to suffocate the life of our health service and to expose the dark truths that lurk behind the Government's insidious propaganda, revealing the damage that they are inflicting on the very foundations of the service.

Before the election, the Labour party, deliberately and in its own interests, raised expectations to whip up public discontent with the health service. It did not mention the excellent work that we had done on reducing waiting times, but instead promised to reduce overall waiting lists by 100,000, using £100 million. That was an early pledge. The 100,000 reduction was to be, in Labour's words, "a first step". People could naturally be forgiven for inferring that Labour really meant that and for imagining that early meant sooner, rather than later, as it usually does. They could be forgiven for thinking that, by the time of the next election, waiting lists would have fallen by more, possibly many more, than 100,000, because that was, after all, a first step.

One would not expect the public to think that, within a year of Labour taking power, waiting lists would rise to record levels of almost 1.3 million—a queue for beds which would stretch more than twice the way around the M25. One would not expect the public to welcome the fact that even the Secretary of State for Health believes that it will take five years of Labour government to reduce waiting lists to 1.06 million, falling at a miserly rate of slightly more than 900 a week. One would not expect the public to imagine or understand that routine operations, such as for varicose veins, lipomas and sebaceous cysts, would be cut from general availability in different areas to remove, at a stroke, the possibility of waiting for such procedures.

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Lady tell me—not necessarily now, but in a letter—where the availability of those operations has been withdrawn? She has made that accusation for about a fortnight, but she has not specified anywhere. Her accusation is slightly at variance with her equally misleading suggestion that we are urging hospitals to do varicose vein operations instead of heart transplants.

Miss Widdecombe: I shall indeed give the right hon. Gentleman examples, starting with Lambeth—I have just talked to a consultant who says that he can no longer perform such procedures. A gentleman in the north-west of Manchester was given a date in May 2003 for treatment of his varicose veins. He will have to wait for the next Conservative Government before he can have his varicose veins operation.

Mr. Dobson: He had to wait only until I knew about his position. Now he has an appointment in two weeks. Unlike the right hon. Lady, that gentleman thanked me for my help, in front of two television cameras at Trafford general hospital.

Miss Widdecombe: I am sure that he did because if he was put on a waiting list for an appointment in 2003, when the Secretary of State has been calmly telling the House that nobody is waiting for more than 18 months, he must have been extremely thankful to find that he would not have to wait until 2003.

Mr. Dobson: The 18-month wait is, as the right hon. Lady knows, for in-patients, and she should remember that this gentleman is an out-patient. Even so, his situation was ludicrous and had to be dealt with. If other people are being given out-patient waiting times of that length, they should get in touch with me and I shall sort out their problems too.

Miss Widdecombe: What those incidents prove is that those people should get in touch with us because every time we have raised a problem in the House, the Secretary of State has rushed out and taken action on it. He is now consulting his pager—does he want to correct the information that he just given me?

Mr. Dobson: My message is that, just before the general election, Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham health authority started restricting access by sufferers of what it described as non-painful varicose veins.

Miss Widdecombe: That is quite correct. Before the general election, the authority said that it would restrict access. Access is now virtually impossible except in cases of serious clinical need.

Dr. Brand: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: No, I want to make some progress. I have given way four or five times already.

Further, one would not expect the general public to imagine that, to achieve that eagle-like descent of 900 a week, it would cost not £100 million, as Labour promised, but more than £400 million. Any business man who achieved his goal more than three years late and four times over budget would be booted out, with his P45 following by return of post, but the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister tell us that we should be grateful for that masterly piece of mismanagement.

But more than merely hopelessly bungled and inept mismanagement surrounds the Government's dismal failure. We have evidence, previously anecdotal but now documentary, that the Government have been presiding over manipulated waiting list figures. Put simply, they realised that they will not be able to meet their modest pledge by legitimate means, so cheating has started. I shall now give the House an example.

The Alexandra Healthcare NHS trust in Redditch has been told to cut 759 patients from its waiting list. The letter that I have received says:

"The Trust is being put under enormous pressure to remove 759 patients from its waiting list without giving the treatment originally deemed necessary."

Dr. Brand: The right hon. Lady has given many historical references. During an earlier waiting list initiative, plastic surgery centres throughout Britain were told to take patients off the waiting list as of then and a series of operations were abolished overnight. I know of 40 of my patients who were denied even an existence on a waiting list.

Miss Widdecombe: The Government have put the reduction of waiting lists at the centre of their credibility and we are entitled to ask how they are achieving it. That is what I am now asking.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: No, I want to continue my point about the Alexandra Healthcare NHS trust.

It has been decided that it is politically necessary that those patients do not receive the treatment. The Government's health matters more than the health of the patients. But the political pressure placed on the collection of Labour activists and Tony's cronies appointed to trust boards has been immense. A director was dragged out of a board meeting to take a telephone call specifically to ask him to go back in and try to persuade the board to accept the approach of denying patients treatment in order to fiddle the figures. Another was recently told that he had to produce an urgent briefing for the Prime Minister with an excuse for why waiting lists were rising, not falling.

The 759 patients who, presumably, are being told to get on their bikes are not the end of the story—not by a long way. It is proposed than an extra 2,300 waiting list cases will be slashed from Worcestershire health authority's waiting lists by what is innocuously termed an administrative clean-up. In reality, for patients, that means that the list is to be reprioritised. That is, simpler cases will be treated first at the expense of more complex and perhaps more serious ones—patients left waiting in pain to avoid the pain of political embarrassment to the Government.

Dr. Starkey: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: In a minute. I want to finish my point on the Alexandra Healthcare NHS trust first.

Perhaps even more serious, however, is that part of that 2,300 clean-up will be removed by reducing the referral rates of general practitioners to the trust. Why do I say that? Do I just imagine it? No, I have here the paper that went to the board:

"The health authority proposed that 2,300 of the 8,000 cases should be removed from the waiting list by a combination of reprioritising the list, administrative clean-up and the reduction of referral rates of GPs to the trust."

Then, with masterly understatement—litotes, I think the Secretary of State called it—the paper states:

"that objective was received by the trust with a great deal of caution and is accepted as, exclusively, a health authority target."

I listened carefully to what the Secretary of State said and I listened to his weasel words. He said that nothing is being done that is different from what was done under the previous Government. Nothing is being done—no. Semantically, that is right. These are proposals for actions to meet his current targets and the pressure that he is putting on chief executives by telling them that they will be sacked if they do not deliver his election pledge.

Mr. Dobson: I am accused of being all sorts of things, but weasel is fairly unusual.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Such terms are not appreciated. Temperate language is preferable.

Mr. Dobson: I have no attributions from the right hon. Lady for any of the statements that she has made, other than the paper that went to the board. First, I do not know why the board considered the matter in private, because, under the new rules, it should have been considered in public. Secondly, I have a paper here from the regional office from a man called Steve Hilton, about whom I know nothing, which says:

"Validation like this has been common practice for over a decade."

Nothing new is happening as far as I can make out. Nothing different is being done. As I said earlier, in the previous validation exercise in Worcestershire, 2,000 people were added to the waiting list. We are entirely in the hands of this statistical lunacy to which I referred at the previous Health questions.

Miss Widdecombe: No, there is no statistical lunacy in the clear statement read from papers to the board, which the right hon. Gentleman has, that one of the means of achieving this is to reduce the referral rates of GPs to the trust. In plain English, that means that, unless patients' conditions are very serious, they cannot even get on to the waiting list. Patients will, in effect, be told that they can pay up and go private or sit and suffer.

The hospital has not even been given enough money by the Government to fiddle the figures properly. The special funding, touted so heavily around the media as a panacea for the waiting list funding, is actually short-changing it to the tune of £1.9 million.

If that fiddle—the Secretary of State might prefer to call it a pattern of behaviour—in private or in public, is repeated throughout Britain, it becomes almost impossible to contemplate the damage that is done to patients' health, and the extent to which the fiddled waiting list figures misrepresent the true picture of the mess that Labour has created.

Dr. Starkey: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: I shall finish my point on the Alexandra Healthcare NHS trust. I have remembered the hon. Lady and when I have finished my point I shall come back to her.

The picture to emerge from this sorry tale of sordid deception is of a Government who will commit any act of manipulation, spin any convenient sophistry and break any trust to present what must be seen not only as a deeply misleading picture of their waiting list disaster, but a highly dangerous practice which can only be harmful to the well-being of patients.

Perhaps I am too harsh. Perhaps I have misjudged the Secretary of State. Perhaps he does not know that that is going on, and would not countenance it if he did. Perhaps he would wish to stop it. I shall give him the benefit of that doubt and suggest what he can do to reassure us.

Will the Secretary of State tell the House in terms that he would rather see waiting lists rise than see fiddled falls that will mislead the public and endanger patients? Will he go further and issue a letter to health authorities informing them that waiting lists are not to be cut by using dubious expedients and specify that that includes removing from the list patients who have not received their treatment, placing pressure on GPs to reduce referral rates, removing the general availability of certain smaller operations, and treating simple but less urgent cases before more complex but important ones? If he will offer that assurance, and if he will send such a letter—preferably today, but I shall give him until the weekend if he is busy—we can be less suspicious about the Government's attitude to such foul play.

Will the Secretary of State commend—indeed, praise—the whistleblower on the trust? The Secretary of State is keen on whistleblowing. On this occasion, the whistleblowing has been done on his waiting list figures. Will he commend the whistleblower, and will he write that letter?

Mr. Dobson: I do not mind who publishes which of those figures; if the trust had been following the guidance that it has been given, the figures would have been public anyway. I do not know who the whistleblower was. If anyone wants to release such information, he or she should. I am in favour of its being released. I do not think that these things should be done behind closed doors.

In response to the request for an instantaneous letter, most of the things that the right hon. Lady specified are in the instructions to the entire national health service about waiting lists. On the accuracy of waiting lists, when the figures were increasing as a result of tracking down people whose names had not previously been on the list, I have told officials and regional chairmen to get the figures right. The figures need to be right.

The policies of Worcestershire health authority—whose members, I might add, I did not appoint—are, generally, to try to get more people treated, if appropriate, closer to home by their GPs rather than, in some cases, going into hospital. As I understand it, that explains the line in the document about which the right hon. Lady is talking.

If anyone anywhere is fiddling the figures, it should be drawn to my attention and I will stop it. The only purpose of shortening waiting lists is to get people treated, not to do a statistical exercise. I return to the point that, as far as we know, the whole process that Worcestershire health authority is going through is exactly the same it has been for the past 10 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I make an appeal to Front Benchers, as Back Benchers want to take part? This is a debate for everyone, so the hon. Lady should not entice the Minister to come in on an intervention. [Interruption.] Order. What I am trying to say is that—

Mr. Dobson: I shall try to resist temptation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister will try to resist and the right hon. Lady will try not to entice him.

Mr. Duncan: Why not?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Government have an opportunity to reply at the end of the debate, and so do the Opposition. The hon. Gentleman asks, "Why not?" I have to look after the interests of Back Benchers as well as Front Benchers.

Miss Widdecombe: I have seldom found any of your instructions difficult to follow, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but being told not to tempt the Secretary of State may give me the odd piece of difficulty.

Dr. Starkey: Is the right hon. Lady aware that Milton Keynes general hospital, in my constituency, has already started to reverse the trend, which occurred under the Conservative Government in which she was a Minister, of increasing waiting lists? It held the waiting list increase over the winter to only 29 extra patients; the previous winter, there was an increase of 631. The hospital did so thanks to the £1.1 million of extra money that it got, which allowed it to save more than 4,000 patient bed days. Is the right hon. Lady further aware that the new chairman of that hospital trust is a former official of the Milton Keynes Conservative association, put forward by me and nominated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State?

Miss Widdecombe: It never surprises me when Conservatives are successful. I must tell the hon. Lady that, of course, none of us has seen the figures, because they have not yet been published. At the moment, the only knowledge that we have of revised waiting lists comes from the Secretary of State's warm and woolly claims. We have not read any detail.

Mr. Blizzard rose—

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) rose—

Miss Widdecombe: I shall make progress, because you will get cross with me if I do not, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Recently, the Secretary of State for Health announced that no patients were waiting more than 18 months, and that the first step in the delivery of Labour's "early" pledge had been delivered. Unfortunately, as the House knows, that did not happen. Even as he was saying that, we produced the case of a young boy of eight years who had been waiting more than 18 months, in considerable discomfort, for a simple tonsillectomy.

On 16 June, I brought that information to the House. The Secretary of State denied all knowledge, but—as if by a miracle, dispatched at the speed of light—a motor cycle courier was sent on his mission of mercy to deliver, posthaste, an in-patient appointment. The Minister of State, the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), told the House that the boy would "have an operation within the next few days, as the NHS trust had always planned."

Presumably, that is now standard procedure in new Labour's NHS. The appointment card will be delivered by motor cycle courier, on the day of an Opposition debate when they raise an embarrassing case, and we shall be told by the Minister that that had been planned by the trust all along. The mother of the boy says that she had an appointment; it was for several weeks later.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: Mr. Deputy Speaker is not looking. Okay.

Dr. Ladyman: I also have a constituent who has been told that his son must wait six months for a tonsillectomy. He was also told, however, that he could have it the next day, done by the same surgeon, privately. Will the right hon. Lady join me in condemning that type of queue jumping?

Miss Widdecombe: I shall not condemn anyone having a remedy against the present Government's inefficiencies. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Miss Widdecombe: That was not for me that time, was it, Mr. Deputy Speaker? No.

There is something faintly sinister about all this. It is a bit like the miraculous, phoenix-like rebirth of the Trafford general hospital children's unit, which was "reprieved from closure" two days before the Secretary of State for Health was to make a highly publicised visit. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that he did not know anything about it. Well, I wonder whether he will now do me a big favour and instantly arrange for highly publicised flying visits to Kent and Canterbury hospital, Burford community hospital, many community hospitals in Cornwall and various others that he is about to close. Then, perhaps, the need to save his face will coincide with the need to save those hospitals.

Miss Kirkbride: On the subject of the closure of hospitals, I hope that my right hon. Friend will urge the Secretary of State for Health to visit Kidderminster, where the Kidderminster general hospital, which serves my constituents, faces closure.

On the wider front of Worcestershire, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend has any advice for doctors in Bromsgrove, who feed patients into the Alexandra in Redditch. I shall meet those doctors tomorrow, and I would welcome her advice on what to say to them about how to resist the cynical bully-boy tactics of the present Government, which are preventing my constituents from having their names put on the waiting list for the medical treatment that they deserve.

Miss Widdecombe: It is all right. Now that the subject has been mentioned in the House, I am sure that there will be an instantaneous solution, and that, even now, there will be a rush and a motor cycle will be on its way to those patients. I therefore urge my hon. Friend not to worry too much about it.

Dr. Ladyman: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: No; I shall make progress. If the hon. Gentleman has a hospital in his constituency, will the Secretary of State visit that hospital, too?

Because the Government have made their rather modest pledge on waiting lists, and associated propaganda, the fundamental goal of their health policy, subsequent media interest and the Secretary of State's obsession have eclipsed many other issues of great importance to patients and the profession. We can see the extent to which the waiting list panic has come to dominate Health Ministers' every thought and act, at the expense of other areas of our health service.

[Miss Widdecombe]

During the 16 June debate on the waiting list crisis, the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Darlington, assured the House:

"The hon. Gentleman asked me for an assurance that no other sector of health care would suffer as a consequence of our getting NHS waiting lists down. I will give him that assurance".—[Official Report, 16 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 187-89.]

However, it appears that the chairman of the British Medical Association profoundly disagrees with the Minister. On the "Today" programme on Monday 6 July, when asked about giving priority, for political reasons, to patients whose need is less, Dr. Sandy Macara said:

"Unfortunately"

this

"is happening because the Government have put themselves, and therefore all of us, on a most unfortunate hook."

I ask the Secretary of State who is correct. Is Dr. Macara—a figure for whom I understand the right hon. Gentleman has great respect—factually incorrect, or was his Minister in danger of misleading the House on 16 June? No reply comes.

Other areas of our health service are bound to suffer as the Government become increasingly like a one-eyed man over the waiting lists. The changes that they have introduced will only make matters worse for people in lengthening queues for simple operations. Dragooning GPs into collectives and then preventing a collective from choosing which trust to send its patients to will increase the lists and deter trusts from making the improvements that are necessary to ensure a uniform standard of service throughout the country.

Reductions in clinical freedom, imposed through NICE—the National Institute for Clinical Excellence—and backed with cash-limited GP drugs budgets will cause morale to plummet and patient care to suffer.

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: No, I have been told not to do so.

Mr. Dobson rose—

Miss Widdecombe: The Secretary of State gives in to temptation an awful lot. Will he please be tempted to look again at the bureaucracy resulting from the introduction of NICE, the Commission for Health Improvement, the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation, local education consortia and the co-ordinating bureaucracy between health and local authorities, which will divert money from front-line patient care into administration? GP collectives alone will cost £150 million a year to run. In short, Labour's White Paper is a blueprint for increasing the people's waiting lists.

Perhaps the situation would not have been so dire, had our health service been given the money to meet the high expectations. Under Labour, however, that has not happened. Our health service is now worse off by more than £800 million over and above inflation than if our average spending levels had been adhered to. That does not take into account money squandered through efficiency losses and unnecessary new bureaucracy.

The mantra that Ministers have repeatedly chanted over the past few weeks is that the comprehensive spending review will lead us to the promised land of health service bliss. I wonder. I have calculated that the Government will have to spend at least £8 billion over three years to stand still and to match average Conservative spending levels. People do not have to take my word for it. Every hon. Member has access to the House of Commons Library, which has independently calculated that my figure is an underestimate, that more money will be required, and that the figure cited by the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is nearer the mark, at £9 billion.

That has been another well-presented, slick PR exercise designed to mislead the public. Now I shall ask the Secretary of State a few simple questions.

Mr. Dobson: I am not allowed to answer them.

Miss Widdecombe: I will incur the wrath of Mr. Deputy Speaker by allowing the right hon. Gentleman to answer them, if he can. I know that the Government like their questions to be helpful, but we will not have a serious debate on the future of the health service by indulging in the good-news culture of his party.

Critical questions must be asked about rationing—which the Secretary of State denies is happening, but it is—rising demand, clinical freedom, recruitment of doctors and the role of the private sector. Those questions are already being debated by sensible people in the health service, but they are not happy bedfellows of new Britain and the new NHS. Such questions cannot be asked helpfully while the Government remain on-message.

How much, over three years, does the Secretary of State believe must be spent on our health service, simply to stand still? I have asked him before, the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey has asked him before, my hon. Friends have asked him before and I still live in hope that he might answer. How much will primary care groups, CHIMP, ACRA, LECs and health authority-local authority co-ordinating bureaucracy cost our health service per annum?

Was the Minister of State making an unsubstantiated statement to the House when he assured us that other areas of the health service were not suffering as a result of the Government's obsession with their waiting list publicity? If not, how does that accord with Dr. Macara's view of the situation?

If the Secretary of State could give us the figures, fiddled or not, for over-18-month waiters before the customary time, why can he not give us the full waiting list figures? We are told by trusts throughout the country that a huge amount of time is taken up with supplying information on a weekly basis. If the Secretary of State has asked for weekly reports, how much is that costing and why is that information not released to the public, who are paying for it? Finally, how widespread throughout the country is the manipulation—I even use a neutral word—that we discovered in Redditch?

The Government are obsessed with their own propaganda, but behind it is a catalogue of incompetence, mismanagement and manipulation. They told us that no one was waiting more than 18 months for an operation. That was not true. They told us of 2,000 new beds, which turned out to be mainly recycled or temporary beds.

The Government enjoyed that one so much that they released the same statement twice. All I can say is that, if some of their announcements were about food, there would have been a prosecution. The Government told us that they did not know how many hospitals they would close. They told us that waiting lists were falling, but they have been caught red-handed chucking patients out of the queue.

This is a fiddling, cheating, gerrymandering, dissembling, spin-doctoring, bullying, arrogant Government and they have finally gone too far.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): The right hon. Lady does not believe that.

Miss Widdecombe: I do believe it and, what is more, the people are beginning to believe it. Running our health service for the benefit of their own PR, not for patients, has come to be the defining feature of the Government, for whom getting headlines is more important than getting results.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, may I say that 25 Back Benchers want to speak, on both sides of the House. Hon. Members can draw their own conclusions. Long speeches will squeeze other hon. Members out.

5.16 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I am grateful for an opportunity to make a few observations in the debate. There is a common perception that the political agenda of the two major parties has in, recent years, moved closer together in several policy areas—economic and foreign policy, penal affairs and to some extent social policy. It is no secret that I feel uneasy about that process, but I have a great sense of relief that the outlooks of the two parties on the national health service remain as polarised as ever.

I commend the Secretary of State for his work to ensure that that polarisation remains. He has a remarkable record in defence of the basic principles of the national health service. I commend the Government for their excellent work over the past year in various areas. There is to be an announcement next week on the Secretary of State's record of winning new investment in the NHS, which is remarkable. I commend him on the national health service White Paper and on dismantling the internal market.

Primary care has already been mentioned. I commend the Secretary of State on restating in the White Paper the vision of Nye Bevan in respect of primary care—a vision that has never been delivered since the original plans and proposals were drawn up in the 1940s. I commend the restatement by the Secretary of State and his Minister for Public Health of the crucial importance of public health, an issue that disappeared from the agenda during the Tory years because of the political inconvenience of unemployment, bad housing, poverty and other issues about which the Tories never cared, but which had a crucial connection to the issue of personal health and ill health.

I commend the Secretary of State on developing links with social services and on the impact of the winter beds initiative on the difficulties that have been experienced in the past with lengthy waiting lists. Most importantly, I commend my right hon. Friend on returning to the fundamentals of the national health service—to collectivised, socialised provision, and to a co-operative and collaborative national service. He used the term "the socialist ethic" of the NHS. That is what the Government's policies are all about, and I am proud of that fact.

I was waiting for the shadow Secretary of State to give us some idea of what she would do if, God forbid, she ever came to power. She analysed her version of the Labour Government's record, but I want to know what a Conservative Government would do in the current circumstances. Last week, I had the dubious opportunity of doing a couple of interviews with her in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the NHS. One was on the "Today" programme and the other was on breakfast television. I was interested in her lack of response to my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), who told us what happened when his constituent was advised to go private. The right hon. Lady's advice to the nation in those two interviews was that people should take out private insurance. The clear implication was that the country could no longer afford a national health service, so people should go private.

Miss Widdecombe: There is a sum of money that goes into the nation's health; some is put in by the state through general taxation and some by individuals and organisations, including trade unions, who take out private insurance. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, if the private element is removed, the total sum that goes into the nation's health is reduced?

Mr. Hinchliffe: What I do accept is that the system that the right hon. Lady offers is very different from what I believe in. I do not believe that, because I am wealthier than someone else, I as a human being have the right to queue-jump over somebody whose needs are greater than mine. I have seen that happen in the context of my family. My father waited for a heart bypass for two years. My predecessor raised the issue with the Minister of State in the previous Government, and my father finally got into hospital after the intervention of the then Minister of State. Having worked hard all his life, my father had retired at 65 and been ill until the age of 67. I vividly remember the man in the next bed telling him that he had gone private and waited for only three months. He had queue-jumped and pushed everybody else back down the queue. That is an immoral system. The shadow Secretary of State professes to be a moral person, but she advocates a profoundly immoral practice. I hope that the Government will do something about that practice because that is the unfinished business of Bevan.

Miss Widdecombe rose—

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have given way once, and I am conscious that many of my hon. Friends wish to speak. The right hon. Lady had a chance to make her point, and I have responded to it.

The Tories regard private insurance as the way forward, but what about those who cannot get it? They should talk to people who are chronically ill, or to those who are fit and well, but have in their families illnesses that are passed down from generation to generation. They do not feature on the Tory agenda. The right hon. Lady should deal with the concerns of people who do not believe in the system that she advocates because it is profoundly unfair and immoral.

On this 50th anniversary, the key task is to restore the original ideas and framework of the NHS, which has been so damaged by the Conservatives over several periods in government. The shadow Secretary of State said that the Tories had been in power over many years of the existence of the NHS. In this debate, we shall look at the history of the national health service and at what has happened in the past 50 years. In 1974, the Conservative Secretary of State, Sir Keith Joseph, introduced changes to the national health service. At that time, I was a young councillor serving on a local authority. I also worked in a social services department, so I saw the situation from two perspectives—as a politician and as someone who was professionally involved with the national health service. I hope that the Government will repair the crucial mistake that was made at that time, when public health was removed from the local democratic debate.

As a young councillor in Wakefield, I recall discussing smokeless zones, slum clearance, the sexual health of young people and mortality rates. Those key public health questions should be dealt with at a local level, but in 1974, the Conservatives removed that ability and separated public health from fundamental health-related issues, such as housing, the environment, transport, education and, especially, social services.

That Tory decision caused the start of what my right hon. Friend describes as "the Berlin wall"—the divide between social care and health care. We are still trying to deal with the consequences of that totally false divide. It was the beginning of the bureaucratic explosion, which culminated in the internal market with the establishment of unelected, locally unaccountable health authorities. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, I served on Committees considering health legislation with the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), who was then the Secretary of State, and we spent many hours arguing about the internal market.

In my home town of Wakefield, the functions of one health authority were replaced by four different agencies, which made no sense to me. Most of the time, those agencies were arguing about where the boundaries were, who did what and who was responsible. They were constantly blaming each other. We never saw any real impact of the new money put in by the previous Government because it was wasted in an incredible bureaucratic paperchase, which they introduced because they believed that the national health service should be run on the basis of a market philosophy rather than on the basis of collectivism, in which my right hon. Friend and I believe.

The right hon. Lady will recall that, at the same time, she began the process of the wholesale privatisation of community care, which reinforced the Berlin wall. Elderly people had to pay for services that were previously free at the point of need. That was the Tory Government's record, and people will not forget it easily.

Dr. Harris: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that cuts to social services funding, which the House of Commons Library figures show were greater than 1 per cent. in real terms in each of the past two years, mean that local authorities and social services must tighten eligibility criteria and put up charges? Thus the desperate, difficult and unfair situation to which he refers gets more desperate, difficult and unfair when social services funding is cut. Those cuts have been made for the past two years, because the Labour party has adopted Tory spending plans.

Mr. Hinchliffe: The hon. Gentleman has been in the Chamber when I have pressed the Secretary of State on the issue of social services. The Select Committee on Health is about to produce a report on that issue, and I am sure that it will help the Government in considering what to include in the White Paper on social care to be published in the autumn. I am optimistic that the Secretary of State will listen to concerns such as the hon. Gentleman and Labour Members have expressed.

I mentioned the pre-1974 structure because I believe that it was a more sensible and effective framework. In a sense, that is the standard by which I judge what the previous Government did and what this Government are doing. I wish to outline some key areas that the Government must address in returning to the framework that we inherited from the Bevan era because they made a lot of sense to people like me when I was working in the system, but they have been destroyed by subsequent Governments and particularly by the Conservatives' internal market.

I welcome the Green Paper on public health and the work by the Minister for Public Health in that direction. I am concerned that the issue of public health is marginalised within health authorities and has shifted away from local democratic debate. We must get it back in the mainstream of democratic debate. I welcome health improvement programmes, smoking initiatives and health action zones, but the Secretary of State will not be surprised to hear me say that I would welcome a more central role for local authorities, which have a great deal to offer. A great deal of progress was made in the past as a consequence of public health being part of their responsibilities.

I want the work that is already done on links with social services to be enhanced. My right hon. Friend knows that I favour moving towards the local government health model; I know that that is not my party's policy, but I support it on the basis of my working experiences. Perhaps I am out of date and have not had his experiences of some rather questionable people in London boroughs whom he would not trust to run the health service—I understand his problems.

Mr. Dobson: Lady Porter.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I missed that one, so I shall revisit it in Hansard.

The organisational split of health and social care is nonsensical; I am sure that my colleagues on the Health Committee would agree that it does not make any sense, whatever solutions we reach when we discuss the matter. I welcome the White Paper's proposals on links with social services in primary care, but we need radically to enhance such links along the lines of those that my colleagues on the Health Committee studied in Northern Ireland.

We went into a primary care centre at which everyone—nurses, midwives, health visitors, care managers and child protection officers—was working in a local GP's surgery, together in one body. That is the system that I experienced before 1974; it was destroyed by the Conservatives, which has taken us so far back in comparison with my career experiences several years ago.

I also want to refer to the continuing concern about the democratic deficit in health, and my discomfort, which I think my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State shares to an extent, at the continuation of the appointments system. I suspect that he has had more difficulties over the past year with who should be appointed and who has been recommended and by whom, and with checking that those people are suitable, than with many other issues. There should be new arrangements giving service users a real voice. Let us get some young mums involved; they are the main users of the NHS, and they should be running it and making the decisions.

That takes me on to my final, local points. Young mums in Wakefield are a concern to me, because a number of policy issues affect them directly in respect of maternity services and gynaecology. I wanted to make a general speech, but it would be wrong not to refer to the serious concerns in Wakefield about proposals in respect of maternity services. I know that I do not look it, but I shall be 50 in October, so I share this anniversary with the NHS. [Interruption.] Who said that?

I share this anniversary with the NHS—I came in during 1948 as well. An excellent example of family planning, I was born at Manygates hospital, three months after the NHS was set up. My children were also born there, but Manygates was recently closed by the Tories on the ground that we needed anaesthetic cover, and that little hospital did not have it. Services had to move to Pinderfields district general hospital but, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State knows because I have raised the matter with him before, there is a proposal to close the maternity unit at Pinderfields. The central argument is that anaesthetic cover is not adequate, which is why services were moved there in the first place.

We were promised a new unit, but we have never had it. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider this issue, because I think that we are being sold a pup by the health authority. I have a lot of respect for the difficult work that it is doing, but there are serious questions about some of its arguments. For example, it is proposed to move gynaecology and maternity to Pontefract on the basis that the Calman-Hine proposals on cancer will mean that a large part of the gynaecology work load will have to go to Leeds. I have checked the matter factually, and, over the past 12 months, only 63 of 2,179 new referrals related to malignancy of the ovary, womb, cervix and vulva. We have been given the wrong information, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider this issue because the women and the public of Wakefield are facing profound changes on the basis of untrue and misleading statements.

Audrey Wise (Preston): Will my hon. Friend also ask the Secretary of State to take another look at how "Changing Childbirth", a useful report based on the Select Committee report to which my hon. Friend and I contributed, is being implemented? It is my strong impression that, having had impetus for five years, we are in danger of forgetting the valuable principles enshrined in "Changing Childbirth". Our right hon. Friend should look again at that issue for the sake of women awaiting childbirth.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I commend my hon. Friend for her key role in the report, which was her idea. The conclusions have moved things forward radically, but the direct issue in my constituency, and a key question in respect of "Changing Childbirth", is that women should have choice. My constituents are being denied choice, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that.

The Secretary of State has more than kept the Government's promises nationally. He has an excellent record in his year in the job. The socialist ethic is being restored by the Government, and I warmly welcome that. I look forward to the health service going from strength to strength—in the hands of a Labour Government.

5.35 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this important debate. The national health service, its achievements and its future, is a subject which concerns us all. Like the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), I am of the 1948 vintage, and I think that he looks very young indeed.

The hon. Member for Wakefield and I are part of a generation that has a passionate commitment to the health service. I have spent most of my working life working with it, and I should declare an interest: the NHS employs more members of my family than any other employer. The health service is a concern to our constituents, but it is a source of pride to our country as we talk about its achievements and, above all, its culture and ethos around the world.

Much has been made of the socialist contribution to the NHS. Dare I say that it has also led the NHS to be cumbersome, bureaucratic, reluctant to change, paternalistic and unresponsive to patients. That contribution led to many of the necessary changes during the past 18 years. For all the lofty rhetoric over the past year, imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. There has been a massive rebadging exercise, and I shall talk through some of the uncomfortable hooks, as Sandy Macara described them, that the Government left for themselves in opposition. They have been working hard to get off those hooks and back on to the programme of evolution and modernisation of the health service.

In opposition, the Government said that they would end the internal market, but they have rebadged the internal market—the distinction between purchasers and providers remains. It would have been strange of them to dismantle a system that the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has been commending to other countries around the world since 1994. The combination of the patients charter, the strategy in "The Health of the Nation" and the establishment of the distinction between purchasers and providers was described by the OECD as putting Britain

> "in the forefront of countries attempting to achieve more coherent health policies which recognise that health care is only one part, but still an important one, in improving health."

I welcome the continuation of the internal market, but I deplore the fact that the Government's political rhetoric about ending GP fundholding has resulted in the introduction of far more cumbersome, bureaucratic

[Mrs. Virginia Bottomley]

GP co-operatives. Whoever would have thought that GPs—all of them—would be forced to become budget holders, for that is the effect of the bounce that they have received from the incoming Government? I dare say that we might, in due course, have done that ourselves, but, when in opposition, members of the present Government would have been deeply irresponsible, and hostile to any such measure. They also said in opposition that they were against hospital closures, and that there would be no more. Since then, they have been back-tracking hard.

This is a difficult issue for us as constituency Members of Parliament, because we all know that our own hospital is a more loved and understood institution than almost any other. The dilemma for any Secretary of State for Health is whether to champion the future—changing technology and styles of health care—and whether to follow the Calman-Hine protocols on cancer treatment. I am delighted that Sir Kenneth Calman was appointed when I was in office; I congratulate him on his achievements, and wish him well for the future.

I commissioned and published the Calman-Hine report. The logic of the expert views on the delivery of health care is to change the fabric—the bricks and mortar. Is the health service its values and its treatments, or is it its institutions? I believe that it is the ethos and the service, and it must look to the future rather than the past.

The Secretary of State will have greater and greater difficulties with his socialist instincts. The introduction of protocols, guidelines and centralising techniques will make change and evolution harder and harder. There is a growing concern that the end of fundholding and many of the other new measures will stifle innovation. It is through innovation that we will conquer the diseases and frailties of the future.

In opposition, the Labour party irresponsibly heralded endless individual cases devoid of a context. The case of Jennifer's ear will be with us for ever. In government, it must tackle the underlying challenges. I wish the Secretary of State well, and I hope that he will do at least as well as we did on funding.

We delivered an average real-terms increase of more than 3 per cent. a year. It is nonsense to say that the Government are spending what we would have spent. Any Health Secretary who lived with the figure in the Red Book would have been deeply humiliated. That was the opening of negotiations: the Health Secretary, with the chief executive of the NHS, then went out to bat with the Treasury so that targets could be met. That is why I had hardly any summer holiday for six years—neither did my successor, and nor, I imagine, will the present Secretary of State.

So far, the Secretary of State has not done well enough. I shall welcome it if he gets the three-year funding package. I do not advise mid-year rescue packages, because they result in shroud waving and crises. People become adept at gaining access to sources of funding. We increased NHS funding by a full percentage point of gross domestic product. I wish the Secretary of State well, and hope that he can say the same when he finishes his term of office.

The local effect is dire. My health authority has had a mere 1.3 per cent. increase. It has an acute shortage of nurses. It may, objectively, have little health need, but it has massive health demand. It is having great difficulty recruiting staff, and the position will get progressively more difficult as a result of the changes to the formula that the Secretary of State is introducing.

The Secretary of State's approach of naming and shaming officials is unacceptable. I have always condemned him for criticising health managers. When he was in opposition, no opportunity was resisted to attack health managers—I have a list of quotations, if he would like to see it. I am pleased to say that he has made progress, but the Prime Minister still takes every opportunity to attack what he calls "bureaucrats". The managers in the health service, as much as the doctors and nurses, are committed to the general good and to philanthropy: they believe in the service. It is not fair, and not right, for them always to be the scapegoats.

I am sure that the Secretary of State is aware of the growing unhappiness about late-night calls from the boot boys in the Box. People have spoken out about the telephone calls they have received telling them to keep quiet and not to say what they believe. If the Secretary of State wants me to identify those people, I shall do so later outside the Chamber. There is a bullying atmosphere at the centre. People are excluded from policy making, and there is a loss of confidence in his ability to work with people and not make them scapegoats when difficulties emerge.

Mr. Dobson: The only person I named and shamed, so to speak, was the chair of the National Blood Authority, whom I named, shamed and sacked. As I understand it, the right hon. Lady's successor, my predecessor, was broadly sympathetic to my action. Indeed, my announcement was welcomed by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman.

There is no question of anyone on my behalf trying to prevent people from speaking out. I have made it crystal clear to every health authority and trust that they must dispense with the gagging clauses that were introduced into people's contracts when the right hon. Lady was the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Bottomley: I give the House and the Secretary of State my solemn word that I have heard of repeated incidents of intimidation by his office. I do not want to add to those people's discomfort by naming them now, because that would compound their difficulties. If he is not aware of that intimidation, he should know that people are behaving in that way on his behalf.

There are further allegations of cronyism. The Secretary of State appointed Baronesses Hayman, Jay and Dean. New Labour Members have approached me and commented on their experiences as members of a health authority or trust. It is difficult to understand the high-handed, contemptuous manner in which a great number of people who gave many years' service to the NHS were dismissed. Ann Galbraith from Newcastle, the NHS representative on the citizens charter, is a person of impeccable integrity. She first knew that she was being dismissed when she was told by her successor.

The other day, the Secretary of State accused one of my hon. Friends of being too lazy to make nominations for health appointments. I have made a number of recommendations, but he has dismissed the vast majority of my suggestions and has appointed people of his choosing. Nolan, when he investigated health appointments, commended the steps that had been taken to introduce panels and to achieve a more open system. The Secretary of State's recent announcements have resulted in a loss of confidence, and we have taken many steps back. It may be that it is early days, and that a great number of appointments have had to be made. I hope that that is the case.

Mr. Dobson: The Nolan panel still exists. Nominations come to me, as they used to come to the right hon. Lady. I make different judgments in some cases. Conservative Members have thanked and commended me for appointing people they have recommended. The right hon. Lady was appointing people for a long time, so perhaps she should get used to the fact that she is no longer doing so.

Mrs. Bottomley: I am much enjoying the fact that I have weekends free and can have a holiday, and that I no longer have the responsibilities of the Secretary of State.

It is interesting that the chairman of the Prime Minister's Labour club, the parliamentary agent of the Chief Whip and the parliamentary agent of the Minister for Local Government and Housing have all been given health appointments. I leave that thought with the Secretary of State. I do not have access to the vast amount of information on each appointment, but those three immediately come to mind, and there are many more.

Ill will in the health service is growing. It is important for people who have to carry out difficult tasks to feel that they have the Secretary of State's support. When they come to the end of their term of office, there should at least be recognition of and gratitude for the steps that they have taken.

Dr. Ladyman: The right hon. Lady mentioned a number of Labour party supporters who have been given positions on health trusts. Is she suggesting that, if she were still Secretary of State, they would not have got those positions? If so, is that not every bit as bad as what she is accusing the Secretary of State of doing?

Mrs. Bottomley: I am saying that many people who have spent many years serving the NHS are affronted by the shabby manner of their dismissal. A vast number of new people have been appointed whose claim for such recognition is not immediately apparent.

Let me now move from the role of politicians to that of professionals. Over the years, their role has changed. They have consistently resisted new developments. Doctors were initially hostile to the introduction of the NHS, and at each moment there has been further resistance. The Secretary of State has recently experienced difficulties of his own, and no doubt there will be more.

Let me comment on each group of professionals, because this concerns the future. First, there are the doctors. There has been a shortage of medical leadership. There is the British Medical Association, the doctors' trade union, and there are the royal colleges, which are concerned with education and training; but neither body contains the courageous leaders the profession needs. In many ways, the management that emerged did so because doctors did not want to take on such responsibilities.

I strongly believe that the Secretary of State would do well to do all that he can to encourage medical management—the work of Sir Cyril Chantler and others. Doctors cannot simply resist change, because they are the people most trusted by the public to achieve change with public confidence. Their role becomes more and more difficult as the public expect more: they expect to be treated as partners, and people engage in litigation when they do not receive satisfaction.

Secondly, there are the nurses. Mention has been made of the recruitment of doctors, but the recruitment and motivation of nurses is more important still. There are real difficulties in the nursing profession, and I urge the Secretary of State to give priority to considering how we can make nursing a long-term, rewarding career. During my time in government, we joined Opportunity 2000 in an attempt to become a model employer, particularly of women, providing part-time employment and career breaks.

Finally, there are the health managers. Already, there are stories that health managers are leaving the NHS and finding employment elsewhere, because they do not believe that they are being given recognition and respect by the Secretary of State and his team. I commend the award of a knighthood to Sir Alan Langlands, who, as chief executive, has acted with great distinction.

The appointment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) as shadow health spokesman has been welcomed—for many reasons, but not least because of her reputation for standing up for officials and not allowing them to be fall guys for politicians' policies. I believe that health managers, and all in the health service, will have a staunch ally in my right hon. Friend.

Let me say a little about patients. We talk of a primary care-led NHS: we share that language. Indeed, in many respects the language that we used in government has been taken over by the Labour party. I made any number of speeches about "co-operation as much as competition" and "progress through partnership". Such phrases are now used as if they were a whole new language, representing a new step forward.

The patients charter represented an important cultural change in the NHS. It meant that patients must no longer be seen and not heard, and put up with a "like it or lump it" service in which doctors spoke disparagingly of them and scarcely attended to their interests. The charter has put great pressure on the service, and has aroused even more expectations in the public.

We now live in a world of increasingly assertive patients. They can call up vast amounts of information about their conditions on the internet, and there are patient self-help groups that encourage them to expect more and more. The challenges faced by the NHS are not due so much to the aging population—which is increasing at only a third of the rate that we have seen over the past 10 years—or to changes in technology, which will lead to savings as well as costs. The real dilemma for the future is caused by a massive increase in expectations. In this consumer society, people want not just their health needs but their health wishes to be met: they feel that they are entitled to more and more.

I am not convinced that the NHS can provide everything for everyone, for free, for ever. The Secretary of State would show more courage if, instead of rebadging and helping old Labour to accept that new Labour has taken on Tory policies lock, stock and barrel, he re-examined the whole question of priorities. Call it rationing if you will, but I think that priority setting is the right term. We need to know what the NHS will and will not provide: it needs to be more explicit about that.

I was interested in the comments of our former colleague Michael Portillo. If the Government remain committed to low tax, the NHS needs more money. If the NHS is not to become a third-rate service, it will be vital for the Government to meet health wishes and wants as well as providing for health needs. That must come, even if it means more co-payment, more insurance, more charging or a more positive attitude to the private sector. The Secretary of State will serve no one if he keeps his head in the sand.

The issue of prescription charges has become ridiculous. We are talking about higher and higher charges, which fewer and fewer people pay. The exemptions cannot be justified. Before the Secretary of State asks why we did not tackle that when we were in government, let me say that I am not convinced that many people thought that we were short of difficult issues to tackle. Given the patients charter, the health strategy, the health reforms, junior doctors' hours, the research and development strategy and much else besides, I do not think that we could have addressed the issue—but it can be addressed in the first part of a Parliament with a large majority, and I think that the Secretary of State should address it.

I believe that we shall achieve greater understanding, broader co-operation and a more civilised approach to the NHS if there is a wide understanding of what the service is trying to achieve. When it comes to schools, the public understand that exam results are a good outcome measure; the dilemma in the health service is caused by the fact that the public are less aware of what outcome measure they should look for.

The Government have made fools of themselves over waiting lists. In fact, they were the wrong target. We made huge progress on waiting times. If I had been in opposition I would have wanted to move the debate on, because the message had been conveyed that waiting times and waiting lists are an affront to the public. For Labour Members to make so much of the issue, to say repeatedly in the House, "We keep our promises; they broke theirs," and then to make such fools of themselves with such record waiting lists, has done no one any good.

I urge the Government to look for better outcome measures that the public will understand. That will require a greater sense of what I have termed health literacy. The public need to understand the relationship between hospitals and primary care, and the importance of immunisation, screening and other prevention programmes. I commend the King's Fund for setting up citizens' juries, or people's panels, which are trying to bring about more recognition and understanding of what the NHS can realistically deliver.

In the past, there was rationing by waiting list and, frankly, by ignorance. If one knew how to get access to the NHS, it was brilliant, but if one did not, no one was going to make it his or her business to help one find out. Waiting lists are to be tackled in due course, I understand, but the population are generally fascinated by health and are much more knowledgeable, so the rationing that has always existed in the health service will have to become more explicit, which will again require considerable courage on the part of the Secretary of State. Otherwise, the worry is that the articulate will always win over the inarticulate, and the fashionable over the unfashionable.

I am critical of the Government because they have always taken the focus-group-driven priorities. This week, they were rightly condemned by the British Medical Association for focusing on cancer services—they have also focused on paediatric intensive care rather than other services. Those are the priorities of the focus groups, not the community. Yet again, I must point out that the Secretary of State made no mention of the fact that mental illness is one of the greatest causes of suffering and ill health in our community.

Mr. Dobson: Obviously, I shall have to withdraw my compliment to the right hon. Lady. When we went ahead formally with the proposals for changes in children's intensive care, I said that she had originally started the changes, which were continued by her successor. If she is now telling me that we were wrong to do so, I had better not make such references in future.

Mrs. Bottomley: We all like to be flattered and it is a characteristic of this place that people like the credit for success and pass the buck for failures.

The dilemma is how the Secretary of State can give greater priority to the greatest health needs, not the most fashionable causes of concern. There is no doubt that mental health is the priority that we have to tackle. In "The Health of the Nation", I insisted that mental health should be one of the priority areas. I am pleased that it is included in his document, but there is no mention of it in many of his publications and there was no mention of it yet again today. I urge him to ensure that whenever he considers health priorities mental health concerns are at the top of his list.

Dr. Harris: Does the right hon. Lady agree that cuts in social services impact on mental health? That is one of the areas of the NHS that is most sensitive to cuts in social services because of their role, and it is vital that, if the Government allow health and social service authorities to work together, they should be allowed to stress their own priorities instead of having to bid for money for cancer services or paediatric intensive care, for example, when that may not be their priority locally.

Mrs. Bottomley: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, and he is well aware of my preoccupation with the fact that the attack on local government has meant that it is ever harder for social service departments to undertake their responsibilities and act in partnership with the voluntary and private sectors and the NHS.

As we face the future, we must accept that there has been extraordinary progress. The changes that we set in motion have left the NHS stronger and the population healthier. I was never able to fathom why the Labour party voted against the introduction of targets for immunisation, cancer screening and the capitation system, which gave more to inner-city areas with the new GP contract. More than any other step, that ensured that the poorest areas received the health care that some of the most prosperous were getting.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State has evolved the London implementation zone concept into health action zones. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence is a good step forward in the establishment of evidence-based medicine, although I do not know how one can justify all the expenditure on the launch, the rhetoric and glamour of NICE when the NHS research and development budget is being cut following the Culyer commitment to a 1.5 per cent. target. That is being widely questioned. So far, under the Secretary of State there has been a triumph of style over substance. For the future, I want him to have a triumph of courage over fashion.

6.4 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I shall not detain the House as many of my hon. Friends wish to speak. I suppose that it is inevitable in debates on the health service that there should be calls for more money. Most people realise that, even if it is forthcoming—money is never easy when one is in government—it is important to target it and ensure that it arrives at the point at which it is supposed to arrive; in a large organisation, it is never easy to pursue the money to ensure that it arrives at its destination. Also, debates on the health service are inevitably a combination of the general and the particular—the general problems and principles and also particular problems.

I must briefly raise one matter that relates to my constituency among others in south-west Wales. I hope that the problems that I raise will lead to a general inquiry and to concern. In what I am about to say I am not picking a quarrel with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or anyone else, and I do not expect the Minister who replies to deal with my points, because the matter relates to Wales, the Secretary of State for Wales has responsibility, and I have no quarrel with him about the health service, either.

Dyfed Powys health authority covers more than my constituency, and encompasses five hospital trusts. Recently, it published a strategic document—a financial recovery plan. The right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), a former Secretary of State, talked about language, and when I read the document I detect the language of that ridiculously named and conceived internal market—a fundamental contradiction if ever there was one. Perhaps my points relate merely to language and there is not a problem, but the so-called financial recovery plan—it is actually called the "Financial Recovery Five Year Plan" and I am not sure whether that it is also some sort of contradiction, but I will let it go—properly states that the health authority has sat down with the five hospital trusts and tried to work out income and expenditure for the next five years, adding them all together. That is a commendable effort. However, the figures seem horrendous—they may not be large in terms of national expenditure, but they are quite large for us in south-west Wales.

The figures are not necessarily relevant to my case, and I merely mention them for accuracy, but for the year 1998–99 there is to be a shortfall, for the health authority and/or the trusts, of just over £20 million. Presumably that means that, in April 1999, the people who run those organisations will have a shortfall—they will have no money, which is the simplistic way in which I would have looked at it. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is a graduate of the London school of economics and no doubt understands those things better than I do, but a shortfall of £20 million is a lot of money for someone from west Wales.

With commendable clarity, the recovery plan goes on to say that, if certain things are not done by the end of the five years, the shortfall will be around £73 million—it is cumulative. The health authority proposes certain measures and says that certain things will be done to try to reduce the shortfall. I will not comment on those, but they will obviously involve some difficulties.

Even after the five years and the attempts to reduce the shortfall, we read—in curious language, which reflects the odd accounting world in which hospital and health trusts seem to live—that it will still be £62 million. They manage to reduce the shortfall over five years by about £10 million or £11 million.

What happens at the end of years one, two, and three? Does the manager of Dyfed Powys health authority go down the road to the Abbey National or NatWest and say, "I have a shortfall of £20 million. Could I please have an overdraft"? Does he borrow £20 million from the Welsh Office? There used to be something called the Public Works Loan Board. I remember, as a Treasury Minister, very late at night, trying to introduce orders to change the rate of interest that the board charged. No doubt it does not exist in that nomenclature any more; I am sure that it has another name.

I hate to mention something as antediluvian as the public sector borrowing requirement; I believe that it is all cash flow now. Perhaps that is the problem. What do such managers do when they end up with a cumulative shortfall? It is a fair question, which I ask rhetorically, to which, no doubt, the Welsh Office will provide answers at some time. The document is a curious presentation of an accountancy exercise which flies in the face of any basic rules of accountancy. I suspect that that shows the fundamental contradiction in trying to run an NHS internal market and present it in management and accountancy-speak.

On the basis of the document, the health authority and hospital trusts that cover my constituency and my constituents will be £62 million in the red at the end of five years. Perhaps the money will be forthcoming. There is certainly nothing in the document to tell my constituents that it will. I am not saying that the money will not be forthcoming. I am sure that the Welsh Office will do its utmost to ensure that the problem is resolved. I must read the document from my point of view. It came in the post last week, and it seems to cause certain problems.

The document assumes that capital private finance initiative moneys, as they are called these days, will provide £13 million—or whatever—for the health trusts. I do not know the possibility in south-west Wales—its gross domestic product results in a relatively poor area—of grand or, indeed, semi-grand PFI projects. Perhaps such projects are impossible.

Dr. Brand: Does the right hon. Gentleman share the concern of Unison, which lobbied the House yesterday, about the effects of the PFI? Will it not have disastrous consequences for the budget in Dyfed Powys, given that up to 30 per cent. of revenue can be tied into private sector contracts?

Mr. Davies: I have no idea; I am not arguing for or against the PFI. I am merely saying that one of the assumptions in the document, which enables the health authorities to arrive at a better figure, is that PFI moneys will be available. I do not know whether that will be so.

The document states:

"The key assumptions included in the plan represent major risks."

It is assumed:

"There will be no underfunding of inflation."

That is curious language. I assume that it is supposed to mean that the Government will link any available money to inflation—the retail prices index, RPI, minus X or Y, or plus Z. I remember that, at one time, there was a special health service inflation, a pensioners' inflation and a Ministry of Defence hyper-inflation, which I suppose is still around. I take the phrase about inflation to mean that, somehow, £62 million will still be required and that inflation, be it 0.5 per cent. or 3 per cent., will have been taken into account.

There is an assumption in the document that there will be no underfunding of cost pressures. I do not live in the world of health professionals; I am not an expert on the health service. Some of these debates tend to be rather inbred. I am not quite sure what underfunding of service developments or cost pressures means—except, I suppose, there are always cost pressures. The document makes very large assumptions, yet, if everything goes right, the health authority will still be £62 million in the red at the end of five years. Perhaps I should look forward to five years' time. Perhaps the figure is unrealistic.

Under the curious sub-heading "Balancing the Recovery Plan", the document states:

"It is obvious that in its current form the Recovery Plan does not balance."

Indeed; perhaps I spent too long trying to point out that fact. There has been lots of work, and we have lots of paper and many figures, yet this curious recovery plan is not a recovery plan at all. Not only will patients suffer: the plan will not recover. I do not know whether most other health authorities release documents in such a form and use such language.

The document does not really tell us where the £62 million will come from—except that the final paragraph says:

"Trusts have indicated that they will require £15–17 million in cash in 1998/99."

We are back to our friend the cash flow. Dairy farmers in west Wales used to think that they were rich when the milk cheque arrived every month, and no doubt bought their wives new clothes or themselves a new tractor. They were not really rich. Now, the milk cheque does not even make them feel rich.

The underlying asset valuations and accountancy in those days was probably pretty wobbly. As far as I can tell, accountancy in the document is pretty wobbly too. Perhaps the matters are not presented in the right way and should be reconsidered. I hope that the money will be available. I make neither claim nor criticism. As an ordinary Back Bencher, I find such a document extremely worrying, to say the least.

To introduce a Welsh note, there will be a Welsh Assembly after 2000. If one discounts the first year and a half of the cumulative deficit—about £30 million—when the Government or the Welsh Office will be responsible, one is left with a debt of £30 million, which will be the Welsh Assembly's responsibility, unless the Government wipe it out. I am sure that this will be considered an esoteric, internal Welsh point. The Welsh Assembly will have a block grant and be able—at least in theory, although in practice it is not so easy—to shift money from one head of expenditure to another. What will happen to my health trust's huge deficit and my hospitals?

I have no doubt that such matters will be addressed and—I hope—resolved. Nevertheless, I have a real problem with them, which I hope my right hon. and hon. Friends will consider. Perhaps they can look at the way in which such matters are presented, and encourage a move away from this crazy world of pretending that we are in an internal market and that the normal rules of accountancy apply. Income, expenditure, assets, recovery plans and such ridiculous jargon does not apply—and cannot be applied—to the national health service.

As I said, I have no quarrel with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or anybody else. I am sure that he, like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, will consider the matter.

6.18 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): I cannot comment in detail on the Dyfed Powys finances of which the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) spoke, but the issues that he raised relate to a problem that is endemic in the health service. We have had a tradition of having to budget year by year, when planning of any public service should be for the medium if not the long term. He also said that he was not arguing for more resources, but he must know that if his trust, like many others, has shown a deficit this year and last year, that is because there is a cumulative deficit in the health service generally, which can be addressed only by reducing services or spending, or by additional money.

Over the past week, like many other hon. Members, I have tried to do my bit to pay tribute to the national health service on the occasion of its 50th birthday. I did a loop of visits, starting and ending in my constituency. I started by talking to users of mental health services from Lady Gomm house, which is run jointly by social services and the health authority in Bermondsey. On Saturday, I went up to the Freeman cancer centre in Newcastle, where, on a personal note, one recent patient of that premier cancer centre was the late wife of my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). I understand that she had good and loving care and attention there.

On Sunday, I went to Stepping Hill hospital in Stockport, near where I was born, with the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell), and looked at paediatric and maternity services. That evening, I came back to Guy's hospital in my constituency, which I visit often and about which I have often spoken to the Minister.

All the staff at those places wanted more resources for nursing, mental health care, night and weekend cover and other services. The Freeman cancer centre needs more plant and buildings. People go there with worrying, often terminal, conditions. Ladies and gentlemen have to use the same toilet facilities, there is no shower and the curtains do not even go round the beds. That is not acceptable in 1998. At Stepping Hill, the paediatric services are being rebuilt in a new building that staff had been waiting for and greatly welcome. The common, underlying theme is that people in the health service give loving care and attention and nearly always do competent, professional work, as patients almost always acknowledge. They said as much to me in Newcastle, Stepping Hill and at Guy's—although at Guy's people complained that the lunch on Sunday was pretty grim, which is a little matter that I shall take up with the authorities.

This debate is about the achievements and the future of the health service. In a non-party way, I pay tribute to all those who have had responsibility for the health service, for its inception and continuation over 50 years of service to the public. It works; it is cost-efficient, taking only 6.5 per cent. of gross domestic product; it is hugely effective in delivering health improvement: things may not be perfect, and other countries may do better on certain measures, but death rates have gone down and longevity has gone up; and it is the most popular public service by miles.

The Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) and I were in Manchester on Sunday morning for a Granada television programme. A couple of hundred ordinary users of the health service, randomly chosen from around the country, were assembled for the weekend and were given information and given the chance to quiz experts and also the three of us. They were asked several questions both before and after the weekend.

When asked whether the Government should spend more on the health service, 71 per cent. said yes before the weekend, and 76 per cent. after. Before the weekend, 1 per cent. said that the Government should spend less, and nobody said so after. There is a pretty good public consensus that the health service needs more funds.

When asked who should pay, 58 per cent. before the weekend said that the Government should put in money for everybody, but 75 per cent. after. The proportion who said that the Government should pay only for those who cannot afford it went down to 22 per cent. after the weekend. Not a single person after the weekend—down from 2 per cent. before—said that health care should be paid for through private medical insurance.

Before the weekend, 57 per cent. said that they were satisfied with how well the NHS catered for everyone's needs, and after it 70 per cent.

There is a high satisfaction rate, agreement that more money is needed and a widespread belief that funding should be through taxation.

I am sorry that the Secretary of State is not here. I was somewhat offended by his failure to acknowledge that the NHS was not only a socialist idea. Beatrice Webb had the idea in the 1920s, and of course I acknowledge that she was a socialist, but it was taken up by Keynes, and it was Beveridge—a Liberal both here and in the other place—who came up with the plan.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): It is ours.

Mr. Hughes: It is not the hon. Gentleman's at all.

In his book, "The Five Giants—A Biography of the Welfare State", speaking of Beveridge's description of the five evils that the health service and other services were intended to tackle, Nicholas Timmins said:

> "In that one ringing paragraph Beveridge encapsulated much of post-war aspiration. By seeking not only freedom from want but a national health service, improved education, full employment and an attack upon Squalor . . . he gave the vital kick to the five giant programmes that formed the core of the post-war welfare state: social security, health, education, housing, and a policy of full employment".

I do not either in any way underestimate the work done by Nye Bevan, because I believe that pluralist politics and the recognition that we have all contributed are simply a matter of honesty. But for the Secretary of State not to have mentioned Beveridge struck me as selective amnesia nearly to the point of self-denial.

Over the 50 years, during which, sadly, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I have not been in government, and for much of which the Tories have been in office, there has been significant improvement in the health service, and many measures taken by the Tories over those years have consolidated the service. No Tory leader and no Tory manifesto—just as no Labour or Liberal Democrat manifesto—has ever argued that the NHS should be dismantled. None of the three main parties in the House has ever taken the position that the national health service should be other than free at the point of delivery.

Of course, some individuals, in the Tory party and elsewhere, may have argued differently, but the great commendation of the health service is that, 50 years on, it is still the view of the three great parties of this country that it should be free at the point of delivery. The sooner we can concentrate on the issues on which there is real debate, the sooner we shall serve the public well.

Dr. Ladyman: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that two individuals who are now Conservative Members, one of whom is a Front-Bench spokesman—the other one may be, but I am not sure—proposed what they called a pill tax, and a charge for every single NHS service? Those hon. Gentlemen are gaining preferment in their party and may one day be in positions of significant power.

Mr. Hughes: I have tried to make the broader point. We could all make nitpicking points. I am not going to do that. The three main parties' positions for 50 years on keeping the NHS have been consistent in their generality. The sooner that the hon. Gentleman and his friends remember that and we start having a debate about how we get the best health service free at the point of delivery instead of artificial debates about things that may interest us in here but do not matter a jot to people out there, the better we shall be serving the public.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No, I will not give way for the moment.

I applaud some of the things that the previous Government did, such as the work to advance the importance of research and development and education and training and to develop mental health services, pursued by the two previous Secretaries of State. I applauded them for those policies when the Conservatives were in power, and I applaud them now.

[Mr. Hughes]

I applaud some of the things that the current Government have done. They have accepted that we must bring health and social services closer together. My party goes further and argues that they ought to be merged. I strongly believe that in a few years they will be merged. It is a nonsense to have a national health service and locally run social services—one free at the point of delivery and the other charged differently depending on the area. I think that in Great Britain, as in Northern Ireland, we should have merged health and social services soon.

I welcome the Government's announcement the other day of a decision to set up a Commission for Health Improvement. My party's manifesto said that there should be an inspectorate for health and social care. Every doctor's surgery, hospital and health centre should be inspected, as schools are inspected by the Office for Standards in Education. The commission should have teeth and should be able to regulate.

I welcome the fact that the Government are concentrating on clinical excellence. It is nonsense that so many things are done that are not proven to be good for anyone. I welcome the fact that people will be free to speak out when things are going wrong. A restriction was imposed by the previous Government, which we opposed.

I welcome the end of fundholding. The differential between fundholding and non-fundholding GPs allowed some people to jump the queue. I welcome the Minister of State's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) last week, in which, for the first time that I remember here in this place, he conceded that in effect we have rationing because there is differential service provision in different parts of the country.

I welcome the fact that the Government admit that more money is needed. I have done this job for a few years and I have always been clear that we have rationing. We have rationing now and we shall always have rationing. Bevan was clear from the beginning that not all national health services could be introduced at the beginning. Services depended on the funds. I would far rather that availability decisions were made publicly and accountably than that they were made by the professionals privately. The sooner that we get a system for sorting that out, the better.

I will not rehearse in this debate the difficulties that the Government are in with their waiting list pledge. The Government know my view. They made the wrong commitment. It should have been on waiting times, not waiting lists. In any case, to take 100,000 people off a waiting list of 1,300,000 is hardly radical socialist nirvana. To take one out of 13 people out of the queue for treatment is hardly a revolution. The Government's pledge is modest, weak and rather feeble as well as the wrong one.

We are troubled, as my colleagues demonstrated yesterday, that many community hospitals are under threat. Horncastle hospital in Lincolnshire, which I know because my grandmother used to live in the town, has closed and 27 others are under threat in various ways. I hope that following the comprehensive spending review announcement next week, one of the things that the Government say is that they will review decisions in every part of the country where a community hospital is under threat in the light of the additional money. The point made by the right hon. Member for Llanelli applies very well. It would be nonsense for a hospital to be closed this year to balance budgets, when more money will be in the kitty that might allow it to remain open next year. We really must have a longer-term view.

The Government in the end wobbled and fell over tobacco sponsorship. They promised in the manifesto:

"We will therefore ban tobacco advertising."

That was a promise for this Parliament. That is why parties produce manifestos. Yet we shall not have the ban until the next Parliament. Everyone knows that this has been a bit of a bottling out. I am sorry about that, because stopping youngsters smoking is one of the key health strategy objectives that we should pursue.

The health service is safe not in our hands but in the hands of the professionals who work for it. We are desperately short of professionals. I hope that the Government, with the money that is announced next week, will make it clear that one of their priorities is to retain and recruit the professionals whom we need. We cannot expect the health service to do what we want unless the 8,000 nurse vacancies, the GP vacancies, the hospital doctor vacancies, the consultant vacancies and others are filled as soon as possible. Personnel planning has been very bad in the health service, and we need to remedy it as a priority.

I ask Ministers to consider giving financial incentives to students to go into health and related professional disciplines in return for a commitment to stay with the health service, as the armed services and the private sector often do. We should make sure that never again do we face the problem that a staff nurse in Newcastle and I discussed. When nurses reach a certain grade in the health service, they can gain further promotion only by leaving nursing to become a manager. We must allow people to continue to get more money while continuing to do their professional job.

We must end the system whereby independent pay review bodies recommend that nurses, doctors and dentists are paid more, and the Government say, "Oh no, you can have only half now and half later." That has devastating effects, and Parliament has no say. My party has been clear. Governments may not have the money sometimes, but only this House should overrule a pay recommendation. Ministers should not do it without putting their decision to a vote in the House. We in the House should be accountable if we do not honour a pay recommendation. This year, the nurses were furious. There was plenty of money in the kitty and they could and should have been paid.

We must consider—Ministers are doing so—a more flexible employment system, so that people can stay on the payroll for the whole of their professional life, even if it means that they do 20 hours a week for a period and 10 hours for another period. That would be much more valuable.

Dr. Harris: On staging of the pay awards, the Minister looked puzzled when my hon. Friend said that there was plenty of money in the kitty. Surely the point is that, however much money there is in the kitty, it is more expensive to fail to stem the rising tide of disillusionment and loss to the nursing profession and medicine by undermining morale and staging pay awards than to pay the money up front, thereby avoiding the need to pay for expensive advertisements and to go to Finland, Australia and New Zealand to find nurses.

Mr. Hughes: That is certainly the case put to my hon. Friend, to me and to others. I think that Ministers know that that is the truth. I hope that they will never make the same mistake again.

We need a massive programme of capital renewal to improve the plant of the health service. I say to colleagues on the Labour Benches that if they keep going down the road of the private finance initiative, they will have to answer the allegation that they have privatised more of the health service than the Tories ever did. That is the truth of the PFI route. My hon. Friends and I are clear. I have here two medical colleagues who both believe, as do others, that the PFI is inappropriate. It is not strategic. It allows a bottom-up approach rather than strategic planning. At the end of the day, it costs more as well as resulting in a loss of control.

I hope that we shall ensure that we have enough money in the kitty to fund staff and capital programmes. The Minister of State and the Secretary of State derided both me and the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald when we put some figures on the table. I do not intend to play a bidding game, but I shall put a figure on the table. We need £8.8 billion more for the NHS to be announced in the comprehensive spending review next week if the NHS is to stand still. [Interruption.] I will show the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) the figures if she does not believe me. They are figures produced by the Library and available to her.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley): It is a stupid game.

Mr. Hughes: It is not a stupid game. I will tell the hon. Lady. If she thinks that she can go out of here defending something that does not give the NHS a real-terms increase next week, we shall harry her and her colleagues like hell until the next election.

My colleagues who shadow Treasury Ministers have made our position clear in our alternative Budget. We believe that the NHS should have 5 per cent. more in real terms this year, and 4 per cent. in real terms for each of the remaining years of this Parliament. In real terms, that would mean £11.5 billion more in next week's review. I shall happily go through our figures with the Minister of State if he wants. If the Government come up with more, we shall not outbid them or ask for an increase. We have costed what is needed, and we believe that it is £11.5 billion, the figure by which we shall judge the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Health. If they produce less than that, we shall give them a hard time. If it is as low as £8 billion or £9 billion, I promise them that they are in trouble.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Gentleman is talking much good sense about the amount required for the NHS to stand still. Will he confirm that in addition to the £9 billion needed for that, we should consider the huge extra cost of administrative reforms being set in motion by the Government? That must be removed from any increase announced next week.

Mr. Hughes: The right hon. Lady was with me until that point, but I cannot agree with her assertion. Increased bureaucracy was a legacy of her Government. The new Government can reduce the amount spent on bureaucracy, although some items in their programme will add unnecessary bureaucracy, for example, the way in which primary care groups are structured.

I want to conclude, to let other hon. Members speak. I hope that over the next 50 years the NHS becomes more democratic, although I am troubled that that is not happening yet. The Minister has told me that he will not reinstate the democratically elected regional health authorities that we ought to have in England to do strategic planning. There should also be locally accountable health authorities.

Health and social services should merge. We must give more resources and attention to mental health, which, in spite of all our fine words, remains an under-resourced service. Mental health is of equal importance to physical health, as Bevan made clear from the beginning of the health service. We must regulate the unregulated professions allied to medicine, such as psychology, and also those who practise alternative therapies. We must not cut back on research and development. The public health laboratory service has been cut back in recent years, and even with no extra money it does excellent work.

As the Prime Minister said at Earl's Court last week, we must realise the benefits of information technology. The health service is, in many ways, terribly old-fashioned. It is nonsense that we cannot see the information held on us, or transport it to other areas or have it passed from general practitioner to hospital, through information technology. The NHS must get its IT right.

The NHS must continue to exist in the community. It must be where the people are. The doctor on duty at Victoria station should not be from the private sector; he or she should be from the NHS. The NHS should be in the shopping malls, or wherever people are in the evenings, at weekends, 24 hours a day. The NHS must respond to the changing life styles of Britain in the years ahead.

One way to remove unnecessary political argument from the NHS would be to create a forum for debate outside this place among the professions, the patients and the public. I do not pretend that a standing conference for the future of the health service is the only model, but such a conference could come up with ideas and a strategy for the future. We should ensure that the public are as involved in the health service in future as they have been committed to it in the past. The NHS is the best of British institutions. We all have a duty to make it stronger in every year ahead.

6.44 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for drawing the broad picture of the number of new hospitals being opened or nearing completion after so many years of stagnation in the national health service. The previous version of the private finance initiative in the health service foundered repeatedly. In Reading for example, there were repeated promises that a new hospital would be built under the PFI to replace the antiquated buildings on two sites, which serve a population of more than 200,000. Year after year, the promises came to nothing. Huge sums were spent on consultancy and feasibility studies, but there was no new hospital. Finally, last year, under a Labour Government, the PFI was reviewed, and we achieved a hospital building programme.

Dr. Brand: That is fascinating. Is the hon. Lady saying that the Labour Government are better at implementing Conservative policy and doing what the previous Government wanted to do?

Jane Griffiths: Absolutely not. If the hon. Gentleman allows me to finish my point, he may understand it a little better.

The constituencies of hon. Members on both sides have benefited from that programme, although not only because of the PFI. More than £90 million in NHS finance has at last been found for two hospitals, and those projects are in progress. The Royal Berkshire and Battle hospital in Reading has already achieved a new maternity block and a gynaecological day case unit. I had the privilege of visiting it last Monday, where Joshua Gledhill was born on Sunday, the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the NHS. He can look forward to modern, excellent, local NHS facilities—although I hope, of course, that he will not have to use them often.

If we look back 50 years ago, when the proposal to establish the NHS was being debated, we find that the fine claim that everyone has always supported the NHS was not quite true. The Conservative former coalition Health Minister, Henry Willink, now deceased, was often said to have had his own plans for a national health service before the Labour Government were elected in 1945. Henry Willink is, incidentally, well remembered in Reading, not least because Willink school in Wokingham—I fear that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is not here—is named after him. As a former Conservative Minister, he described the proposed service as an idiosyncrasy that "will destroy so much in this country that we value."

He said:

"I could never vote for it or indeed abstain from voting against it."—[Official Report, 1 May 1946; Vol. 422, c. 232-42.]

It was said in the debate that if the Bill came to pass, the doctors of the future would be worse than the doctors of the past. We should remember the true state of opinion 50 years ago, and we should look forward.

I am proud to echo my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's salute to all the authors of the NHS, and to those who work in it today. We must look to the next 50 years. The Government have brought it back from the brink, and it will go on to a better future.

6.48 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): The Secretary of State began his speech by saying that the debate had been organised by the Government to provide the opportunity for a national celebration of a national institution. That would be welcome, and I hope that that will prove to be the debate's dominant tone. He had a strange means of launching that national celebration because, having declared that that was his objective, he launched into a party political diatribe that would go down well in Holborn and St. Pancras, or in front of other Labour audiences, but would stretch the credulity of any audience not packed with old Labour Members. It used to be said of Lord Whitelaw that there was a Whitelaw bluster ratio. He believed what he was saying in precise inverse proportion to his bluster at the Dispatch Box. If we apply that principle to the Secretary of State's speech, I think well enough of him to believe that he was convinced by very little of the rhetoric that he was using.

One example of high bluster ratio was the Secretary of State's comments on the private finance initiative. The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and I have debated the PFI on several occasions. I am a strong supporter of the PFI. I congratulate the Secretary of State on the progress that he has been able to make in implementing a policy that we developed during our period in office, as the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) rightly told the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths).

The Secretary of State said that he gone to top out the new Dartford hospital and that a roof was being put on it. He noted that building was proceeding on the hospital in Norwich and that it would soon have a roof. He appeared to be asking the House to believe that that was all done, in the 15 months after the general election and when both projects are well over £100 million in value, from a standing start by the new Labour Government. Life is not like that.

I congratulate the Secretary of State on continuing to implement a policy that will prove to be an important step forward in the development of the NHS. I was associated with it as Secretary of State for Health and before that as Financial Secretary to the Treasury, when I was responsible for pushing through the early development of ideas on the PFI.

I trace some of my interest in the subject to my early days as a junior Health Minister at the start of the 1990s when I was told that I was responsible for what in those days was called "unconventional finance". I inquired what it meant and after a little briefing, it became clear that in the NHS-speak of the time, it meant what the rest of the world regards as conventional finance because it is a more flexible and efficient means of managing a capital programme. I am pleased that over the years we have been able to move the NHS from regarding private finance and the private management of capital developments as a discrete minor interest, dealt with by the junior Minister responsible for unconventional finance, to regarding it as a core part of the NHS capital investment programme.

More fundamentally, the debate allows us to look back at what has been achieved by the national health service and look forward to what it needs to be in future. I regard the NHS as one of the things that we have got right in Britain over the past 50 years. I do not propose to inquire into the words in Hansard by various spokesmen in a debate that took place five years before I was born. That is not salient to modern politics. The NHS is a great British success story for which Governments of both major political parties have been responsible. As my right hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State said, it is statistically true that the Conservative party has been responsible for more of the development of that great British success story over the past 50 years than has the Labour party. I do not seek to draw party political advantage from that but to celebrate a great British success story.

There are two fundamental reasons why I regard the NHS as something of which we should all be proud. The first is the most fundamental reason of all: the social policy objective that the NHS delivers. I do not believe that health care is simply another consumer service. One can examine that with any amount of academic analysis, but I do not find it very useful. There should be something in our bones that tells us that access to health care and the availability of the skills of doctors and nurses to sick people should be decided by a principle different from those that determine access to the majority of other consumer services in Britain.

The national health service has been built to deliver a simple social policy objective. High-quality care should be available to any sick person who needs it on the basis of their clinical need, without regard to their ability to pay. It is a simple, powerful idea on which the NHS has been built by parties of both political complexions throughout the past 50 years. There is virtually unanimous agreement about it among the British electorate. The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey rightly said that that principle has not divided the major parties since the earliest days of the NHS. In truth, it is sufficient reason by itself to support the British national health service on the basis on which it has developed.

I said that there were two reasons for supporting the British NHS. The first is by itself sufficient, but there is another reason for supporting our model for the delivery of health care which is also by itself sufficient and compelling. Put together, the two arguments create a knock-out case. Not only does the British NHS deliver equitable access to health care, by international standards—this point is inadequately recognised—it delivers the world's most efficient health care system. That is not the same as saying that there are no inefficiencies in the health service or no opportunities to improve its efficiency. Of course, its efficiency can always be improved, but it is a simple fact capable of relatively easy confirmation that the British NHS is the world's most efficient means of delivering health care to a population.

The World Health Organisation publishes a range of public health indicators: life expectancy, infant mortality, recovery rates from the major life-limiting diseases. It is not my case that Britain is in first position on all those measures. That is not true. Britain is in the middle of the pack for performance on those major public health indicators. Where Britain is in a league of its own is in the efficiency with which we use resources in the delivery of health care to achieve those public health objectives. These are statistics that are perhaps better known than people realise, but their message is inadequately recognised.

Taking public and private health spending together, Britain spends less than 7 per cent. of national income on health care. In France and Germany, perhaps our main European comparators, the figure is roughly 9.5 per cent., and in America 14 per cent. I may be a simple man, but this is a pretty simple test of efficiency. It delivers the same result for a lower cost input, and I know of no better definition of efficiency than that. Whether we consider the NHS as an instrument of social policy or of economic policy reducing the national overhead in the delivery of health care to the population, there is a compelling, convincing, knock-out case in favour of our approach to the delivery of health care.

It is interesting to examine what some people say when presented with the figures that I have cited regarding the proportion of national income spent on health care. I shall identify two reactions so that I can demonstrate why I think that they are wrong. The first reaction is occasionally identified with the British Medical Association and other interest groups that press the Government to spend more money than Chancellors or Health Secretaries feel able to recommend. That argument says, "Look, in Britain we spend only 7 per cent. of national income on health care, but elsewhere in Europe they spend 8 per cent. and, in France and Germany, they spend 9 per cent. Why don't we spend 9 per cent.?"

There are all kinds of arguments in favour of increasing expenditure on the delivery of different parts of the NHS, but that is the weakest of them all. It is simply an argument for driving up costs. Anyone who wants to make the case for increasing health spending must prove the benefits in terms of output and public health gain. We must not simply drive up costs in order to make our health service as inefficient as those on the continent—that is the most stupid argument of all—or as monumentally inefficient as the system in the United States, which spends double the share of a higher national income in order to produce a worse public health outcome. That is not a very strong argument.

I also reject another, more insidious, argument. There are those who make a different comparison using the same international figures. They say that, if we look behind the public and private health spending total in Britain, we will see that the proportion of health spending committed privately is very low by international standards. That is also true. The figures are quite interesting. In Britain, of the total of just under 7 per cent. of national income that is committed to health care, 16 per cent. comes directly from individuals by way of a private spending decision. In other words, that funding does not come from taxation. In France, the figure is 22 per cent.; in Germany, it is 26 per cent.; and, in the United States, the figure is more than 50 per cent.

Some conclude from those statistics that, therefore, we should increase the share of Britain's health expenditure that comprises individual private spending decisions. It is worth pausing for a moment to reflect on that argument. In each of those countries where private money constitutes a higher share of total health spending, the tax-funded health spending is a higher proportion of health spending than in Britain. So the idea that there is a saving to the taxpayer does not stand up to analysis.

However, I have a more fundamental objection to that argument. It seems to me to be the ultimate irony that, although we begin by recognising that Britain has the world's most efficient health care system, we look around the world to see how others are doing it—recognising that their systems are less efficient than ours—and propose changing our system to make it more like those more inefficient systems. I have never heard that argument explained convincingly.

You do not have to take my word for it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There are other more surprising and less predictable advocates of that point of view. I was struck by a quotation from Lord Lawson on that subject in a book that was widely and favourably reviewed as a thought- provoking and thoughtful retrospective on his time as Chancellor. Speaking, not as Chancellor of the Exchequer, bound by collective responsibility and unwillingly supporting socialised health care because that was the policy of the time, he told the story of why, as Chancellor, he had concluded that the national health service was the right model for Britain and that it would be wrong to try to encourage more private money to play a part in the delivery of NHS services. He wrote:

"We looked . . . at other countries to see whether we could learn from them; but it was soon clear that every country we looked at was having problems with its provision of medical care . . . They were all in at least as much difficulty as we were, and it did not take long to conclude that there was surprisingly little that we could learn from any of the other systems."

I think that that is an interesting reflection from a source that is less predictable than others quoted in the debate. I agree strongly with Lord Lawson's conclusion.

Ever since its foundation, the NHS has been the subject of virtually continuous re-examinations by those who are convinced that it cannot work. In the year that I was born, Rab Butler—to take another less predictable contributor to the debate—was convinced that the NHS could not work and, as Chancellor, he set up the Guillebaud commission in order to prove it. It is interesting to examine—as I did as Secretary of State for Health—the arguments that led to the establishment of the commission, which finally went public in 1953. It was claimed that pressures would make the national health service insupportable and that it would collapse under the weight of its own contradictions by 1960.

Let us look at what was going to make that happen in the view of 1953—the arguments have a familiar, contemporary ring. In 1953, people were convinced that the NHS would not work because of, first, a rising elderly population and, secondly, the rising cost of modern medicine. With due deference to my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), the third perceived pressure then was exactly the same as it is now: the rising expectations of the post-war generation.

Those who claim that the NHS cannot work have not only 50 years of history against them—in 1953, at least Rab Butler had the excuse that it was an untried, bold experiment—but 50 years of arguments that have been proved wrong. The pressures—no one who has been Secretary of State for Health would deny that those pressures exist; they are meat and drink to the Secretary of State—are reconciled better in this country through our structures than by any other system so far developed elsewhere.

I believe that those who are concerned about the next 50 years of the national health service would find it more instructive to look at the history of the service under Governments of both political complexions in order to understand how those pressures have been reconciled with an affordable burden for the taxpayer during the past 50 years, rather than speculating in theory without looking at the evidence of how that success story was achieved. There are three specific lessons to learn from that history, which I believe is more instructive than the theory.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Rothwell): The right hon. Gentleman's comments encompass the fact that this Government are far more ambitious than he was as Secretary of State for Health. It is very clear that our interpretation of health care includes social care. There seems to be a great difference between the way that this Government approach health and social care—I have seen that in my capacity as a member of the Health Select Committee that studied relationships between those areas—and the proposals that the right hon. Gentleman left us in a social services White Paper, which made it clear that his vision of the health service did not include social care in the way that the Government's vision does.

Mr. Dorrell: I have read with considerable care the Government's White Paper, "The new NHS: Modern—Dependable" and I shall comment later on one or two of the points that it contains. However, I have to say that, although the hon. Gentleman might hope that the Government intend to embrace the whole of social services within the national health service commitment of a tax-funded service available on the basis of need to all those with an established clinical need, and that that is to be the idea that underwrites the future development of social services, it is not in the White Paper. I make it clear that I do not agree with the conclusion, but I do not think that the Minister of State agrees with it either.

Turning to the key lessons that I draw from history about how we deliver successful NHS care in Britain, the first concerns the question of the global level of resources. My right hon. Friends the Members for South-West Surrey and for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) drew attention to the fact that, over the 18 years that the Conservatives were in office, real-terms expenditure grew, on average, by 3.1 per cent. per annum. That is not only the record between 1979 and 1997; it is the record of the previous Government in office between 1974 and 1979; and it has been established on several different occasions as the long-term trend rate at which the real budget of the NHS has to grow in order to accommodate the pressures that exist within the NHS.

In other words, if we are to continue the lesson of our own history and accommodate the pressures within the NHS, what we must expect is that, in the long run, there will be a gentle rise in the share of national income that is committed to the NHS. That rise is not a huge one—nobody should take fright from it; anyone who wants to take fright should simply remind himself of how much all our comparator countries end up spending on health care when they try the different systems that people recommend to us. However, it is true that there is a gentle long-term rise in the share of national income taken by health expenditure. That should not be surprising: society becomes richer and one of the things on which developed countries want to spend more of their money is improving health care delivery, increasing that spending at a rate somewhat faster than the increase in GDP.

One of the challenges I offer to the Secretary of State is that, following the Government's spending review, if they really want to underwrite their commitment to continued development of the national health service on the basis of a model that has proved to work over the past 50 years, they should at least be able to say, as they have said in respect of education, that health will, under a Labour Government as under their predecessors, take a rising share of national income. The Prime Minister has made that pledge in respect of education and, if the Government mean what they say about the continued development of the NHS in line with the model that we have seen work over 50 years, a commitment in words that the Government will ensure that, over the life of this Parliament, the share of national income committed to the NHS will rise, would be a means of underlining their commitment to continuing to deliver that model.

Frankly, I doubt whether the Government will be able to deliver the model if they do not steel themselves to the commitment to ensure that, by the end of this Parliament, health takes at least 0.1 per cent. more of GDP than it did at the beginning of the Parliament. I remind the Government that, in the period 1979–97, the share of GDP taken by health rose, if memory serves, from 4.5 per cent. to slightly less than 6 per cent.—rather more than one full percentage point over 18 years. The Government cannot do the same over five years, but the least they can do is ensure that they avoid what happened when Labour was in office in the late 1970s, when the share of national income taken by the health service fell. I apologise to the Minister for lowering the tone, but, if he wants his commitment to the continued delivery of the health service to be taken seriously, that must not be allowed to happen again.

Therefore, first, we must make the same commitment to health that the Government have made to education: a rising share of national income. Secondly, comes the question of priorities.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: The right hon. Gentleman has been making some interesting comments, clearly designed to be a shot across the bows of the right-wingers who currently prevail in the shadow Cabinet. However, before he moves on, may I draw his attention to a written answer that the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), gave to the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) on the subject of NHS capital spending? That answer revealed that, on average, between 1978–79 and 1997–98, the percentage net real-terms growth under the Conservatives was minus 0.6 per cent., whereas in the first year of the Labour Government, growth increased by 4.9 per cent. I am not a supporter or a fan of the right hon. Member for Horsham, but I shall warm to him if he continues to elicit such useful information on the Conservatives' record in comparison with ours.

Mr. Dorrell: I spoke about the capital programme at the beginning of my speech. As I said on numerous occasions when I was Secretary of State for Health, the capital programme of the NHS, under Conservative and Labour Governments throughout its 50-year history, is an object lesson on how not to manage a capital programme. That is why, as Financial Secretary to the Treasury, I pushed through the changes in the rules on the private finance initiative. It is why, as Secretary of State, I tried to develop the PFI in the national health service. It is why one of my first remarks this evening was to congratulate the Secretary of State on his continued and successful prosecution of a Tory policy.

The second issue that the Government must face and continue to face, if the NHS model is to continue to be delivered successfully, is how the NHS addresses the question of priorities. Every Secretary of State is told, "You must not use the dreaded 'R' word," and every Secretary of State develops his or her own circumlocution—hon. Members can read Hansard to satisfy themselves that I am sufficiently wedded to my ways not to use the dreaded "R" word. However, every Secretary of State develops the essential language to ensure that the NHS must address questions of priority in the use of taxpayers' resources. It is simply a rewording of the central founding idea of the NHS: if we say that health care should be available on the basis of need and not the ability to pay, that means that we inquire where need arises, we rate one need against another, we set priorities in the use of taxpayers' resources and we target the resources on need. If the health service does not believe that, I do not know what it believes, for that is what the health service is there for.
